GEORGE the Third, by the Grace of God, King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith, &c. To all to whom these Presents shall come Greeting. Whereas J. Cooke, of Pater-noster Row, in our City of London, Citizen and Bookseller, hath, by his Petition, humbly represented unto us, That he hath been at great Pains and Expence in employing George Henry Maynard, L.L.D. to translate and write a New and Elegant Book, intituled, "The Whole Works of Flavius Josephus, the celebrated Jewish Historian. Containing, First, the Antiquities of the Jews, in Twenty Books, with their Wars, memorable Transactions, authentic and remarkable Occurrences, their various Turns of Glory and Misery, of Prosperity and Adversity, &c. from the Creation of the World. Second, the Wars of the Jews with the Romans, from their Commencement to the final Destruction of Jerusalem by Titus, in the reign of Vespasian, in Seven Books. Third, the Book of Josephus against Apion, in Defence of the Jewish Antiquities, in Two Parts. Fourth, Martyrdoms of the Maccabees. Fifth, the Embassy of Philo, from the Jews of Alexandria, to the Emperor Caius Caligula. Sixth, the Life of Flavius Josephus, written by himself. Seventh, The Testimonies of Josephus concerning our Blessed Saviour, John the Baptist, &c. clearly vindicated. To which will be first added, a Continuation of the History of the Jews, from Josephus down to the present Time, including a Period of more than One Thousand Seven Hundred Years. Containing an Account of their Dispersion into the various Parts of Europe, Asia, Africa, and America, their different Persecutions, Transactions, various Occurrences, and present State throughout the known World: with copious Indexes, Tables of the Jewish Coins, Weights, Measures, &c."—That the Petitioner has likewise employed the Rev. Edward Kimpton, Vicar of Rogate, in Sussex, to write Notes, Historical, Classical, Critical, Geographical, and Explanatory; together with Marginal References. And further, in engaging the most able Artists to design and engrave a more beautiful set of Copper Plates than was ever given in a Work of the like Kind in the English Language.

Which Work the Petitioner humbly apprehends will tend, in a very high Degree, to promote useful Knowledge, and be of great Benefit to our Subjects in general: Wherefore the Petitioner most humbly solicits Our Royal Licence and Protection, to Himself, his Heirs, Executors, and Assigns, for the sole printing, publishing, and vending the said Work, for the Term of Fourteen Years, so far as may be agreeable to the Statute in that Case made and provided. We being willing to give all due Encouragement to this Undertaking, are graciously pleased to condescend to the Petitioner's Request: and we do therefore, by these Presents, as far as may be agreeable to the Statute in that Case made and provided, grant unto him, the said J. Cooke, his Heirs, Executors, and Assigns, Our Royal Licence and Authority, for the sole printing, publishing, and vending the said Work, for the Term of Fourteen Years, to be computed from the Date hereof, strictly forbidding all our Subjects, within our Kingdoms or Dominions, to reprint, or abridge the same, either in the like, or in any Size or Manner whatever, or to import, buy, vend, utter, or distribute, any Copies thereof reprinted beyond the Seas, during the said Term of Fourteen Years, without the Consent or Approbation of the said J. Cooke, his Heirs, Executors, and Assigns, under their Hands and Seals, first had and obtained, as they will answer the contrary at their Peril. Whereof the Commissioners and other Officers of our Customs, the Master, Wardens, and Company of Stationers, are to take Notice, that due Obedience be rendered to our Pleasure herein declared. Given at our Court at St. James's.

The TRANSLATOR'S ADDRESS to the READER.

TO those who are curious in searching into ancient history, whatever concerns so remarkable a people as the Jews must be extremely interesting as well as entertaining; and perhaps many people, who would not look for their history in the Sacred Writings, might be irresistibly inclined to hear what a learned man of their own nation, who was a soldier, a priest, and a politician, has delivered down to us concerning their origin and most remarkable transactions. Josephus was not only a man of learning, but likewise well acquainted with the subject he treats of, and seems to have had almost as much connexion with the Roman people as with his own: for, at twenty-six years of age, he went to Rome, lived there, and became intimately acquainted with Nicanor, (who was afterwards a colonel in Vespasian's army,) and also with Aliturus, one of Nero's favourites. By him he was likewise introduced to Poppæa, the empress, from whom he received many honours.

Our Historian, therefore, cannot fail to give us much useful information as well as entertainment, when he treats of the manners and conduct of that enlightened and warlike people the Romans, by whom he was much respected and esteemed. When he returned to Jerusalem the war between the Jews and Romans was just breaking out, and he then appeared in defence of his countrymen, not only as a very able politician, but as an indefatigable and valiant commander: for being, at thirty years of age, appointed one of the governors of Galilee, he bravely resisted the Romans as long as courage and wisdom could avail any thing against them. But, alas! they were sent as the tremendous scourge of Providence to an abandoned, ungrateful people: they fought under the banner of an avenging God, and literally fulfilled Our Saviour's prophecy, when they planted the Roman eagle in the heart of Judæa; "Wheresoever the carcass is, there will the Eagles be gathered together."—Luke xvii. 37.

Josephus was happily spared from the dreadful destruction justly denounced against his countrymen: nor, indeed, can we wonder at God's kind preservation of him, if we consider attentively many circumstances in his Life and Writings, which seem strongly to indicate a liberal way of thinking, a mind strongly biased in favour of truth wherever he found it, and far above the obstinate prejudices of Judaism.

His Sacred History, though nearly correspondent to the account of Moses, is enriched with much Rabbinical learning, and adorned with many eloquent and nervous speeches, highly expressive of the sentiments of those ancient men of renown who make so fair a figure in the historic page: but when he comes to relate the dreadful struggle between the Jews and Romans, which ended in the death of 1,100,000 of the former, and the total overthrow of their state and temple, so clear and circumstantial is his account, that we follow him, as it were, step by step, sympathize in all the various turns of fortune, and share the horrors of the war.

Josephus appears moreover to have been singularly favoured by the Almighty in some particular revelations of his providential designs; for it is a known fact that he foretold to Vespasian that he should be Emperor of the Romans when he was only a general in their armies; and he confesses, Chap. xiv. "That God shewed him, in a dream, the destruction of the Jews, and their conquest, by the Romans, and what should happen to the Roman Emperors." Being a priest, he was well acquainted with the sacred books of the Prophets, and knew how to explain them; and, from this knowledge, he frequently suggested to the Jews, that God had forsaken them, and gone over to the Romans. He was even so bold and candid as to tell his obstinate countrymen, that, in opposing the Romans, they fought not only against an incensed enemy, but against the decrees of God.

What may be expected then from so learned and impartial an Historian, writing in a manly, nervous style, and delivering to us a faithful account of those tremendous scenes he was witness to, and oftentimes actually engaged in! We cannot, perhaps, any where meet with a more interesting or entertaining history.

When the war was over, and all things he had foretold had exactly come to pass, he determined to publish this remarkable History, which we now offer in this new dress to the attention of the curious. He first wrote it in Hebrew, for the use of the eastern nations, which work is unfortunately lost to the world; but coming afterwards to Rome, with Titus, who greatly respected him, he then wrote that Greek copy which is now extant amongst us, and from whence many Translations have deservedly been made into different languages.

It is not possible, in this short address, to give more than a faint idea of the curious information, and infinite entertainment, to be met with in this noble and impartial work; but it must certainly add to its value with every good Christian, that there is good reason to believe that the Author, at the time he wrote it, was more than "almost persuaded to be a Christian himself." That famous passage, introduced in the 4th Chap. of the 18th Book of his Antiquities, concerning our Blessed Saviour, and which some superficial judges have pretended is spurious, will certainly appear, if fairly, and even critically, examined, to be evidently such a plain and simple narration of an historical fact, as any Jew, in his situation, might have written to the Heathens; especially if we recollect that Josephus frequently tells his readers that he relates facts as he finds them; and, in his account of the opinions of the Pharisees, and the Sadducees or Essenes, he gives them as he found them in their books. Why then should he not be supposed to give us, with the same candour, though he does it in so respectful a manner, a plain relation of what he saw and heard concerning the Christians, and their opinion of their Blessed Master; especially as the Christians were then very numerous, and the general topic of discourse both among Jews and Romans?

Not to be tedious to our readers, we omit a very excellent criticism on the original Greek of this famous passage, sent us by a learned friend; but we take the liberty of assuring them, as far as we are able to judge, that it appears to us, from this criticism, equal to demonstration, that Josephus actually inserted, with his own hand, this fair and honourable testimony in favour of Christ and his followers. His Defence against Apion, and his other writings, bear equal testimony both to his great abilities and integrity; each separate work has it's intrinsic merit, and the whole forms a most useful, interesting, and amusing volume of real history; and it is sincerely hoped that our endeavours to maintain the sense and spirit of the original Greek, will be a considerable addition to the merit of the present Translation.

To complete the work, we have annexed a Supplement, collected from authentic Manuscripts, bringing down the Jewish History to the present times, which, being an attempt entirely new, we flatter ourselves, will stamp an additional value upon our undertaking, and make it in every respect worthy the patronage of a judicious and candid public.

GEORGE HENRY MAYNARD.

JOSEPHUS'S PREFACE

TO HIS

HISTORY

ANTIQUITIES OF THE JEWS.

VARIOUS are the motives by which Historians are induced to transmit to posterity their records of past events. Some are incited to display their talents by the love of fame; others have exerted their utmost abilities to conciliate the esteem of those whose actions they relate; some are impelled by a desire of perpetuating the remembrance of those events in which they have been personally concerned; while others take up the pen to rescue from oblivion transactions worthy of knowledge, to vindicate truth, and prevent the perversion of facts.

Of these motives the two last prompted me to this undertaking; for having borne an active part in the Wars between the Jews and Romans, being a witness of their rise and progress, and particularly concerned in the events, I was inclined to attempt an authentic narrative of the same, to counteract the designs of those who had fabricated falsehoods to impose upon mankind.

The work I have entered upon will, I doubt not, appear worthy the attention of the Greeks, as it will comprehend an account of the Antiquities, Policy, and Government of our nation, faithfully translated from the Hebrew writings in their own tongue.

When I, therefore, undertook the History of the Wars, it was my intention to explain the origin of the Jews, the vicissitudes of fortune they underwent, to delineate the character of the Legislator by whom they had been taught the practice of piety and virtue, and to relate the several military transactions in which they had been sometimes necessarily, and sometimes reluctantly, concerned.

But finding the Antiquities a subject too copious and prolix to be treated in connection with any other, I determined to detach them from the History of the Wars, and direct my attention to the Antiquities previous to the Wars, and other succeeding events. Yet (as is frequently the case with those who engage in arduous pursuits) I found a disinclination to persevere, as the work proved laborious, and my progress seemed retarded in proportion to its prolixity. Some, however, from a laudable desire of acquiring knowledge, encouraged me to proceed, and especially EPAPHRODITUS, a man who had a propensity to literature in general, and History in particular, and had himself held very considerable employments, experienced many vicissitudes of fortune, and manifested, throughout the whole, an integrity and magnanimity rarely to be equalled.

Thus prevailed on by the persuasion of so zealous a patron of whatever might conduce to the public good on the one hand, and disdaining to prefer an ignominious sloth to the prosecution of a laudable undertaking on the other, I resumed my task with a renewed desire of completing it, at the same time reflecting, that our ancestors were ever disposed to make useful communications, and that the Greeks were particularly desirous of obtaining an authentic history of our nation.

When I also reflected that king Ptolemy II. (a sovereign who greatly favoured learning, and was desirous of obtaining literary information even at immense charge) procured a Greek translation of our code of laws, constitution, and government, and that Eleazar, our high-priest, inferior to none of his predecessors in knowledge or virtue, could not deny to that prince the participation of the instruction and entertainment to be derived from such a work, as he knew it was the custom of our ancestors not to conceal that which might be useful to mankind in general, I held it my incumbent duty to imitate the liberality of our high-priest, and the more so as I am persuaded there are now many persons as much attached to literature, and as anxiously desirous of obtaining knowledge, as was that prince in his day.

King Ptolemy, indeed, did not obtain all our writings: those only which related to the Law were presented to him by the interpreters at Alexandria; whereas the subjects comprised in the Sacred Writings are innumerable, since they contain the history of near four thousand years; an history replete with surprising events, respecting the various fortunes of war, the glorious achievements of heroes, and the extraordinary revolutions of states.

In fine, those who peruse this History will discover that actions piously designed will terminate prosperously, and that future bliss will be the ultimate reward of present obedience to the Divine will; so that, on the contrary, such as deviate from those commands, will be frustrated in their designs and expectations, which, though they may present to the view the most pleasing prospects, will end in irreparable calamity.

Those, therefore, who may be disposed to read this Work, are exhorted to raise their minds to the contemplation of the Deity, that they may be enabled to conform themselves to his Divine will, and examine whether our great Legislator has spoken of his nature, described his works in general, and origin of things in particular, with a dignity becoming so exalted a theme, and whether he has, in his narrative, avoided those fictions evident in all other writings. The antiquity of his History might have secured him from detection; for he lived near two thousand years ago, [that is, near 2000 years before the time of Josephus], a period so distant that the poets dare not refer to it the genealogy of their gods, or trace from it the actions of any of the heroes they have laboured to perpetuate. In the prosecution of my design, I shall relate circumstances minutely, as to the order and time in which they occurred. In a word, it shall by my undeviating plan to be genuine without prolixity, faithful without precision, and concise without retrenchment.

As the principal subjects of our Work depend on the information we derive from Moses, our great Lawgiver, it appears necessary to premise some things concerning him, lest any should be surprised, that a Work, which promises an account of the religion, laws, constitution, and historical events of the Jewish Nation, should contain so much philosophy and natural history.

It is, therefore, to be understood, that Moses lays it down as essentially necessary for that man who would live virtuously himself, or prescribe rules for regulating the conduct of others, to be well acquainted with the attributes of the Divine Being; and having truly contemplated all his works, both as to their operations and effects, and thereby traced his power and goodness, to endeavour, as far as in him lies, to imitate his perfections as the grand example in all things. Without this knowledge of the Divine Attributes, and the Divine Power and Goodness, as displayed in the Works of Creation and Providence, as well as endeavours to imitate the Divine Perfection, neither can the Legislator be qualified in himself, nor can his writings conduce to the promotion of knowledge or virtue. He wisely considered that God, the common Parent and Lord of the Universe, sees all things, and distributes rewards and punishments according as men obey or deviate from his sacred commands. Moses, therefore, in the establishment of this grand and important doctrine, did not follow the example of other legislators, whose codes were mere contracts between man and man, but raised the minds of the people he was to instruct to the knowledge of God, the Universal Creator. He taught them that Man was the noblest of all his works, and that his true dignity and excellence consisted in imitating his perfections.

Having thus wisely rendered him subservient to God, he soon inculcated in their minds those social obligations which respected one another. They became obedient, not from a principle of fear, but pity; not from constraint, but conviction. Other legislators, under the influence of traditionary fables, ascribe, as attributes to their fictitious deities, the most enormous vices of which human creatures can be capable, and by that means, instead of suppressing, countenanced the most flagitious crimes. But our excellent Lawgiver, having premised that the Divine Being is the center and perfection of virtue, infers, as a necessary consequence, that it is the incumbent duty, as well as the highest excellence, of man, as a rational creature, to aspire to an imitation of his bright original; while he denounces the severest judgments on such as reject these important doctrines.

By this test it is my earnest desire that my Works may be proved, conscious that nothing will be found therein derogatory to the dignity of the Supreme Being, or contrary to his gracious designs towards men; but that, on the other hand, they will appear a display of his perfections, and a comment on his benevolence, as well as demonstrate that all things are disposed in exact conformity to the laws of universal nature, and principles of the sublimest rectitude.

These grand points Moses has amply discussed. Where it is requisite his language is plain and explicit; in other parts his narrative abounds with allegorical figures, to investigate which requires the aid of philosophical disquisition. But dismissing this subject for the present, I shall apply myself to the Work I have undertaken, and begin with the Creation of the World.

FLAVIUS JOSEPHUS

ON THE

OF THE

J E W S.

B O O K I.

From the Creation of the World to the Death of Isaac.

[Containing a Period of more than Two Thousand Years.]

C H A P. I.

The Creation of the World in six days, with the distinct operations of each day. Man's superiority in the rank of creation. The formation of woman, and her introduction as a companion to Adam. Subtlety of the serpent. Fall of our first parents. Denunciation of God's judgments. Their expulsion from Paradise.

Creation of the world. Gen. i.

IN the origin of the universe God, the omnipotent Jehovah, created the heaven and the earth; but the latter being enveloped in impenetrable darkness, God pronounced the Almighty fiat ; light immediately shone forth, and, to distinguish the light from the darkness, he called the one day , and the other night . The first appearance of light he named morning , and the time of its departure, evening . This was the first day, or this was the especial work of the first day, which, by Moses, is emphatically termed one day .

First Day.

Second Day.

On the second day God formed the firmament, fixed it above all things, separated it from the grosser particles of earth, and endowed it with a quality moist and humid, that the earth might be rendered fruitful by showers.

Third Day.

On the third day he divided the land and waters from each other, and brought forth the vegetable system in all its beauty and variety.

Fourth Day.

On the fourth day he enlightened the heaven with the sun, the moon, and the stars, appointing their vicissitudes and regular courses, that the revolving seasons might be thereby distinguished.

Fifth Day.

On the fifth day he created, and appropriated to their respective elements, the inhabitants of the air and the waters, and endowed them with the faculty of propagation.

Sixth Day.

On the sixth day he created all quadrupeds, or four-footed animals, under the distinction of male and female; and on the same day he formed the noblest of all his works, Man .

Thus we are to understand, according to the Mosaic account, that in these six days the world and all things therein were created, and that on the seventh day God rested, and ceased from his work. On that day, therefore, we desist from labour, and term it Sabbath , which, in the Hebrew language, signifies rest .

Moses, having thus given a general description of the creation, proceeds to a philosophical (a) disquisition of the formation of man in particular, in terms to this amount: God framed man of the slime or dust of the earth, and infused into him spirit, or life, or soul. This being man was called Adam , (b) implying, in the Hebrew language, red , because he was formed of the purest and richest kind of earth, which is of that colour.

Origin of Mankind.

As the first instance of man's superiority in the rank of creation, the Universal Parent presented to Adam all kinds of living creatures he had formed, both male and female; to which he gave distinct appellations, according to their respective species and natures.

Adam names the living creatures.

But as the situation of Adam, contrary to that of the animal creation in general, was desolate and forlorn without an helpmate, whose society might contribute to his felicity, the beneficent Creator was pleased soon to throw him into a sound sleep, take out one of his ribs, and form thereof a woman, who being presented to him, was gratefully acknowledged as a partner bountifully granted for his solace and comfort, and admitted as part of himself. In the Hebrew language the general word by which a woman is distinguished, is Isha ; but this woman being the first, was termed Eva , i. e. The Mother of all .

Woman formed, and why called Eva.

Moses then recites an account of the plantation of a garden in the east (afterwards called Paradise) abounding with all kind of vegetables, and representing, in particular, a tree of life, and a tree of knowledge , by means of which good and evil were to be distinguished. In this Paradise the Almighty Paradise planted.

(a) When Josephus speaks of Moses writing philosophically, it is probable he meant no more than that Moses chose to describe particularly the formation of man, and to inform us that his corporeal frame, like that of other animals, was fashioned solely from the earth; but that his soul, or thinking principle, was not an instinct similar to theirs, but a divine spirit proceeding from God himself, and therefore man is said to be made in the image of God.

(b) Adam, or Edom, signifies Red ; and hence some have supposed that Moses gives the history of the origin of the red or fair part of the human race, and that they became afterwards tawny , or black , as they emigrated into hotter climates.

placed Adam and Eve, with orders to attend to the cultivation of its various plants. This garden was watered by a river, which, surrounding its whole circumference, divided itself into four channels. The first current, called Phison, (signifying abundance, or a multitude,) flowing through India, falls into the ocean, and is, by the Greeks, called Ganges. The second, called Euphrates, and, in Hebrew, Phora, (i. e. dispersion, or flow), and the third, called Tigris, or Diglath, (i. e. narrow rapid,) both run into the Red Sea (a). Gihon, which takes its course through Egypt, signifies, in Hebrew, rising from the east; but is called, by the Greeks, Nilus.

The four rivers of Paradise.

The bountiful Parent of universal nature gave full permission to Adam and Eve to eat of the fruit of all the plants in this celestial spot, the tree of knowledge excepted; from which they were commanded to abstain on the severest penalty, inevitable death. Hitherto there was one common language (b) among animals in general, and they were social in their dispositions; but the serpent being in habits of familiarity with Adam and Eve, and envying the felicity they enjoyed while obedient to the Divine command, plotted to allure them from their innocence, and seduce them to disobedience of their Creator's command. To effect this infernal design he first accosted the woman, urging her to taste the forbidden fruit, and assuring her, that she should not only be exempt from the penalty denounced, but (to tamper with her pride) told her, that, as in it lay the faculty of discerning divers good and evil, by so doing, both herself and her husband would become more exalted beings, and even rival the Creator himself in knowledge and happiness.

The serpent allures the woman.

Gen. iii. Fall of Adam and Eve, and the consequences attending it.

The mother of all, ensnared by his wiles, sacrificed her duty, neglected the sacred injunction, tasted, and being delighted with the fruit, enticed her husband to participate in her crime. No longer shielded by innocence from shame, they saw each others nakedness, were confounded at the sight, covered themselves with aprons made of fig-leaves, and fancied themselves happier in discovering that by their guilt, which innocence had veiled from their knowledge.

When the Almighty appeared in the garden, Adam, who before was accustomed to familiar intercourse with his Creator, shrunk from his presence, appalled by conscious guilt. When demanded to assign the cause of his thus attempting to seclude himself from a presence which had hitherto constituted his supreme felicity, he stood confounded, mute, and motionless. But the Almighty expressed his will to the following effect. "I had provided the means whereby you might have insured your happiness, lived free from labour, solicitude, or pain: all bountiful nature, under the influence of my providence, should have supplied your every want: you would have been exempt from disease and death its rueful effect; even bliss eternal would have been your lot: but you have disobeyed my sacred command, and your silence is an argument, not of your reverence, but of conscious guilt." The fallen creature attempted to palliate his crime, and pleaded, in excuse, the persuasion of the woman, by whom he had been induced thus flagrantly to offend. Eve again sought to exculpate herself, alledging that she had been beguiled by the subtlety of the serpent.

Curse entailed on mankind.

The ground to be cultivated with labour.

The Almighty included them all under the awful sentence of his just indignation. He declared to Adam, that, as he had suffered himself to be prevailed on to transgress by the counsel of the woman, he was consigned to labour to procure those necessities of life, which, in a state of innocence, nature would have spontaneously bestowed; nay, that his hardest toil, and most sanguine expectations, should be frequently frustrated. Eve was subjected to the pain and peril of child-bearing, for being allured by the temptation of the serpent, and then seducing and involving her husband in extreme calamity. The serpent was deprived of the power of speech, and, for his malignity, sentenced to bear poison about him as an emblem of that enmity which should subsist between him and the human race, for which the Almighty predicted they should bruise his head, because therein lay his power against them, and thereon blows prove mortal. He was also deprived of his feet, and doomed to trail his body on the ground in the most abject manner, for having been the instrumental cause of that ground being accursed. Having thus denounced these several judgments on the delinquents, as respective objects of his distributive justice, the Almighty, as a confirmation of his awful displeasure, expelled the guilty pair from the terrestrial Paradise, as they were no longer deemed inhabitants worthy the realms of pure and uncorrupted bliss.

The serpent deprived of his feet.

Adam and Eve expelled from Paradise.

CHAP. II.

Sacrifices of Cain and Abel. Murder of Abel. Banishment of Cain. Cain the inventor of weights and measures, and the first encloser of ground. Building of Enos, the first city. Invention of music, by Jubal. Of brass and iron work, by Tubal Cain. Seth and his sons the first astronomers. Pillars of Seth.

THE first children of our first Parents were Cain and Abel. The name of the first implies possession; that of the latter, affliction or sorrow. They had also three daughters. The dispositions of the brothers were as different as their occupations and employments. Abel, the younger, conscious of the Divine Omnipresence and Omniscience, was actuated by principles of inflexible justice, and steadily pursued the paths of virtue, in all the innocent simplicity of a shepherd's solitary life.

Cain, on the contrary, was wicked in the extreme, and wholly addicted to the acquisition of profit. He invented the use of the plough; but the advantages he reaped from the cultivation of the earth increased his avarice, and excited his jealousy and resentment to such a degree as to be productive of the first murder, even the murder of his brother.

Having mutually agreed to offer sacrifice to the Almighty, Cain, according to the nature of his vocation, offered the produce of agriculture, while Abel's oblation consisted of the milk of his herds, and the firstlings of his flock. The Deity preferred the latter (c) sacrifice as the simple spontaneous production of nature, while the former appeared as the effect of laborious avarice, and the result of interested principle. This excited the indignation of Cain, who, to glut his revenge, slew his brother, and having concealed his body, thought the murder would escape detection. But no scheme could evade the eye of Omniscience: the Almighty demanded of Cain the cause of his brother's absence for several days, as heretofore they had been constant associates. Sensible of the enormity of his crime, and being at a loss for a reply, after some hesitation, he said he had not seen him; but when God urged him to an explicit answer, he presumptuously replied, that he was neither his brother's keeper, nor bound to interest himself in his concerns. The murder was then brought home to the criminal, and his plea of ignorance totally obviated, by a positive charge of his having been the perpetrator of his brother's death.

Sacrifices of Cain and Abel.

Cain slays his brother Abel.

Denies having murdered him.

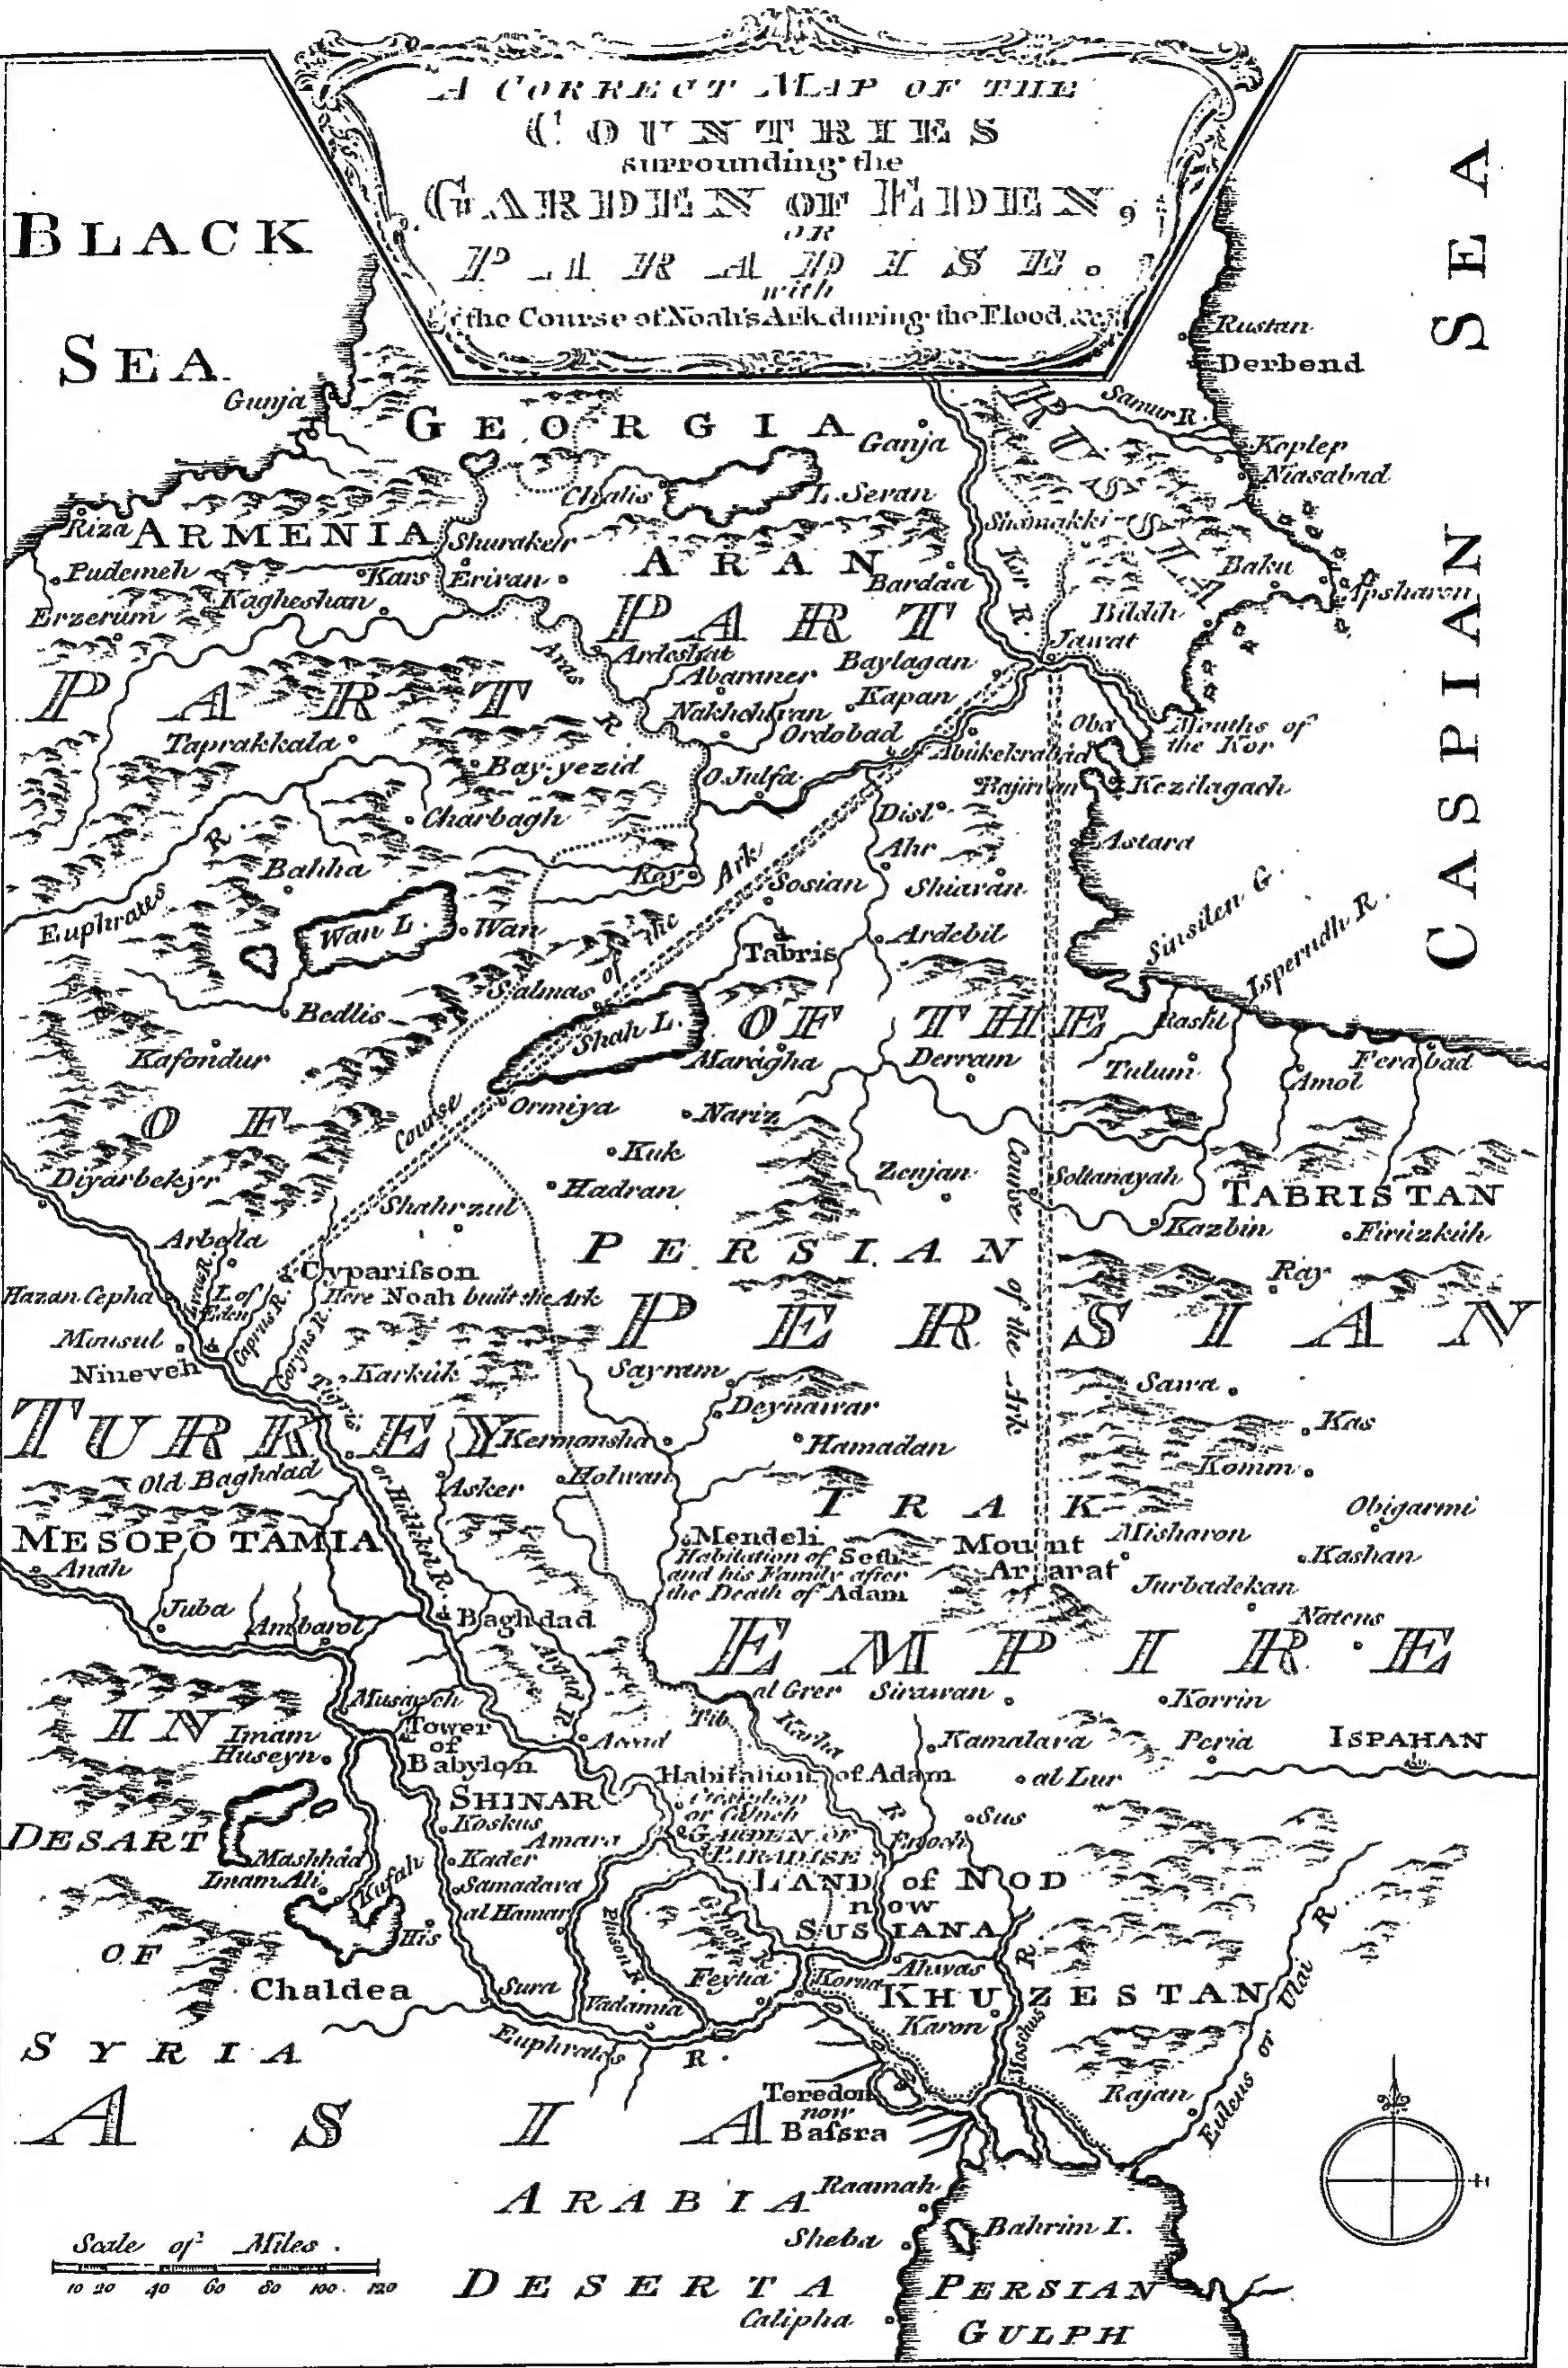

This circumstance, heinous as it was in itself, afforded an opportunity for the display of what is justly termed the darling attribute of the Deity, mercy; for, upon the offender's offering sacrifice, and imploring a mitigation of his punishment, he was permitted to live. But, to fix a stigma on the most

(a) By the Red-Sea is not meant the Arabian Gulph, which alone we call by that name, but all that South Sea, which included the Red-Sea and the Persian Gulph, as far as the East-Indies.

(b) It appears from hence, that Josephus thought several of the brute animals, besides the serpent, could speak before the fall. There is no doubt but the present is not the original state of the serpent, and that their capacities have heretofore been much more distinguished than what we can at this time discover.

(c) St. John's reason why God accepted the sacrifice of Abel, and rejected that of Cain, and also why Cain slew Abel, is this, because Cain was the evil one, and slew his brother; and wherefore slew he him? "Because his own works were evil, and his brother's righteous." 1 Epist. John, chap. iii. verse 12.

enormous of crimes he and his posterity (a), to the seventh generation, were pronounced accursed; and both him and his wife were expelled from their native region; but expressing an apprehension that his criminality would expose him to the ravages of the brute creation, God was pleased to let a visible mark upon him, as a token of protection, and then dismissed him to wander on the face of the earth.

Cain is not improved by these chastishments.

Cain, and his wife, having traversed a vast space of land, fixed their abode at Nais, (by some called Naid, and by others Nod), where his family considerably increased. Far from being reformed by the chastisement of his Creator, his depravity became more apparent in the gratification of the most sordid desires, in acts of cruelty and rapine, and in setting an example which had the most baneful influence on the conduct of others.

Measures and weights invented by Cain.

He destroyed the honest simplicity which had prevailed in those days in mutual concerns between man and man, by the invention of weights and measures, which opened an ample field for the practice of fraud, to the exclusion of all sincerity and plain dealing. As his ambition was equal to his avarice, he first enclosed lands, built the first city; and having surrounded it with walls, and fortified it with a rampart, obliged his family and dependants to dwell within its bounds.

Enoch the first city.

This city he called Enos, (or Enoch), from the name of his eldest son. Irad was the son of Enoch, from whom descended Mahujael, whose son was Methusael, the father of Lamech, who had seventy-seven children by two wives, Zillah and Adah. Jabel, the son of Adah, first erected tents, and followed the pastoral life. Jubal, his brother, applied himself to the study of sound, and, upon organical or musical principles, invented the psaltery and harp.

Jubal inventor of music.

Forging invented.

Tubal, son of Lamech, by his other wife, Zillah, was celebrated for his strength and skill in martial exercises. He first invented the art of forging; and by these qualifications united, acquired great riches. Lamech had also a daughter, called Naamah.

Cain the father or progenitor of evil men.

Lamech being a man of understanding, and sensible of the curse entailed on the posterity of Cain, for the heinous crime of fratricide, communicated the particulars of that fatal event to both his wives. During the life of Adam, the immediate descendants of Cain were notoriously profligate, and, through force of example, inclined to cruelty and rapine. If any of them refrained from the enormous sin of murder, they invaded the property of other men without the least remorse, and were continually offering outrages to all around them.

Adam's years 930.

But Adam, our first parent, (as we must recur to him), after the death of Abel, and the flight of Cain, was extremely solicitous for peopling the world, and therefore very desirous of children. He was then one hundred and thirty years of age, to which having added eight hundred years, he paid the debt of human nature, as the penalty incurred by his first transgression, having, in that interval, had a considerable progeny (b), amongst whom was a son called Seth.

Gen. xlv. 29.

Gen. v. 3, 4, 5. Seth, the son of Adam, a virtuous man.

This last mentioned of the immediate descendants of Adam, was a character worthy of notice and imitation. Being trained by his father to the practice of virtue from his earliest years, he followed the example of his parent in the education of his own children, who so far profited thereby, as to pass through life with tranquillity (c), and render their memories revered by their survivors. By contemplating the power of the Divine Being, as manifested in its various operations, they acquired the science of astronomy, or knowledge of the heavenly bodies.

His descendants invent the science of astronomy. Two pillars raised.

Let posterity should lose the benefit of their invention (as Adam had predicted that the world should be destroyed at two distinct periods, the first by water, the last by fire) they erected two stupendous pillars, the one of brick, and the other of stone, and engraved upon each a particular account of their discoveries, in order that, if that of brick should be swept away by the violence of the waters, that of stone might remain, and thereby preserve the inscription for the information of posterity. The former was swept away by the deluge, but the stone pillar is to be seen in the land of Syria to this day.

CHAP. III.

General depravity of mankind. Consequences thereof. Departure of Noah into another land. Construction of the ark for the preservation of Noah and his family. The deluge. Noah sacrifices to the Almighty for his deliverance. His oblation is accepted, and his request granted. The rainbow fixed in the sky as a token that the earth will not again be destroyed by water. Noah's age, &c. &c.

DURING seven generations the descendants of Seth continued to imitate the virtuous example of their pious progenitors, influenced by a due veneration for the majesty of their Supreme Creator, and a sacred regard for his divine institutions; but, in process of time, they became degenerate, and negligent of their duty to God, as well as of all social and moral obligations. The profligacy of these people now became as notorious as their piety had been eminent, inasmuch, that they justly incurred the displeasure of an incensed Deity. Many of the angels, (by Moses called the sons of God), so denominated for their singular piety and virtue, intermarrying promiscuously, brought forth an hardy race, confident of their strength, bold in their crimes, and resembling, in acts of outrage, the giants mentioned by the fabulists of Greece. Noah, who retained his integrity, and was shocked to behold the general depravity, expostulated with them on the enormity of their crimes, and earnestly represented the necessity of a reformation: but finding all his admonitions ineffectual, and that they were devoted to the most impious pursuits, he deemed it expedient to retire, with his family, from a place in which he had reason to imagine he should be continually exposed to the cruelty and rapine of its abandoned inhabitants.

Those called angels by Josephus, called by Moses the sons of God.

Gen. vi. 2. Noah departs into another country.

The unexampled piety of Noah secured him the favour of an approving God, who now determined to wreak his vengeance on the whole human race, and exterminate from the face of the earth all creatures in general, in order to produce a virtuous generation, the period of whose lives should be limited to the space of 120 years.

The duration of human life 120 years.

Previous to the execution of this, which was to take place in a general inundation, God suggested to Noah the means of safety; so that, in conformity to the Divine intimation, he caused an ark to be built, consisting of four stories, three hundred cubits in length, fifty in breadth, and thirty in height.

Noah's ark.

Into this ark, or providential asylum, Noah entered, together with his family; and having provided all things necessary for their sustenance, took with him seven couples of some kinds of animals, and at least a male and female of all, in order to preserve a remnant of each species for the use of future generations. This ark was constructed on such a plan, as to be at once impenetrable and impregnable, and therefore secure from the attack of the most violent surge, or boisterous storm.

Gen. vii. 2, 8.

Thus was Noah (who may be termed the second father of mankind) wonderfully preserved, with his household, by the interposition of Providence, from the ravages of a deluge, in which were involved a guilty race, as a memento of Divine indignation. Noah, by lineal descent, was the tenth from Adam; the regular succession being Adam, Seth, Enos, Cainan, Mahalaleel, Jared, Enoch, Methuselah, Lamech, and Noah.

The deluge (d) happened in the six hundredth year of Noah, and in the second month, which, by the Macedonians, is called Dios, and, by the Hebrews, Noah's genealogy.

The deluge.

(a) Of this punishment of Cain in the seventh generation, and the mark set on him and his posterity, the literal accomplishment of it will be fully shewn in a subsequent part of the work.

(b) The number of Adam's children, as says the old tradition, was thirty-three sons, and twenty-three daughters.

No. 1.

(c) What is here said of Seth and his posterity, that they were good and virtuous, and at the same time very happy, without any considerable misfortune, is exactly agreeable to the state of the world, and the conduct of Providence, in all the first ages.

(d) Josephus here truly determines that the year, at the time of the flood, began about the autumnal equinox.

(who followed the Egyptian chronology), Marfomane, or Marfuane. Moles considered Nisan, or, as it is called by the Macedonians, Xanthicus, as the first month, and enjoined the observance of it in all religious matters, because in that month he delivered the Israelites from Egyptian bondage; but with respect to civil concerns in general, he observed the ancient calculation, beginning the year with December. According to the Mosaic account, the deluge began the seventeenth day of the second month, in the year 1656, from the creation of Adam; and the sacred chronology is held most minute and authentic.

From thence it is deducible that, at the birth of Seth, Adam was 130 years old, and that he lived 930 years. Seth, about the age of 105, had Enos, who, after living 905 years, left the management of his affairs to his son Cainan. He lived 910 years, leaving a son, called Mahalaleel, to whom was born Jared. Jared was the father of Enoch, and lived 962 years. Enoch, when he had lived 365 years, was translated, or taken up, into heaven, by an exertion of Divine power: his death, therefore, hath not been recorded by any historian. Enoch had a son named Methuselah, who left to his son Lamech the authority he had held during his life. Lamech, having governed 777 years, was succeeded by his son Noah.

In these successions, the births, rather than the deaths, of these men, are to be adhered to; for they lived to see many succeeding generations.

The Almighty, at the appointed time, caused torrents of water to fall upon the earth, in such rapid and ceaseless succession, for the space of forty days, that the most elevated parts were overwhelmed to the depth of fifteen cubits; so that the guilty inhabitants were deprived of the power of flight, and of course involved in the general calamity. The rain ceasing gradually, the waters decreased in proportion, and, at the expiration of an hundred and fifty days, on the 17th day of the seventh month, the ark being lodged upon the summit of a mountain in Armenia, Noah opened a window, and perceiving certain spots of dry land, comforted himself with the hope of a speedy deliverance. On the gradual decrease of the waters, Noah sent forth a raven, to discover if the inundation had so far subsided, that they might descend from the ark with security; but the winged messenger finding no place whereon to perch, soon returned to its asylum, the ark.

After an interval of seven days, he let fly a dove, on the same embassy as the raven, but with different success in the event, for she returned with an olive branch, by which token Noah was happily assured that the inundation was no more. Deeming it expedient to wait still seven days, he dismissed all the living creatures, and followed with his wife and family; and having first offered oblations to their all-gracious deliverer, enjoyed those social blessings which they owed to his wonderful interposition.

The Armenians call the spot on which the ark rested at the descent of Noah, Apobaterion (a), signifying an exit or coming out; and the inhabitants shew some remains of that stupendous fabric, which they have preserved to this day.

Various Pagan historians have left their testimonies of this general deluge, and the ark in which the select few were secured from inundation. Berosus, the Chaldean, writes, "That some fragments of this vessel are still to be seen in the mountains of the Cordyæans, in Armenia; and that many of them carry off pieces of the pitch, which closed its seams, as charms against enchantment." Hieronymus, the Egyptian, in his Antiquities of the Phœnicians, speaks to the same purport, as do many others. But Nicolaus, of Damascus, informs us more explicitly, "That above the province of Minyas, in Armenia, there is a certain stupendous mountain named Baris, to which, it is reported, that many flying at the time of the deluge, by that means escaped; and that a man was borne on an ark to the summit of that mountain; and that some fragments of the materials, of which the ark was composed, remain there to this day." He adds, "This,

(a) This Apobaterion, or place of descent, is the proper rendering of the Armenian name of this very place. It is a lasting monument of the preservation of Noah in the ark upon the top "probably, is the man alluded to by Moses, the legislator of the Jews."

Noah, apprehensive that the Almighty had decreed the utter extirpation of the human race, and therefore dreading an annual return of the flood, having offered sacrifice to the offended Deity, most humbly besought him that hereafter he would maintain the former order of things, nor again wreak his vengeance on mankind in the same manner, by devoting all things existing to one common destruction; but that, having consigned the disobedient to due punishment, he would extend his benevolence to those who had hitherto been the objects of his favourable regard; otherwise their state would be more desperate than that of those who had perished by one deluge, in being reserved as victims to another, after having shuddered at being witnesses to so tremendous an event.

He then implored the Almighty to accept the oblation offered, and avert his judgments from the earth, that he and his posterity, applying themselves to the cultivation of the ground, and building of cities, might be graciously permitted to enjoy the fruits of their labours to a good old age, as their progenitors had done before the deluge.

Noah having thus presented his supplications to the bountiful Father of the Universe, he was pleased, from an approbation of his integrity, to grant his request, intimating, at the same time, that those who perished died for their own disobedience, and not through his will, as the author of their destruction. He then comforted him with these soothing expressions. "I gave not life with a design to destroy it; but their crimes were so atrocious, that I was compelled to exterminate them. I am not, however, inexorable: your intercession shall prevail with me to abate of the rigour of their chastisement; nor will I involve them in another deluge; but it is my positive command that ye abstain from murder, and inflict the severest punishments on delinquents in that particular, as highly offensive to the Majesty of heaven. All living creatures are at your own disposal, as lords of the creation, whether of the land, the water, or the air. I enjoin you only to abstain from their blood; for in that consisteth their life. It is, therefore, prohibited by my especial command; and to free you from apprehension of a future deluge, I fix my bow in the skies, as a token that the world shall be no more destroyed by water." Since that time the rainbow has been considered as the sacred bow of the Creator of the Universe.

Noah continued in a state of tranquillity 350 years after the flood, and then concluded a life of which the extent was 950 years. In forming a comparison between the longevity of the ancients, or antediluvians, and the narrow span of our present lives, there is no reasonable argument to invalidate what I have advanced on that subject, since it by no means follows that, because human life is now abridged, it was not protracted in the days of our progenitors. Besides, in those early times a purer air, greater simplicity of manners, and, above all, much greater temperance, must essentially have contributed to its prolongation. It was also necessary that the term of life should be thus extended, in order to bring to perfection the sciences of geometry and astronomy, which could not be attained but by intense application during a long series of time, as the great period, or grand revolution of the planets, is accounted a space of six hundred years. In confirmation of what I have advanced concerning the longevity of the antediluvians, I could produce the concurring testimonies of all the ancient historians, whether Greeks or barbarians; as Manetho, in his Egyptian, and Berosus, in his Chaldean, History; Hieronymus, the Egyptian, who, as well as Mochus Hestæus, wrote the History of Phœnicia. Hesiod, Hecataeus, Hellanicus, Acusilaus, Eporus, and Nicolaus, severally admit, that many of the ancients lived to the age of a thousand years. Nevertheless, I submit what I have related to the judgment of the reader.

The BUILDING of the TOWER of BABEL.

CHAP. IV.

The posterity of Noah commanded to people the earth, and form colonies in different parts. They neglect the Divine injunction. Undertake the building of the tower of Babel at the instigation of Nimrod. The confusion of tongues. Sybil's description of the demolition of the tower.

Gen. x. throughout the whole.

THE first of the human race, who descended from the mountains to the plains after the tremendous inundation, were the three sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japhet, born about one hundred years before that memorable event. The remainder of his family, who, apprehensive of a second deluge, had staid behind, animated by their example, at length descended and joined them; and the spot on which they first fixed their abode was called Shinar, or Senaar.

Posterity of Noah commanded to inherit the earth.

From the vast increase of population, they were commanded by the Almighty to disperse themselves, and form distinct colonies in different parts of the earth, not only to prevent those dissensions which might arise from their continuance in a promiscuous body, but that they might extend the cultivation, and reap a more abundant harvest from their labours. Such, however, was their ignorance and obstinacy, that they neglected the mandate of the Almighty, and suffered condign punishment through the infliction of great calamities. Yet, as their numbers continued to increase, God was pleased to repeat and enforce his command as to their dispersion and formation of colonies; but those perverse mortals, vainly attributing their possessions to the acquisition of their combined strength, and not to the beneficence of an all-bountiful Creator, persisted in their disobedience, by not paying any attention to the Divine command.

Nimrod affects a tyranny over the rest.

They were incited to this contumacious disobedience of the sacred injunction by Nimrod, (or, as he is called in the Greek, Nabrod), the grandson of Ham, one of the sons of Noah. This Nimrod, who was remarkable for bodily strength, and intrepidity of mind, suggested to them, that their flourishing condition was not the effect of providential blessings, but of their own power and wisdom. By these means he introduced a tyrannical government, and, to confirm himself in the same, by gaining their confidence as a supposed protector, persuaded them to a vain belief, that if they should be alarmed by the apprehension of a deluge, he would undertake to defend them from its ravages, by erecting a tower of such inaccessible height, as to brave the violence of the flood, and secure them from the possibility of danger.

Gen. xi. 2, 3, 4.

Prevailed upon by the fallacious pretensions of this presumptuous demagogue, the credulous multitude were inclined to think that obedience to the Divine commands was an instance of pusillanimity, and therefore applied themselves most assiduously to their new concerted project of building this tower. From the great numbers employed in the work, and the alacrity with which they pursued it, in a short time it was raised to a stupendous height; but such was the amazing thickness, that the elevation seemed diminished to the view of the spectator. The sides were composed of burnt brick, cemented with a bituminous mortar, to prevent the admission of water.

A tower built in the land of Shinar.

Though their madness and presumption were thus flagrantly offensive to the Almighty, such was his benevolence, notwithstanding his late example of vengeance, that he condemned them not to a general extirpation, but, by changing their tongues, caused such a diversity of language amongst them, as to render them totally unintelligible to each other. The spot in which this tower was erected is now called Babylon, from the confusion of tongues which arose there; the word Babel, in Hebrew, signifying confusion. Of this tower, and the diversity or confusion of languages, the sybil (a) speaks in the following terms: "When all men spake the same language, they attempted to build a tower of stupendous height, as if from thence they intended to ascend

The confusion of tongues.

"to heaven; but the gods letting loose the winds upon them, overthrew the structure, confounded the language of the builders, and thereby subverted the whole design; whence it came to pass, that the city afterwards built upon that same spot, was called Babylon." With respect to the plain of Senaar, on which Babylon stands, Hestæus, the historian, writes, that "The priests, who escaped from the general calamity, took the sacred reliques of Jupiter, (Enyallius), or the conqueror, and carried them to Shinar, or Senaar, in the vicinity of Babylon."

Sybil's prophecy of the tower of Babel.

CHAP. V.

Dispersion of the posterity of Noah. Names of regions and nations.

THE confusion of tongues naturally occasioned the dispersion of the people, who formed themselves into distinct colonies, and occupied those parts of the earth to which they were providentially conducted; so that not only the shores, but the continent were amply filled with inhabitants. Some constructed vessels, and took possession of various islands. Several nations still retain their original names given them by their founders. Those of others are changed; and some are altered, in order that they may become thereby more intelligible. The latter are denominated by terms derived from the Greeks; for when that people maintained importance among nations from the acquisition of power, they arrogated to themselves the glory of antiquity, and affixed such names to the countries they vanquished, as implied that from them, and them only, they derived their origin.

When the Greeks conquered other nations, they gave them new names.

CHAP. VI.

Descendants of Noah, down to Jacob, give names to the several nations they respectively founded. Noah's intemperance exposes him to shame. A curse entailed on the posterity of his son Ham, who discovered and derided him. The origin of the Hebrews. First division of land. Genealogy of Abram. Term of Man's life at this period.

THE descendants of Noah made it an invariable rule to affix their own names to the nations they severally founded. Thus the seven sons of Japhet, the son of Noah, spreading themselves over Asia, from the mountains Taurus and Amanus, to the river Tanais, extending in Europe as far as Gades, and cultivating the various territories in that space, which were before uninhabited, called themselves severally and distinctly by their own names. Gomar was the founder of the Gomarians, whom the Greeks now call Galatians. Magog planted that colony anciently called from his name Magoge, but now termed by the Greeks Scythia. Modus, the eldest son of Japhet, was the founder of the Medæans, by the Greeks called Medes; as was Javan, or Jovan, his other son, of the Ionians, from whom the other Greeks in general derive their origin. The Thobelians, now called Iberians, took their names from their founder Thobelus; as did the Moschenians, now called Cappadocians, from Mosocha. Indeed, they still retain some trace of their ancient title in the city of Masaca, from whence it is probable that, in ancient times, the whole country was called by the same name. The Thereans, whom the Greeks call Thracians, sprang from Theres, or Thiras. All these nations derived their origin, and consequently their appellations, from the names of their respective founders, the seven sons of Japhet.

The Galatians descended from Gomar.

Progeny of Japhet, Noah's third begotten son.

The three sons of Gomar, Aschanaxes, Riphates, and Tygranes, founded the Aschanaxians, now called, by the Greeks, Reginians; the Riphatheans, now called Paphlagonians; and the Tygraneans, now styled Phrygians.

The three sons of Javan, or Jovan, Elyfas, Tharsus, and Cethynius, gave names to three distinct people. The Alyfian, now called Æolians; the Thar-

(a) Moses Chorenensis, an Armenian historian, confirms this account, that God overthrew this tower by a terrible storm, and fians, since called Cilecians, as appears from the name of their metropolis, Tarsus; and the inhabitants of Cethyma, now called Cyprus, and from which not only all islands, but all places on the sea-coast, were called, by the Hebrews, Chethini. In Cyprus there is still a town, which the Greeks call Citium. These nations were founded by, and derived their names from, the immediate descendants of Japhet.

Whence arose the change of names.

Before I proceed, a particular circumstance, perhaps unknown even to the Greeks, requires attention, which is, that I have frequently, in compliance with their manner, to facilitate and harmonize pronunciation, changed the termination of their proper names, an innovation of which we never admit.

Of the sons of Ham, and their progeny.

The descendants of Ham took possession of Syria, from mount Amanus and Libanus unto the sea-coast, and gave names to all places within the limits of their dominions; but most of them are now either wholly obliterated, or so corrupted, that they cannot be traced to their originals. The Ethiopians, however, have preserved their ancient name; for having been founded by Chus, one of the sons of Ham, they are called Chusites, or Chutians, not only in their own country, but throughout all Asia, to this day. The Melitreans also retain the same honour: they derived their name from Melitree, by which Egypt is still called, as are the Egyptians, Melitreans.

Lybia or Africa.

Phur, who planted a colony in Lybia, gave denomination to the Phutians; in confirmation of which, divers Greek historians mention a district of Mauritania, called Phute, situate on the banks of a river of the same name; but its modern appellation is derived from Libyis, one of the sons of Mesraim.

Progeny of the Canaanites.

Canaan, the fourth son of Ham, gave the name of Canaanites to the inhabitants of the nation he established, which is now called Judæa. Chus, who was the eldest son of Ham, had several sons; Sabas, founder of the Sabæans; Evilas, of the Evilians, or Getulians; Sabathes, of the Sabatheans, or Astrabarians; Ramus, of the Rameans; and Nimrod, of the Babylonians.

Palestine so called from Philistin.

Mesraim had eight sons, who possessed the whole district between Gaza and Egypt; but one only, named Philistin, gave denomination to the colony he planted, now called, by the Greeks, Palestine. The nations founded by the other sons being desolated, as will be hereafter shewn, in the Æthiopian war (a), no material circumstance is retained concerning them, Labyr excepted, who planted a colony in Lybia, so called from his name.

Children of Canaan.

Canaan was the father of eleven sons, of whom Sidonius called the city he founded Sidon, which it still retains, not having been corrupted by the Greeks; as did Amath, to Amathe, or Amathine, which, by the inhabitants, is still so called; though the Macedonians, in honour of one of their princes, have changed it into Epiphania. Aradæus planted the island of Aradus; as did Arcæus the colony of Arce, on mount Libanus. Of the other seven sons, Enæus, Chetieus, Jebusæus, Ammoræus, Gergetæus, Sinæus, and Samaræus, nothing more remains in sacred history than their names, the Hebrews having destroyed their cities on the following account.

When the earth was re-established after the flood, Noah applied himself to agriculture, and particularly to the cultivation of vines. When the fruit was ripe, he pressed it, and made wine, of which, having first offered an oblation to the bountiful Father of the Universe, he drank to such excess, that intoxication ensuing, he fell into a state of insensibility, and was exposed in a situation highly indecent.

His son Ham, perceiving his father in this condition, disdainfully discovered it to his brothers; but they, touched with filial reverence, approached and veiled the shame of their aged parent. Noah, therefore, coming to the knowledge of this circumstance, pronounced his blessing on the dutiful sons, Shem and Japhet; and tho' he did not curse the person of Ham, he imprecated the direst calamities on his posterity.

Progeny of Shem.

Shem had five sons, who inhabited those parts of Asia which extend from the Euphrates to the Indian Ocean. Elam was the founder of the Elamites, or Persians; Asur, of the city of Nineveh, and the Assyrian empire; Arphaxad, of the Arphaxadeans, or Chaldeans; Aram, of the Armeans, or Syrians; and Ludis, of the Ludeans, or Lydians.

Of Aram's four sons, Uz established the colony of the Trassonites, and built the city of Damascus, between Palestine and Cælo-Syria. Ul founded Armenia, Gether, Bactria, and Melanæa, now called the valley of Pafin. Arphaxad was the father of Salas, whole son Heber (b) gave denomination to the Hebrews. Heber had two sons, Jucta, or Joctan, and Phalec, who was so called from having been born at such time as lands were first divided; Phalec, in Hebrew, signifying division.

Origin of the Hebrews.

The sons of Jucta were Elmodad, Saleph, Azer-moth, Ezdrais, Edoram, Uzal, Dael, Ebal, Abimael, Sabæus, Ophir, Evilath, and Jobab. These occupied that country which is situated between Syria and the river Cophen, in India. Having thus treated of the progeny of Shem, we shall now advert to the Hebrews.

From Phalec, the son of Heber, descended Ragaus, from whence came Serug, whose name was Nachor, who begat Thares, the father of Abram, the tenth in succession from Noah. He was born 292 years after the deluge, in the seventieth year of his father's age. Nachor was 120 years old when he had Thares, and Serug about 132 when he begat Nachor; Ragaus 130 when he had Serug, and Phalec about the same age when he had Ragaus; Heber 134 when he begat Phalec. Salas was born in the 135th year of his father Arphaxad, who was begotten by Shem two years after the deluge.

Abram had two brothers, Nachor and Aran. The latter leaving behind him one son, Lot, and two daughters, Sarah and Melcha, died at Ur, in Chaldea, where his sepulchre is yet to be seen. His kinsmen espoused his two daughters; Nachor taking Melcha, and Abram, Sarah. Thares was so much affected by the death of his son Aran, that he removed, with his family, from Chaldea to Charan, a city in Mesopotamia, where he died with grief, and was buried in his 105th year. About this time the Almighty was pleased to abbreviate the space of man's life to the term of 120 years, precisely the age to which Moses attained.

Abram the founder of the Jewish nation. Quits Chaldea, and dwells in Canaan, now called Judæa. His wisdom. He instructs the people in the nature and attributes of the Deity. His memory perpetuated.

ABRAM having little hope of legitimate issue, adopted Lot, the son of his brother Aran, and brother of his wife Sarah. In obedience to the Divine command, he departed from Chaldea in the 75th year of his age, and settled in the land of Canaan, where he lived in tranquillity, and, at his death, left it to his descendants. Abram possessed a most solid judgment, great powers of oratory, and a general knowledge of men and things. Eminent in all exemplary virtues, he was the first who undertook to rectify the erroneous opinions men entertained of the Supreme Being, to instruct them in the nature of his attributes, and to inculcate, that there were but one God, the creator of all things; to whose providence men were indebted for all the enjoyments of life, independent of any merit or power of their own. These doctrines he enforced by argument deduced from the operations of nature in general, and the planetary system in particular; laying it down as a maxim, that, as there is a certain pre-disposing power, by the influence of which all things are actuated, all things are subject to the controul of Omnipotence; to that should be attributed man's every blessing, and to that should be gratefully ascribed honour and glory in the highest.

These doctrines, founded on the sublimest principles of religion and philosophy, were so aversive to the contracted notions of the Chaldeans and Mesopotamians, as to excite a mutiny against him; Abram therefore, at the Divine intimation, removed into the land of Canaan, where he erected an altar, and offered sacrifice to the God of his deliverance. Berosus, the historian, evidently alludes to our father Abram; though he does not mention his names, when he writes, "In the tenth generation after the flood, there lived amongst the Chaldeans a man of extraordinary piety and probity, and remarkably versed in the knowledge of the heavenly bodies." Hecataeus not only makes mention of him, but has recorded his actions in a select volume: and Nicholas of Damascus, in the fourth book of his history, bears this positive testimony concerning him. Abram (though a stranger) reigned in Damascus, whither he arrived with a numerous train from a country situate beyond Babylon, called Chaldea: but the inhabitants in a short time rising against him, he retired with his own people to the land of Canaan, now called Judea, where he settled, and left a numerous progeny." The name of Abram is still held in honour at Damascus, and there is an adjacent villa, called Abram's habitation.

A famine happening in Canaan, Abram retires into Egypt. The inordinate desires of the Egyptians punished by tremendous judgements. Abram instructs them in the knowledge of religion, as also in the sciences of arithmetic and astronomy. On his return to Canaan divides the country between himself and his kinsman Lot.

ADREADFUL famine happening in Canaan, Abram, having intelligence of the plenty which abounded in Egypt, determined to retire thither, not only on account of the fertility of the soil, but that he might have an opportunity of conferring with the Egyptian priests on the subject of religion; determined as a man of a liberal mind, open to conviction, to adhere to, or swerve from, their tenets and opinions, as they appeared founded on the invariable principles of reason and nature. As his wife Sarai accompanied him to Egypt, and he was apprized of the incontinency of the inhabitants, in order to obviate any dangerous effects that might arise from the king's attachment to her, being remarkable beautiful in person, it was mutually agreed between them that she should pass for his sister.

Pharaoh undergoes punishment for his unwarrantable designs on Sarai.

Abram's apprehension was confirmed, for they no sooner arrived in Egypt, than the fame of his wife's beauty was spread around, which exciting the curiosity of Pharaoh to see her, was of course followed by an ardent desire to possess her; but the Divine interposition frustrated his vicious design by means of a pestilence and insurrection prevailing at the same time among his subjects. Alarmed at these sudden strokes of adversity, he consulted his priests on the causes which had incurred, and the means of averting such tremendous judgements. They informed him, that the cause of his calamities, was his intention of violence to the wife of a stranger. Impressed by the answer of the priests, he interrogated Sarai as to herself, and the man who accompanied her, and on her ingenuously declaring the truth, excused himself to Abram on pretence of his supposing her to have been his sister, and declaring, that he by no means intended to violate the laws of his hospitality; then dismissing him with a sumptuous present, he gave him full permission to confer with the greatest and most learned men throughout his dominions.

This circumstance tended to display his virtues and enhance his character; for as the Egyptians maintained variety of opinions, and bigotted attachment produced schism and animosity, upon examining the grounds of their tenets in the course of his conferences with them, he demonstrated to them that their different sentiments concerning religious rites and ceremonies, were vague, idle, and void of foundation or truth. He discussed these points with such perspicuity and eloquence as procured him the highest veneration, not only as a man of universal knowledge, but endowed with the happiest faculty of conveying instruction to others. He was the first who taught the Egyptians the sciences of arithmetic and astronomy, of which they were, before his residence amongst them, totally ignorant: therefore as he first introduced them from Chaldea into Egypt, and from thence they were afterwards transported into Greece, he may justly be said to have laid the foundation of attic literature.

Abram teacheth the Egyptians arithmetic and astronomy as they taught them to the Greeks afterwards

Gen. xiii.

Upon his return to Canaan, he divided the country with Lot, which affording cause for contention amongst their shepherds concerning the boundaries of their respective lands, he submitted the point to Lot's entire option, as to that particular part which might appear to him most eligible, contenting himself with what his kinsman rejected. Abram then fixed his residence on the mountains near Hebron (a city founded seven years prior to Tanais in Egypt) while Lot chose the plain on the banks of the river Jordan near Sodom, then a flourishing city, but afterwards laid in ruins, and extirpated even in name, as a token of the Almighty's vengeance for the enormous crimes of its inhabitants.

C H A P. IX.

The defeat of the Sodomites and destruction of their city by the Assyrians. The lake of Asphaltites. Lot made prisoner.

AS the Assyrians at this time held the empire of Asia, and they envied the increasing wealth and power of the Sodomites, whose country was divided into five provinces under the government of the same number of kings, viz. Ballas, Barsas, Senabar, Symobar, and the king of the Ballenians; they determined to make war upon them, and to that end entered their territories with a powerful army under the conduct of four able commanders. The contest being soon decided in favour of the Assyrians, who totally vanquished the Sodomites, their five kings from that time became tributaries to the conquerors. Having for twelve years duly paid the fine imposed, they refused to continue it on the thirteenth, and revolted from their obligation; upon which the Assyrians again mustered their forces under their commanders Amraphel, Arisich, Chedorlaomer, and Thabal, who ransacked all Syria, and overthrew the race of the giants. Penetrating into the country of Sodom, they encamped in a valley that derived its name from the bituminous pits with which that country abounded till the destruction of its chief city, when it became a lake, and was called Asphaltites, i. e. bituminous. A battle ensued, and was maintained some time with equal valour on both sides; but at length victory declared for the Assyrians, great numbers of the Sodomites fell, and the rest were taken prisoners, amongst whom was Lot, who came to assist his countrymen in repelling the invasion of the enemy.

Abram pursues the victorious Assyrians, defeats them, and restores the captive Sodomites. Melchisedeck the just king of Solyma, afterwards called Jerusalem. A son promised to Abram. Punishment of Hagar for contempt of her mistress Sarai. Promise of Isaac. Also of Isaac.

WHEN Abram received intelligence of the success of the Assyrians, he was much affected by the captivity of his kinsman Lot, and the calamities entailed upon his neighbours the Sodomites. Revolving these adverse circumstances in his mind, he determined on an effort for their deliverance, and to that purpose speedily summoning his servants and dependants, pursued the Assyrians with such unwearied ardour, that he overtook them on the fifth night near Dan, an arm of the river Jordan.

Being surprized, and vigorously attacked at an unexpected hour, when some were reposing to recruit harrassed nature, and others to dissipate the fumes of intoxication, they fell an easy prey to their assailants,

Abram defeats and disperses the army of the Assyrians and restores the captives failants, who killed great numbers, and put the rest to flight.

Abram effectually prosecuted the advantages he had gained, and pursued with such fury, that on the second day he drove the enemy into Hoba of Damascus, demonstrating thereby, that genuine courage is more conducive to victory than numbers, as with about three hundred and eighteen of his household, and the aid of three leading friends, he totally defeated so formidable an army, that the few who escaped slaughter retired to their own country branded with eternal disgrace.

Having accomplished the ends of his undertaking in the rescue of his kinsman, and the captive Sodomites, from the thralldom of the Assyrians, Abram set forth on his return, and was met on his way, at a place called the King's Field, or Valley Royal, by the king of Sodom, and Melchizedeck, king of Solyma, since called Jerusalem. Melchizedeck signifies just or righteous, a name most pertinently applicable to this monarch, who was not only chose to rule in civil affairs by the unanimous suffrages of the people, but for his inflexible integrity appointed to the sacred office of priest unto the most High.

This exalted personage liberally entertained Abram and his followers, supplied them with every thing necessary for their comfort and support, applauded the prowess of the Patriarch, and glorified God for the important victory he had obtained. Abram in return presented Melchizedeck with the tenths of the spoils he had taken from the Assyrians. The king of Sodom entreated Abram to retain the booty, requiring only the restitution of his rescued subjects. But Abram refused these terms, alledging that he would not avail himself of the advantages he had obtained, his utmost desire being only to retain such a share of the spoils as might requite the services of his household, and his three faithful friends, Escol, Ennerus, and Mambre, who had bravely supported him in the heat of the action. The Almighty pleased with the magnanimous conduct of Abram, declared that it should be bountifully rewarded. He signified with all humility, that a recompence would profit him little, since it could be but temporary, having no heir to inherit after him. Upon this his benevolent Creator promised to bless him with a son and an offspring numerous as the stars in the firmament. This assurance occasioned him to offer a sacrifice conformable to the Divine command. It consisted of an heifer, a goat, a ram, a turtle, and a pidgeon, each three years old. The birds were to be offered intire, but the quadrupeds were to be cut asunder, according to Divine direction. During the preparation of the altar, as the birds hovered around, attracted by the steam of the blood of the beasts, a voice from heaven was heard to predict, that the posterity of Abram should suffer bondage in Egypt for the space of 400 years, at the expiration of which they should vanquish their oppressors, expel the Canaanites, and take possession of their country.

Abram then resided at the oak called Ogyges, in the land of Canaan, near the city of Hebron, and being much afflicted by the barrenness of his wife, offered up incessant prayers to God, that he would vouchsafe him a son. The Almighty encouraged him to hope for a fulfilment of the promise made not only respecting a son, but all the blessings mentioned when he received the Divine command to leave Mesopotamia. At that time Saria, through a providential intimation, caused Hagar an Egyptian, one of her handmaids, to have intercourse with her husband, in order that by those means he might have issue. Hagar becoming pregnant behaved with arrogance, and treated her mistress with supercilious contempt, presuming that her issue would succeed to the possession of the father's domains. But Abram, as a check to her insolence, delivered her up for condign punishment to his wife. Dreading the vengeance of her incensed mistress, the handmaid determined on flight, recommending herself to the care of a protecting Providence.

As she wandered through a dreary desert, she was accosted by an angel, who commanded her to return home, assuring her, that if she deported herself with becoming humility, she should be treated with indulgence, and reminding her, that through pride and insolence she had brought upon herself the present calamities. To enforce the injunction, the heavenly messenger added, that on failure of compliance immediate death would be her punishment; but on the other hand if she obeyed and returned, she should bear a son, who in process of time should become ruler of the whole country wherein she dwelt. Hagar with profoundest reverence obeyed the Divine command, and on her return, and humiliation at the feet of her offended mistress, not only obtained her pardon, but the accomplishment of the promise made by the angel; for soon after she bore a son, who was named Ishmael, signifying heard of the Lord, because God had vouchsafed to hear the prayer of the mother.

At the birth of Ishmael Abram was eighty-six years old, and in his ninety-ninth year, the Almighty visited him, assured him that he should have a son by his wife Sarai, commanded him to call him Isaac, declaring at the same time, that from him should descend powerful nations and mighty kings, who should extend their conquests throughout the whole country of Canaan, from Sidon, even unto Egypt. Abram was also enjoined to circumcise every male of his household on the eighth day after the birth, that his posterity might not intermarry with other nations. The good father anxious for the fate of Ishmael, humbly enquired of the Lord, if he should be permitted to live? He received the Divine promise, that he should not only live, but flourish, and become the founder of many great and powerful nations. Abram then offered most grateful acknowledgements to his benevolent Creator, and, in compliance with his injunction, was himself circumcised, together with his son Ishmael, and all the males of his family.

CHAP. XI.

Flagrant impiety and enormous criminality of the inhabitants of Sodom. Denunciation of the Divine vengeance. Abram entertains the angels. Production and accomplishment of the destruction of Sodom. Punishment inflicted on Lot's wife for disobedience.

THE extensive power and immense opulence of the inhabitants of Sodom produced an universal profligacy of manners, insomuch, that they became devoted to acts of the most flagrant impiety towards God, and the commission of the most horrid and atrocious crimes towards one another. The Almighty, justly provoked with their enormities, denounced his Divine vengeance, not only against the people, but the country, determining the demolition of their city, and total desolation of the surrounding plain.

When this awful sentence was passed, three angels appeared to Abraham (a) as he was sitting under the oak of Mamre at the entrance of his tent. Apprehending them to be travellers, he arose, saluted, and intreated them to accept an hospitable entertainment. His invitation being received, he commanded his servants to make the necessary preparations for their repast, and some bread of the finest flour, together with a dressed calf, being produced accordingly, to all appearance they seemed to eat. Enquiring after Sarah his wife, he told them she was within the tent, to which, as if rising, they replied that before their return she would be a mother. Sarah being called in and informed of the declaration, indicated her diffidence by a smile, being now in her ninetieth, and her husband in his hundredth year. This produced a discovery; the guests acknowledged themselves the angels of God, opened their divine commissions, and assured him that they were sent, one as the messenger of the birth of the son, and the others to effect the destruction of Sodom.

On hearing the fatal sentence, Abraham was greatly alarmed, and earnestly implored the Almighty not to involve the just and impious in one common destruction. But upon the declaration of God, that there was not even one just man in the whole country of Sodom, and that if there had been but ten innocent persons amongst them, he would have remitted the general sentence, Abraham desisted from his intercession.

The two angels entered Sodom, and were invited by Lot to partake of entertainment in his house, for Lot imitated the hospitable example of Abraham. Some of the most abandoned of the Sodomites observing the graceful appearance of these strangers, began to offer outrage to their persons. Lot used every argument to dissuade them from so flagrant a violation of the laws of decency and hospitality, and even offered to sacrifice the chastity of his two daughters, to prevent the commission of a crime most detestable of all others in the eyes both of God and man.

But all his endeavours proving ineffectual, the Almighty was so incensed at their most audacious profligacy, that he struck them with instant blindness, which prevented their finding the entrance into Lot's house, while he sentenced the inhabitants to a general perdition. Previous to the execution of the awful sentence, Lot was warned by God to depart the city, together with his wife, his two daughters, who were as yet unmarried, and the two youths, to whom they were contracted; but the latter contemned the gracious intimation, and profanely ridiculed the impending devastation.

The Divine vengeance now burst forth in all its horrors; the Almighty darted devouring flames on the city, which spread desolation in every quarter, and rapidly involved the inhabitants, and surrounding confines, in one general and irreparable destruction.

Lot's wife allured by a fatal curiosity to behold the destruction of the city, on their retreat looked back, contrary to the express command of the Almighty, and, for her disobedience, was immediately transformed into a pillar, or statue of salt, (a) which, as I have been ocular witness, remains unto this day.

After this dire catastrophe, Lot and his daughters took up their residence on a little spot which the flames had spared, called Zoar, which in the Hebrew signifies small. But in this place, destitute of inhabitants, and almost barren of provisions, they suffered much both in body and in mind. Thus solitarily situated, the daughters of Lot, imagining that the male part of the human race was totally extinct, concerted the means of having private intercourse with their father.

The issue of this contrivance was, each of them brought forth a son: that born of the elder was called Moab, signifying of my father; that of the younger was named Ammon, which implies, the son of my race or kin. The first of these was the founder of the Moabites, who at this day are a powerful nation, and the latter of the Ammonites, both of which inhabit Cœlo-Syria.

CHAP. XII.

Transactions between Abraham and Abimelech. Birth of Isaac. Variation in religious ceremonies between the Jews and the Arabs. Banishment of Ishmael and Hagar. Hagar accosted and warned by an angel. Progeny of Ishmael.

ABRAHAM now removed to Gerar in the country of Palestine, whither his wife Sarah accompanied him in quality of his sister; for he entertained the same apprehensions of Abimelech, king of that country, as he had done of Pharaoh, king of Egypt. Nor were his suspicions groundless, for this monarch conceiving a passion for Sarah would have injured him in the tenderest point, had he not been providentially afflicted by a dreadful disease, and warned in a dream from violating the laws of hospitality in offering outrage to the woman, who accompanied the stranger, as she was not his sister, but his lawful wife. Upon his recovery, he related to his friends the particulars of his dream, acknowledging that he had been visited with sickness, for the preservation of the chastity of the stranger's wife, and sending for Abraham, gave him every encouraging assurance, with the most solemn promises of his future favour and protection. He then, with the council of his friends, dismissed Abraham, averring in the most sacred manner, that his wife was and should still remain inviolate, having been under the immediate protection of Almighty power. In confirmation of what he declared as truth, he called God and the woman's conscience to witness; adding, that had he known she was his wife, he would not have indulged an unwarrantable desire. He further begged Abraham to pardon the injury offered him, and intercede with God in his favour, promising him ample provision, if he continued in the country, and if he chose to depart, every thing necessary for his journey.

Abraham exculpated himself from the deception in calling his wife a sister, by adverting to their affinity, as she was the daughter of his brother; and observing farther, that without having recourse to such means, he could not prosecute his travels with safety. He avowed his concern for the disease with which the king had been afflicted, and accepted his offer of continuing in his dominions.

Abimelech then assigned over to Abraham an extensive track of land, and a proportionate sum of money to stock it, entering at the same time with him into a mutual covenant of friendship and amity, which was ratified at a certain well called Bersêbe, or the well or pit of swearing a covenant; and it bears that name in the language of the inhabitants to this day.

Soon after these transactions, Abraham had a son by his wife Sarah, according to the Divine promise, and called his name Isaac, signifying in Hebrew, laughter, alluding to his mother's smile of diffidence, when the angel assured her she should bear a son, she being then in her ninetieth, and her husband in his hundredth year. On the (b) eighth day after his birth the boy was circumcised, at which time the Jews still continue the observance of that rite.

The Arabians however do not perform it till the thirteenth year, because Ishmael, Abraham's son by the concubine, and friend of that people, did not undergo the operation till he arrived at that age. Sarah had been as affectionately attached to Ishmael, the son of her handmaid Hagar, as if he had been her own, and even regarded him as presumptive heir to the family; but when Isaac was born, she thought a separation expedient, lest Ishmael the elder might, on the decease of his father, usurp authority, and lay claim to the succession. She therefore proposed to Abraham the immediate dismissal of Ishmael and his mother to some other place. Abraham at first rejected the proposal, as unnatural and inhuman; but at length, prevailed on by tokens of the Divine approbation, he acquiesced, committed the child to the care of his mother, and having given her a portion of bread, and a pitcher of water, dismissed them to pursue that course to which their necessity might direct them. When their provision of bread and water was exhausted, and the child was almost spent with fatigue and famine, she laid him down under an oak, and retired to a little distance, that she might not be shocked by his expiring groans. Ruminating on her miseries, she was addressed by a message from on high, who pointed out to her a neighbouring spring, and charged her to attend sedulously to the nurture of her child, as her ultimate happiness depended on his preservation.

Animated by these divine intimations, she pursued her course till she met with some shepherds, by whose bounty all her wants were most amply supplied.

When Ishmael attained to years of maturity, he took to wife an Egyptian woman, by whom he had twelve sons; Nabaioth, Kedar, Abdeel, Idumas, Massam, Memas, Mames, Chedam, Theman, Jetur, Naphefus, and Cadmas, whose posterity spread themselves over the whole country called Nabathea, which extends from the Red Sea to the river Euphrates. From these are descended the Arabians and their several tribes, so celebrated for their valour, and the dignity of Abraham their progenitor.

(a) The pillar of salt was, we find here, standing in the days of Josephus, and he had seen it. That it was standing then is also attested by Clement of Rome, cotemporary with Josephus; as also that it was so in the next century is attested by Irenæus.

(b) This circumcision is not after, but on the eighth day, as it is elsewhere expressed by Josephus; the like construction to which we meet with in the New Testament, particularly in the Evangelists.

CHAP. XIII.

Abraham enjoined by the Divine command to make a sacrifice of his son Isaac. His obedience. Address to his son previous to the intended oblation. Isaac's acquiescence. The Almighty interposes, interdicts the sacrifice of the youth, signifies his approbation of his obedience, and presents Abraham with a ram for the sacrifice as a substitute for Isaac.

ABRAMHAM was most affectionately attached to Isaac as his only legitimate son, the child of his age, and the peculiar gift of God, according to his Divine promise.

On the other hand, Isaac, by his filial duty and obedience, his fervent piety and uniform practice of virtue, enhanced, if possible, the affection of his parents; insomuch that Abraham's earthly delight centering in his son, his safety and happiness became the chief objects of his concern, and he waited with resignation his dismissal from a scene of transient existence, provided his possessions in general might devolve to him; a desire which, through the favour of the Almighty, he happily effected.

It now seemed meet to the wise Disposer of all events to put this pious man's faith to the severest test. He therefore appeared to him in an extraordinary manner, and having reminded him of the various benefits he had conferred upon him, and the singular felicity he now enjoyed, under his peculiar sanction and favour, proposed to him the sacrifice of his son Isaac, as an oblation, in token of his gratitude and obedience to the God of all his mercies, commanding him at the same time to conduct him to the mountain of Moriah, and there make of him a Burnt Offering on an altar to be erected for that special purpose.

Abraham, duly impressed with duty towards the Father of all Mercies, and firmly persuaded that his Divine command was not to be dispensed with, or even delayed on any human pretence, determined on immediate submission. Without communicating God's injunction, or his own resolution, to his wife and household, lest they should divert him from his duty, he took his son Isaac, with two servants, and loading an ass with the necessary apparatus for the sacrifice, departed for the mountain. Descrying the destined spot on the third day, he left the servants in the valley, and, attended only by his son, ascended the mountain, upon which King David appointed the Temple to be afterwards built (a). They also carried with them every thing necessary for the sacrifice, the victim only excepted. Isaac, who was then five and twenty years old, having himself erected and prepared the altar, but observing no victim, intimated his surprise to his father, and enquired of him as to the manner in which they should proceed to the sacrifice. Abraham, in the fulness of his heart, replied to the innocent youth, that God, the omnipotent Jehovah, would provide a victim if he approved the oblation.

At length, when every necessary preparation was made, he addressed his son in words to the following import: "Child of my doating age, of my fervent prayers, I have nurtured thee with the fondest affection, and most unremitting attention; all my delight centered in the expectation of leaving thee successor to my possessions, when I should be arrested to pay the debt of nature; but since it pleaseth the Sovereign of the Universe, that the father to whom thou wert given in mercy, should now be the instrument of thy restitution to his Divine will, let silent submission testify acquiescent obedience, and devoutly consecrate thyself to that God who demands thee as a victim. This we are enjoined as a token of grateful obedience for numerous benefits conferred. Since therefore as a descendant of Adam mortality is thy inevitable doom, reflect that thy dismissal from this life is not in the ordinary way of sickness, or any common calamity, but through the immediate instru-mentality of thine own father as a victim to the divine command; and let this consideration dispose thee to give up thy spirit at the altar with fervent supplication and pious resignation, that thou mayest be translated to the realms of bliss, and be rendered supremely happy in the Fountain of the Divine Presence. By these means thy remembrance will console me to my latest days, when I reflect that though I have lost the aid and comfort of a son, I shall ever be guarded by the shield of Omnipotence."

Isaac, animated by the same sense of duty as his pious father, listened to his address with fixed attention and glowing ardour, eagerly replying, that he should deem himself unworthy of birth, if he should hesitate to obey the command of God, or murmur at the requisition of his father; nay, that he would without reluctance, have submitted to the sacrifice even at the command of his father alone, from the immutable regard he had ever entertained for filial duty and obedience." Having thus said, he approached the altar with alacrity, and placed himself thereon in a proper position: the father's arm was uplifted, and prepared for the decisive stroke, when, at the critical moment, that very voice from above that had given the command sounded the prohibition, and arrested the blow. The merciful Parent of the universe was pleased to declare, that his command arose not from a delight he took in human sacrifices, or depriving him of a son whom he had bestowed on him as a peculiar favour, but a desire of putting his faith and obedience to the severest test; that as he had given such singular proofs of his piety, his family should be the particular objects of his paternal regard; that his son should live to a good old age, leave his dominions to his posterity, who should increase the same, and possess domains to a vast extent. It was added, that they should expel the inhabitants of Canaan by force of arms, inhabit the land themselves, and become the wonder and envy of surrounding nations.

When the Divine voice ceased, a ram suddenly appeared, and presenting itself as a victim, Abraham and his son mutually embraced, as a token of joy of so signal a deliverance, and the promise of such inestimable blessings, proceeded to the oblation with most fervent devotion, and then returned to their house with all the complacency of an applauding conscience, and an approving God, to reap the benefits arising from their piety and obedience.

founded colonies in the country of the Troglodytes, and that part of Arabia Felix which is bounded by the Red Sea. Tradition reports that Ophir entered Lybia at the head of an army, took possession of it, and that his successors, taking up their residence in it, called it in process of time by the name of Africa. This report is, in some measure, confirmed by Alexander Polyhistor, who alludes to an history of the Jews, written in the style and manner of Moses, by the prophet Cleodemus, or Malchus. This writer relates, "that Abraham had several children by Chetur-
"ra, of whom he names three, Ophir, Surim, and "Japher. The Syrians derive their appellation from "Surim, as do the city of Aphra, and the country of "Africa, from the two others. He adds, that they "fought under the command of Hercules, in his "expedition in Lybia against Antæus; and that "Hercules, taking to wife the daughter of Apher,
"she bore him a son called Debor, or Deden, who "was the father of Sopho, founder of a barbarous
"race, known by the appellation of Sophaces."

cules.

Abraham seeks a wife for Isaac when forty years old.

Isaac having now almost attained to the age of forty years, his father became anxious to provide him a wife, and therefore deputed a trusty servant as messenger to demand in marriage Rebecca the daughter of Bethuel, his brother Nachor's son. Having previously bound him to a faithful discharge of his commission by an oath, (which ceremony was performed by the servant's putting his hand under his master's thigh,) Abraham dismissed him with valuable presents to dispense at his discretion upon his arrival. After a tedious and fatiguing journey through Melopotamia, where the traveller is impeded in the winter by deep bogs, and by a scarcity of water in the summer, as well as constantly exposed to the depredations of robbers, he at length arrived at the city of Charan, and in the suburbs met several young maidens going to a well to draw water. This induced him to offer up an ejaculation to God, that if the intended alliance had his sanction, Rebecca, whom his master had sent him to demand in marriage for his son, might come forth amongst the rest, and that the token by which he should distinguish her might be the immediate compliance with his request of some water to appease his thirst, after a general denial from the rest. Possessed with this idea, he approached the well, and applying individually to each to give him to drink, was refused on different pretences by them all, one excepted, who reproaching her companions with their uncourteous behaviour to a stranger, as well as want of deference to the male character, with the greatest humanity presented him the pitcher.

Rebecca's humanity and affability.

This propitious event encouraged the messenger to pave the way for the introduction of his commission: therefore after commending her humanity and generosity, in relieving a distressed traveller even at the expence of her own labour, he proceeded to enquire concerning her parents, whom he pronounced happy in such a daughter, adding an earnest prayer to the Almighty that she might be blessed with a pious and affectionate husband, and become the mother of a numerous and virtuous offspring.

The innocent maid, without reserve, ingenuously replied, "My name is Rebecca: Bethuel, my father, is long deceased; so that the concerns of our family are under the direction of my mother and my uncle Laban, who are the guardians of my youth-ful age."

Inferring from what had passed, that the negotiation was favoured by the interposition of Providence, he presented the maid with several female ornaments, requesting her acceptance as a recompence for her singular courtesy on the most pressing occasion, and adding an earnest intreaty that he might be vouchsafed an asylum in her uncle's house, as night coming on, he could not prosecute his journey without danger of sustaining the loss of jewels of immense value, which could not be in any place with such assurance of security as at the house of those whose benevolence and humanity he conceived to firm an opinion of, from the open and ingenuous behaviour of their beautiful relative; and concluded with declaring, that if her uncle and mother would deign him reception, he would make them ample recompence also for his entertainment.

Rebecca returned for answer, that his opinion of the humanity of her relations was well founded, but not his suspicion of their liberality, assuring him that if admitted, he would be entertained without expence; and then entreated permission to acquaint her uncle with the circumstance, previous to his introduction. Laban being thus apprized of the arrival of a stranger, received him with the frankest hospitality, giving orders to his servants to take care of his camels, while he was entertained at his own table. Supper being removed, the messenger thus addressed the mother and uncle of Rebecca; "I am "deputed on especial embassy from Abraham the son "of Thares: for Nachor (addressing himself to the "woman) the grandfather of your children, was
"brother to Abraham by the same father and mother.
"I am authorized by him to ask your daughter in "marriage to his legitimate son and heir, whom "he hath refused to the most powerful and opulent
"of his country, preferring an alliance with those "of his own kindred. Frustrate not, therefore, his "well-founded intentions, especially as the Divine
"interposition appears so evidently to have formed
"the design, in directing me first to the maiden, and "then to your habitation; for when I entered the "city, and perceived many virgins approaching the "well, I offered up a fervent prayer that I might "find the maiden of whom I was in quest, which the "Almighty was pleased to grant. Ratify, therefore,
"by your authority, an union manifestly approved
"from on high, and render my matter happy in "acceding to the purport of my commission, by the "voluntary resignation of your daughter to the pos"session of his beloved son." The match appearing, on the shortest reflection, so conducive to the welfare of the virgin, the honour and dignity of the family, as well as conformable to the will of God, he obtained the consent of the parties concerned. Rebecca was therefore consigned to the care of the trusty messenger, by whom she was conducted to Isaac, now become lord of his father's possessions; as all the sons of Abraham by Chetura had departed, and fixed their residence in remote countries.

Death and Burial of Abraham.

ABRAHAM, soon after the consummation of the marriage between his darling son Isaac and the beautiful Rebecca, which he had so devoutly wished, paid the debt of nature in the hundred and seventy-fifth year of his age. His piety and virtue were so eminently conspicuous throughout the transactions of his whole life, that he was not only singularly favoured by his God, but revered by his contemporaries as an ornament to human nature, and a character worthy of universal imitation. He was buried at Hebron, near his wife Sarah; the funeral rites being performed by his sons Ishmael and Isaac.

SOON after Isaac had performed his last office of duty to his deceased parent, his wife Rebecca became pregnant, and being of most extraordinary bulk, her husband, as the time of her delivery approached, was extremely anxious for her safety, and enquired of the Lord the cause of so singular an appearance. He was informed that this wife should bear twins (a) who should give names to two several nations, and that in process of time, he who at first seemed to be the less significant should become the most important. At length, according to the Divine intimation, Rebecca was delivered of twins, the elder of whom was covered with hair from head to feet, and the younger came into the world holding his brother by the heel. The former, called Esau, (and by some Seir, from the hairiness of his body,) was the favourite of his father, but the latter, whose name was Jacob, engrossed the affection of his mother.

A dreadful famine raging at this time in Canaan, Isaac was inclined to retire to Egypt, but being diverted from his purpose, at the Divine command, he repaired to Gerar. King Abimelech at first gave him a kind reception, according to the league of friendship and amity which had subsisted between that monarch and his father Abraham. But soon perceiving the peculiar interposition of Divine Providence in favour of Isaac and all his concerns, his envy and jealousy were excited to such a degree, that he expelled him from his environs. Isaac withdrew to a place called Pharan, or the Valley, not far distant from Gerar; where his servants, on attempting to dig, in order to discover a spring of water, were opposed by some of the king's shepherds; and Isaac determined not to contend with them, they imagined they had carried their point. Removing to a more distant place, Isaac's servants renewed the attempt, and were annoyed in the same manner as before; but his prudence again inducing them to avoid extremities, he at length obtained permission from the king to dig, upon which he sunk a well, and called it Rooboth, signifying, in Hebrew, large or spacious. One of the two former places he named Escon, and the other Siennes; words implying, in the original, contention and enmity.

But the increasing power and riches of Isaac raised disquieting apprehensions in the mind of Abimelech, which added to reflections on the instances of his breach of friendship in the late circumstance of digging for the well, excited his fear lest Isaac should embrace the first opportunity of revenging the injuries he had done him. He had therefore recourse to dissimulation, and taking with him Picol, one of his principal officers, as arbiter, repaired to the place of Isaac's residence, and there proposed a renewal of the former league of friendship and amity. Isaac being of a most courteous disposition, readily complied. The ratification of the league put an end to all animosity; and Abimelech, having accomplished his purpose, returned home with perfect satisfaction.

Esau, Isaac's favourite son, having obtained to the age of forty years, took to himself two wives, Ada, the daughter of Elon, and Alibama, the daughter of Efebion, two of the most powerful persons amongst the Canaanites. In neither of these contracts did Esau consult the will and pleasure of his father, assured he should never obtain his consent, as Isaac was averse to any alliance with the people of the country. The error, however, being irremovable, such was the good father's candour and moderation, that he did not command their expulsion, but only enjoined his son to conceal his marriage.

When Isaac was stricken in years, and deprived of his sight, he called his son Esau to him, and having lamented the infirmities of age, and the loss of his eyes, which prevented him from serving God with his wonted alacrity, expressed an earnest desire of leaving him his blessing before his departure. To this purpose he ordered his son to proceed to the hunt, and to prepare him a repast (a) from whatever chance might throw in his way; adding, that upon such consideration, he would offer up his fervent prayer to the Almighty for his future protection and favour towards him, as the best manner he could employ the short interval between the present moment, and his entrance in the eternal world.

Esau immediately set forth; but (b) Rebecca overhearing what passed, and desirous of transferring the promised blessing from Esau to her favourite son Jacob, though in direct opposition to her husband's mind and will, commanded him instantly to kill a kid, and prepare a repast for his father. Jacob, obsequious to his mother, obeyed her command; and having prepared every thing according to her direction, spread the skin of the kid over his neck and hands, that by those means he might elude the suspicion of his parent, aged and blind, and confirm him in the assurance of his being his brother Esau, as he resembled him in every other particular instance. In this disguise, therefore, lest he should be surprised before Isaac had finished his prayer, and through detection of the imposition, incur a curse instead of procuring a blessing, he hastened to present what he had prepared to his sire. But the old man perceiving that his voice differed from that of his brother, desired his son to approach him. Jacob then putting forth his arms covered with the kid's skin, Isaac exclaimed, "Though thy voice be like unto Jacob, yet by the hairiness of thy arms thou seemest unto me to be Esau." Then without the least suspicion of deceit, as soon as he had eaten what was prepared, he thus invoked the God of heaven and earth. "Eternal, and supreme, and universal Creator, who to my father hast been pleased to promise, and on me to confer, many and important blessings, with assurance of continuing them to my posterity, let thy mercies be still extended towards me, nor let them depart from me in my present languid state, in which I most need thy Divine support. Vouchsafe to preserve this my son, protect him from evil, bless him according to thine abundant goodness, render him formidable to his enemies, and the joy and delight of his family and friends." Thus did the good old Isaac prefer his prayer to the Almighty, as he thought, in behalf of his favourite son Esau; but he had scarcely come to a conclusion when Esau returned from the hunt, which, though the father perceived, he knew his intention was frustrated, he passed unnoticed. The elder brother, thus disappointed, intreated a similar blessing with the younger; but his father denied him, alledging, that he could neither recal nor transfer the blessing given to Jacob; so that Esau had only to lament the severity of his fate. Isaac, moved by his tears, in order to console, assured him, that he and his posterity should excel in, and acquire vast renown from, personal strength, activity in hunting, and martial exercises, though he must ever act in subordination to his brother. Jacob, apprehensive of his brother's resentment, for having by stratagem supplanted him in so important a concern as his aged father's blessing, was freed from his fears by means of his mother, who prevailed on his father to send him into Mesopotamia, to select a wife from amongst her kindred: whilst Esau, conscious of having displeased his father in forming an alliance with the Canaanites, determined to make some reparation for his errors by marrying Bassamath the daughter of Ishmael, to whom he was in future more affectionately attached than to either of his other wives.

Gen. xxviii. 1, &c.

(a) This repast, or supper, he caught by hunting, was intended for a festival on a sacrifice; and Isaac expected that upon the prayers usual on those occasions, his son would be interested in the blessings supplicated for him. We find that after having, through deception, blessed Jacob, he attempts not to retract, conscious that the blessing came not from him, but from God, and that alteration was out of his power.

(b) Whether Jacob, or his mother Rebecca, were most to be censured for this imposition upon Isaac in his old age, is not easy to be determined. However, the blessing being delivered as a prediction of future events, and foretelling things to befall the posterity of Jacob and Esau in future ages, was certainly providential.

his family, he used the utmost precaution as indispensibly necessary for his security; insomuch, that he would not take up even a temporary residence amongst them, chusing rather to repose upon stones, as a pillow, under the canopy of heaven. One night as he slept in this manner, a vision represented to his imagination a ladder fixed on the earth, and reaching with its summit to heaven. On the steps descended certain beings, surpassing in form the ordinary part of mankind. At the upper extremity appeared the Almighty, who calling Jacob by his name, addressed him in words to the following purport. "Descendant of a pious father, and grandfather eminent for his exalted virtues, be not dismayed by dangers or difficulties that may now present themselves, but be encouraged by the prospect of my future favour and protection. I am He who conducted Abraham hither, when he was expelled Mesopotamia by his kindred; who crowned thy father with blessings, nor shall they be wanting to thee. Prosecute, therefore, thy journey under my immediate direction. The event of thy intended marriage shall be prosperous in numerous and virtuous offspring, to whom and their descendants I will give not only the possession of this land, but they shall increase the population of the whole earth, throughout every part to which the beams of the sun extend their genial influence. Proceed, then, with confident reliance on my guidance, and be assured of my continual assistance."

Animated by these great and important promises, which the Almighty was pleased to communicate to him in the vision, Jacob anointed the stones on which he had rested his head, while he received the happy tidings, and vowed, if he returned in safety, to sacrifice to God on that very spot, which he accordingly performed, by offering up a tenth part of all his substance. To perpetuate the remembrance of the place where the vision appeared to him, he called it Bethel, signifying, in the Hebrew, House of God.

Pursuing his journey, Jacob at length arrived at Haran; and meeting in the suburbs some shepherds and several young persons sitting on the bank of a fountain, joined, and requested them to let him drink. A conversation ensuing, he took an opportunity of making enquiry concerning one Laban, and was informed that the fame of Laban had long established his name, which was therefore well known throughout the country. They added that his daughter was expected there, being accustomed to feed her flock with them, and referred him to her for all the intelligence he wished to obtain.

Rachael at that instant appeared, and being made acquainted with the stranger's enquiries, indicated great complacency, asked him concerning his family and business, and discovered the utmost readiness to afford him her best information and assistance. Charmed by the beauty of her person, rather than attracted by the courtesy of her demeanour, or the alliance of kin, Jacob conceived the tenderest passion for the lovely maid, whom he thus addressed: "If, fair creature, thou art the daughter of Laban, our families were united by the ties both of consanguinity and friendship long previous to thine or my existence, Abraham, Arran, and Nachor, being the immediate offspring of Thares. Bethuel, thy grandfather, was Nachor's son; and Abraham, and Sarah, the daughter of Arran, were the parents of my father Isaac. But there is yet a nearer and dearer tie of affinity, for my mother, Rebecca, is thy father Laban's sister, by one and the same father and mother. The object of my journey, therefore, is to renew the ancient family league." The recital of these particulars recalling to her memory many circumstances she had heard from her father in her earliest years, respecting Rebecca, of whom she was assured her parents would gladly receive intelligence, moved an affectionate tear; so that having saluted the young man, she informed him, that nothing would more conduce to the happiness of her father and the whole family, than to receive tidings of his sister, and therefore defired him to accompany her home, that the good old man might no longer be deprived of so exquisite a gratification.

Jacob being introduced by Rachael to her father Laban, was acknowledged, and saluted as his relation, passed his time in social tranquillity, and contributed much to the domestic felicity of the family. In process of time, Laban having expressed the utmost satisfaction in the society of Jacob, discovered a desire of learning the motive which induced him to leave his parents in their advanced age, when they required his most unremitting attention, assuring him at the same time that nothing should be wanting on his part to promote the design and intention of his journey. Jacob then frankly disclosed the whole matter, informing him, "that Isaac had twin sons, Esau and himself; that as, by his mother's contrivance and assistance, he had deprived his brother of their father's intended (a) inheritance, Esau sought his life, having wrested from him his legal possessions, as well as the blessings for which his father imagined he had interceded in his behalf." He confessed that, with the advice of his mother, he had fled to him for refuge, and assured him that next to the care of Providence, he expected succour and assistance from one so nearly and dearly allied as himself.

Laban gave him the most solemn assurances of support and protection, not only on account of the alliance of their ancestors, but the cordial affection he entertained for his mother; in proof of which he appointed him overseer of his numerous flocks, and superintendent of all his shepherds, till such time as he should be desirous of returning home, when he would dismiss him with every token of respect that could bespeak a regard for his alliance.

Jacob expressed the highest sense of such singular proofs of esteem, professed himself bound to the best services of his liberal patron, as his supreme delight; but intimated that the only compensation he desired, was the bestowal in marriage of the beautiful Rachael, whose person and virtues were the objects of his admiration, and the spring of all his words and actions.

Jacob's ingenuous behaviour was highly pleasing to Laban, who readily consented to the marriage, preferring him to any other man as a son-in-law, but requested him to continue his abode with him some time, as he was rather disinclined to send his daughter amongst the Canaanites, having often repented his sister's forming an alliance in so remote a country.

Jacob readily acceded to the proposal, and entered into a covenant to serve his uncle seven years, expressing a satisfaction in having an opportunity of testifying his fidelity in such a manner as to prove himself worthy of the alliance.

The covenant was ratified, and being fulfilled, Laban prepared the nuptial feast; but night drawing on, he found means, without the suspicion of Jacob, to convey his other daughter, Leah, less beautiful and more advanced in years than Rachael, to the bridal bed. Jacob, through the deception of the night, and the insensibility of intoxication, had intercourse with her; but the return of morning discovering the delusion, Jacob reproached his uncle with the treachery of his behaviour, when he exculpated himself from any evil intention, by urging necessity as a plea, the custom of the country precluded the younger sister from marrying before the elder. He added that he should still possess Rachael, on condition that he would serve him the other seven years. Such was his passion, that he agreed to servitude for the same term as before; at the expiration of which his labours were compensated by receiving the object of his admiration as his own.

Their father appointed two handmaids to attend his daughters: Zilpah waited on Leah, and Billah on Rachael: these were not treated as slaves, but as subjects. The warmth of Jacob's affection for Rachael wounded Leah with jealous pangs; yet she consoled herself at intervals with hopes that if she should bear children, she might thereby conciliate his esteem, and therefore put up incessant prayers to God, that he would grant her issue. The event confirmed her hope; she brought forth a son, who being the means of restoring her husband's affection, was called REUBEN, or The Son of Vision, because she obtained him through the mercy of God.

She afterwards brought him three other sons; Simeon, implying, that God had heard her; Levy, meaning the Band of Society; and Judah, signifying Thanksgiving. Rachael, apprehensive that Leah's fruitfulness might supplant her in the esteem of her husband, caused her handmaid Billah to have intercourse with Jacob, by whom she conceived a son called Dan, or The Judgement of God; and after him another, named Naphtali, or Artifice; because she had recourse to subtilty to requite her sister's fruitfulness. Leah in resentment adopted the same stratagem against Rachael, and gave up her maid Zilpah to her husband, who by her had two sons; Gad, or Son of Chance; and Aser, or Blessed; because Leah was preferred for her fruitfulness.

Reuben, the eldest son of Leah, brought to his mother some apples of mandrake, which Rachael perceiving, she expressed a longing desire to taste the fruit. Leah churlishly denied her, alledging, that she ought to rest contented with the ascendancy she held in her husband's affection. To sooth her sister into compliance, and gratify her own inclination, Rachael told her she would resign Jacob to her that night; in consequence of which he had again children by Leah, viz. Issachar, or gained by Hire; and Zebulon, or Token of Good Will; and a daughter, called Dinah.

Rachael at length brought forth a son, who was called Joseph, or Addition. As Jacob had now served his father-in-law for the space of twenty years, he became desirous of returning with his wives to his own inheritance; but as he could by no means obtain Laban's consent, he determined to effect his flight by stratagem. To this purpose he founded the disposition of his wives, who both encouraged him in the attempt. Jacob departed, and took with him privately half Laban's flocks, while Rachael conveyed off her father's idols, not through any veneration, but she had been taught by Jacob the wickedness and absurdity of worshipping images, but thinking if Laban should pursue them, a reconciliation might be accomplished, by restoring them. She was accompanied in her flight by her sister, the four handmaids, and all their children.

Laban, on the first notice of their escape, pursued them with a strong party, intending to assault them, and in the evening of the seventh day overtook them as they were resting themselves on a rising ground. But Divine Providence interposing, he was forbidden in a vision to use violence either against Jacob or his daughters, assuring him that if from a presumption of the weakness of the inferior party he should dare to assail them, the Almighty would espouse their cause, and lift up his Omnipotent arm in their defence.

Laban, duly impressed with the Divine command, appointed a conference with Jacob the ensuing day; and having mentioned the particular circumstances of his dream, expostulated with him on the impropriety of his conduct in attempting to depart secretly from one, by whom, in a state of indigence, he had been so liberally supplied with every thing of which he stood in need. "I have (said Laban) given thee my daughters in marriage, hoping thereby to have confirmed our friendship; but you, on the contrary, regardless of your duty to your mother, to me, to your wives, or to your children, have treated me as an enemy, in ransacking my property, seducing my daughters to abandon their father, and carrying off my household gods, which I and my progenitors have held in such profound veneration. This is the treatment I have received at the hand, not of a professed enemy, but at the hand of a nearly allied relative, the son of my sister, the husband of my daughters, the covenanted friend of my bosom."

Jacob de-
conduct, and fallacy of Laban.

Jacob urged, in vindication of himself, that the love of his country was a passion common to mankind, and stamped as it were with the Divine Image on his mind; that it was therefore natural for him, after so long an absence, to feel a desire of returning: that with respect to the robbery of which he was accused, he had a right to the effects he had taken, as a compensation for his long servitude; and that his daughters had accompanied him in lawful obedience to the command of an husband, and from motives of an affectionate regard for their children. He proceeded to observe, by way of just reproach, that Laban, who was the brother of his mother, and who had given him his daughters in marriage, had subjected him by artifice to long and most laborious servitude, to toils, from which, had he borne him any resentment, he might long since have delivered himself. Laban had certainly dealt unjustly by Jacob; for perceiving that God was pleased to favour him with tokens of his protection and blessing, he promised him at one time all the whole cattle that should be produced in the year; and at another all the flock; but at the expiration of the respective terms, he refused to fulfil the agreement. Jacob gave him full liberty to search for the images, but Rachael had hidden them under her camel's saddle, and evaded the searching, by pretending to a periodical indisposition. A reconciliation now ensued, the terms of which were, that past injuries should be buried in oblivion, and that Jacob should love and cherish his daughters. They then entered into a solemn covenant, which was ratified on a mountain, where they erected a pillar in the form of an altar, stiling that spot and the surrounding country Galaad, or The Hill of Witness; which name it retains to this day. The treaty was succeeded by a festival, after which the parties set out for their respective habitations.

CHAP. XIX.

Jacob dispatches messengers to Esau, previous to his return. In a vision wrestles with an angel, and overcomes. Amicable interview with Esau.

DURING his journey to the land of Canaan, Jacob had many propitious visions; wherefore he named the place where they occurred, The Field of God. But still apprehensive of Esau's resentment, he dispatched messengers to discover the situation of affairs at home, and charged one of them with this intimation to his brother, "That having, on a former occasion, roused his indignation, he had chosen to abandon his country, and now hoped that time had erased former animosities. That he was upon his return, with his wives, his children, and the effects he had by his industry acquired; that he had sent some of the most valuable as a token of his submission, and would esteem it his greatest happiness to have the blessing God had imputed to him, with his beloved brother."

This frank and ingenuous behaviour was highly pleasing to Esau, who set forth at the head of four hundred armed men to meet his brother. Jacob was alarmed at the intelligence of the approach of a formidable body of men, yet fixing his confidence in the aid of Omnipotence, he determined to repel force by force; and dividing his company into two compact bodies, ordered one to advance, and act as occasion might require, and the other to proceed slowly in the rear, in order to sustain them in case of an assault.

Good effects of Jacob's sending messengers to his brother Esau.

Having taken such necessary precaution, he again sent messengers with presents to his brother. These consisted of curious animals, which marched in procession, the better to display their size, properties, and numbers, enhance their value, and thereby conciliate the esteem of his brother, to whom the messengers were charged to shew every token of respect and submission. The day being spent in making these dispositions, he caused his company to march by night; and when they had passed a brook called Jabboch, Jacob, who brought up the rear, had a vision, in which he seemed to wrestle with an angel, and came off victorious. The angel then addressed him, assuring him that his having atchieved so extraordinary a feat—that of overcoming an heavenly messenger, presaged much future success; that his posterity should be invincible, and conquer in all their enterprizes. He therefore enjoined him by the Divine direction, to assume in future the name of Israel, which, in the Hebrew, signifies struggling or resisting.

As

As Jacob had importuned a relation of his future fortune, he requested of the angel, when he became sensible of his Divine commission, to be explicit in every circumstance; which done, the vision disappeared. Jacob, animated by so joyful an event, named the place Phanuel, or The face of God. But one of the sinews of his thigh being strained in the contest, he ever after abstained from eating the hind part of any animal; a custom still observed by our nation.

On receiving intelligence of the approach of Esau and his company, Jacob ordered his wives and their attendants to keep at a distance from the main body, as a security for their persons, if there should be a necessity for coming to action.

When he perceived the pacific disposition of his brother, Jacob ran to him, and threw himself at his feet. Esau, on the other hand, cordially embraced him, kindly enquired after the welfare of his wives and children, and humanely offered to conduct them to his father. Jacob declined the offer, on pretence of the fatigues his cattle had sustained through a tedious journey, so that they separated for the present; his brother retiring to the town of Seir, so called from the thickness of Esau's hair; while Jacob repaired to a place called at this day The Tents, and from thence to Shechem, a city of the Canaanites.

CHAP. XX.

Violation of Dinah's chastity. Discovery of Laban's idols. Death of Rachael, and afterwards of Isaac.

THE inhabitants of Shechem were at this time engaged in the celebration of a festival; and Dinah, Jacob's only daughter, repaired thither, to gratify her curiosity, by observing the female customs and fashions of the country. Shechem seeing Dinah, and becoming enamoured of her beauty, first violated her chastity, which the more enflaming his passion, he asked permission of his father to take her to wife. The king not only complied with the prince's request, but made application himself to Jacob for his concurrence. The overture threw Jacob into the greatest perplexity; not daring, on the one hand, to dispute the authority of a monarch, nor deeming it lawful or expedient, on the other, to form an alliance with a stranger. He therefore evaded an explicit answer, and intreated time for mature deliberation. The king thereupon retired, hoping to obtain consent: Jacob immediately referred the matter to his sons, communicating to them, at the same time, the rape of their sister, and the request of Dinah, that she might be given in marriage to the prince his son. Those of them who were not immediately interested, were silent upon the occasion; but Simeon and Levi, descended from the same mother with the injured female, vowed revenge. The present season, being entirely devoted to festivity, was very proper for the execution of their design; so that the brothers, in the dead of the night, having first fallen upon and slain the guards, entered the city, and massacred all the males, (the king and his son amongst the rest,) but offered no violence to the women. Finding their sister, they conducted her home; and having discovered the transaction to their father, he was greatly displeased, and signified his disapprobation in the severest terms: but the Almighty was pleased to console him in a dream, and commanded him to perform the sacrifice he had vowed at the time he saw the vision in his journey to Mesopotamia. In making the necessary preparation for these solemn rites, he casually discovered Laban's idols, which Rachael had stolen, and concealed under an oak tree in Shechem, without his knowledge.

Taking his departure from thence, he offered an oblation to the Almighty in Bethel, on the very spot where he had seen the vision at the commencement of his journey into Mesopotamia. As he was pursuing his course in the land of Ephrata, Rachael, his wife, died in child-bed, and was there interred, being the only one of the family who had not a place in the sepulchre at Hebron. Jacob having made great lamentation for the loss of his beloved wife Rachael, called the child she bare on that melancholy occasion Benjamin, or the Son of Sorrow, from the mortal pangs his birth had given his mother. The children of Jacob were twelve sons and one daughter, of whom eight were legitimate; six by Leah, and two by Rachael; and two by each of their handmaids, whose names have been already mentioned.

From Ephrata Jacob returned to Hebron, the residence of his father Isaac, by whom he was informed of the death of his mother Rebecca, a short time before his arrival. Nor did the good old Isaac long survive his beloved consort, but paid the debt of nature soon after his return, and was buried by Jacob and Esau, near his progenitors, in the sepulchral tomb in Hebron. Isaac imitated the virtues of his pious father, and experienced the peculiar affection and favour of the Almighty on the demise of Abraham. After a life devoted to the honour of God, and the good of mankind, he closed a scene of transient existence, in the 185th year of his age, leaving an example worthy the imitation of posterity.

Esau and Jacob divide their inheritance, and quit their former places of residence. Esau sells his birthright, and is therefore called Edom. His progeny.

ON the demise of Isaac, his sons, Esau and Jacob, divided his inheritance, and, in consequence thereof, quitted their former habitations. Esau leaving the city of Hebron to his brother, took up his abode in Seir, and became chief of the country of Idumæa, called Edom from the name he himself acquired on the following singular occasion.

Returning on a certain time, during his juvenile days, from hunting, much oppressed with fatigue and hunger, and finding his brother preparing for himself some lentil-pottage, the colour of which being red, the more created his appetite, he earnestly requested that he might participate of his fare. But Jacob, availing himself of his brother's urgent necessity, peremptorily refused him, unless he would resign to him his birthright, to which Esau being stimulated by hunger, was constrained to accede, and the covenant of assignment was confirmed by a solemn oath. Hence his contemporaries called him in derision Edom, from the red hue of the pottage; for, in the Hebrew language, Edom signifies red. Hence also this country was denominated Edom; but the Greeks, for the sake of rendering the sound more agreeable to the ear, call it Idumæa.

Esau had five sons, of whom he had three by his wife Alibama, Jaus, Jolam, and Chore; by Ada, Alipazes, or Aliphates; and Mosametha, or Basematha, by Raguel. Aliphates had five legitimate children, Theman, Omer, Opheus, or Opher, Jotham, and Cenez, or Canaz. Amelech was illegitimate, being born of one of his concubines, whose name was Thesma. These inhabited that track of Idumæa called Gobolites, and another part named, from Amelech, Amelechitis. But Idumæa being a country of vast extent, retained its name in a general acceptance, though some particular provinces derived their appellations from their respective founders.

Esau sells his birthright, and is called Edom from the red pottage which was the price of it. Hence came the name of Idumæa.

Joseph incurs the envy and hatred of his brethren. His dreams. Interpretation of that respecting the sun, moon, and stars. His brethren conspire against his life.

JACOB having been peculiarly favoured by the Divine protection and blessing, and surpassing all the inhabitants of the country, not only in the number and virtue of his children, but also in opulence and dignity, became at once ■ object of reverential awe and rankling envy. His progeny were endowed with extraordinary mental and corporeal abilities, and equally adept in such exercises as required their respective exertions. Indeed the Almighty seemed so peculiarly to superintend his concerns in general, that events to human wisdom, apparently adverse, were, by an overseeing Providence, rendered subservient to his benefit, and that of his posterity, ■ is evident from our ancestors quitting the land of Egypt on the following occasion.

Joseph, the son of Rachael, from his mental and personal accomplishments, became the peculiar favourite of his father Jacob. This partiality, together with the dreams he had related, presaging his future success, naturally created the envy and hatred of his brethren; for it is a foible (not to call it a vice) too incidental to mankind to behold the prosperity of others with an eye of jealousy. The visions which roused such malevolent passions were these.

Being sent by his father with the rest of his brethren to work at the harvest, ■ vision appeared to him of so extraordinary ■ nature from dreams in general, that being induced to consult them on the occasion, he related to them the particulars. "Behold (said he) I saw last night in my sleep the sheaf of corn which I had bound, standing firm on the very spot where I had fixed it, and those of your binding moving towards it, in an inclining reverential posture." His brethren clearly inferred, from thence, that his future undertakings should be crowned with success, and that he should acquire power and superiority superiority over them; and though they concealed their opinions from Joseph, instantly conceived the most inveterate aversion for him, and concerted the means of averting events so mortifying to their own pride and ambition.

But it pleased God to render abortive all their malicious schemes, by causing a second and more extraordinary vision to appear unto Joseph. He beheld in his dream the sun, moon, and eleven of the stars, descend on the earth, and do him reverence. This vision Joseph revealed to his father in the presence of his brethren (without suspicion of incurring ill-will) who intreated him to explain the meaning. The dream afforded Jacob satisfaction, from revolving the circumstances in his mind, he perceived they presaged much good to his son: he thence inferred, that Joseph should be exalted to opulence and power, and should receive obedience from his father, mother, and brethren. The sun and moon seemed to him to represent the father and the mother, because the latter nourishes and increases all things, and from the former all things derive their form and force. The stars seemed to refer to his brethren, who were in number eleven, and derive their power from the sun and moon.

Jacob's interpretation seemed founded on probability, and therefore had a deeper effect on the minds of Joseph's brethren; for with respect to the blessings foretold, they considered him in the light of a stranger, not as a brother in whose success they would participate, and therefore formed a resolution of compassing his death.

Having concerted the means of accomplishing their horrid design, when the harvest was gathered in, they retired with their flocks into Shechem, a part of the country adapted to grazing, without giving their father any notice of their departure. Jacob receiving no intelligence respecting the state and condition of his flocks, and being also anxious for the welfare of his sons, sent Joseph to make the necessary enquiries, with orders to transmit him immediate information.

CHAP. III.

Joseph's brother Reuben conceals a scheme to save his life. He is sold to some Arabian merchants. Artifice used by his brethren to deceive their father, who bewails him as dead.

THE approach of Joseph was an event agreeable to his enraged brethren, not from motives of affection arising from the tie of consanguinity, but because they imagined it would afford them an opportunity of satiating their envy and malice by his immediate death, on which they had mutually resolved. But Reuben, the eldest, recoiling at so base a design, endeavoured to dissuade them from it, by representing its heinous and atrocious nature, and the universal detestation they would incur thereby. He enforced his advice, by observing, that if in the eye of God the murder even of a stranger in cool blood was a crime of the deepest dye, how aggravated and detestable must it be to embrace their hands in the blood of a brother, whose premature death would plant daggers in the breast of a doating father, and be to him a source of perpetual affliction. He proceeded to conjure them to desist from their wicked intention, to consider the consequences that must result from the murder of a person so justly admired for his mental and personal accomplishments, to dread the detection of such a crime, and the revenge of Omnipotence, and to remember that if they could be so abandoned as to perpetrate so horrid a deed, they would ever bear about them the intolerable load of conscious guilt, which would render them accursed beyond expression. He pleaded the innocence of the youth as an object of compassion, rather than malevolence; observed that envy being the motive, would be an aggravation of the offence, and contended lastly, that they would tempt the justice of God, and render themselves objects of his vengeance, by attempting the death of one so manifestly honoured with tokens of the Divine favour and protection.

By these and many other arguments did Reuben endeavour to divert his brethren from shedding the blood of the innocent youth; but finding that all his intreaties had no effect, nay, that they rather incensed than appeased, he had recourse to other means, and proposed, that as his death was irrevocably determined, they should mitigate its manner, and thereby in some degree exterminate its criminality, alledging, that rather than stain their hands with his blood, it would be more advisable to cast him into a pit, and there leave him to the chance of death. This proposal being generally approved, Reuben took Joseph, and binding him with a cord, let him gently down into a pit, and then went in quest of better pasturage for his cattle.

After the departure of Reuben, Judah, one of Jacob's sons, perceiving the approach of some Arabian merchants, who from Gilcad carry spices and other Syrian merchandize into Egypt, proposed to his brethren to sell Joseph to these adventurers, by which means they would be exempt from the imputation of being accessory to his death, which would then in all probability happen in a remote country. Having obtained their consent, Joseph was drawn out of the pit, and sold to these merchants for twenty pieces of silver, being at that time 17 years old.

Reuben, unacquainted with this circumstance, and determined at all events to preserve the life of his brother Joseph, came by night to the pit, and called upon him by name; but from his not answering, conjecturing that his brethren had put him to death, he reproached them bitterly, till he was appeased by their confession of the truth. After these transactions, the brothers consulted on the means of evading their father's suspicion, and concluded first to tear the coat of which they had stripped Joseph when they cast him into the pit, and then having stained it with goat's blood, to present it to their father as a token of his having been slain by wild beasts. This point adjusted, they returned to the old man (who by this time had heard some tidings of his son being lost, or sold captive) and presenting the coat rent and bloody, confirmed him in the belief of what they wished him to entertain, especially as they assured him they had neither seen their brother, nor knew what had befallen him, more than from the token of the coat they had found rent and bloody, from which they conjectured he had been slain by wild beasts. Jacob, hereupon, became inconsolable, covered himself with sackcloth according to the custom of the country, and notwithstanding all that could be offered to mitigate his grief, lamented the death of his son, as if confirmed by the most indubitable testimony.

CHAP. IV.

Joseph is sold by the merchants on their arrival in Egypt to Potiphar, one of king Pharaoh's household. He obtains the affections of his mistress. Rejects her caresses. Various seducing artifices without effect. Joseph is accused to Potiphar, and thrown into prison.

THE persecuted Joseph was afterwards sold by the merchants to Potiphar, an Egyptian officer, and steward of king Pharaoh's household, who held him in high estimation, caused him to be instructed in the liberal arts, and at length promoted him to the superintendence of the concerns of his family. In this elevated situation he maintained his integrity, and, by a conduct uniformly just and virtuous, demonstrated that his piety was genuine, equally proof against the allurements of prosperity, or the trials of adversity. In a short time the graces of his person, and the affability of his disposition, captivated the affection of his master's wife, who, from the attraction of her charms, and her exalted rank, presumed on his ready compliance with her desires as his highest honour and happiness. But herein she had respect to his station only, and not to his virtue, which so splendidly shone forth throughout the whole of his conduct.

At length she discovered her passion, and entreated a reciprocal return; but Joseph spurned at all her overtures, alledging, that after the singular favour he had obtained from his lord, it would be as impious as ungrateful thus to injure him in the tenderest point. He then exhorted her to restrain her inordinate desires, repeating the former asseveration, and adding, that he would rather subject himself to the severest lot, than by acquiescence participate in the complicated complicated guilt. This repulse inflamed her desire the more, so that she concerted another plan for accomplishing her design.

A solemn day of festivity approaching, on which, according to the Egyptian custom, the women were accustomed to deck themselves out in all their splendour, she excused herself from appearing on that occasion on pretence of indisposition, that she might have a convenient opportunity for a private assignation with Joseph. Succeeding thus far in her design, she accosted him in the most endearing terms, observing, that he would have acted becoming his duty, and consistently with his interest, in complying with her first solicitation: but that omission could be amply atoned by his then obedience. She added, that she now did him peculiar honour, as well as afforded him the most striking proof of her affectionate regard, in foregoing the grandeur and pleasures of a public festivity, for the enjoyment of his company and intercourse. She enforced her address by exhorting him to immediate compliance, and assuring him that if, to her favour, he preferred his own scrupulous delicacy, he would become the object of her most rancorous hatred; impelled by which, she would accuse him to Potiphar of an attempt upon her virtue, who would readily admit the truth of her allegation, and not fail of bringing him to the severest punishment.

Joseph's distinguished chastity.

But neither her caresses, her vows, her tears, nor her threatenings, could prevail on Joseph to violate his master's honour, by receding from his virtuous resolve. Nay, he even took upon him to admonish his mistress to due observance of the solemn rites of the marriage bed, which ought to be held sacred and inviolate, and should not be dispensed with on any pretence whatsoever. Inordinate gratifications, he added, were followed by repentance and shame; whereas conjugal fidelity brought with it the reward of a good conscience, and the approbation of the virtuous; and inferred, from the whole, that it was more praise-worthy in her to exercise command over him a servant, than debase herself, by alluring him to the commission of a crime, which would so flagrantly redound to their mutual disgrace.

By these, and other arguments equally powerful, did Joseph still endeavour to abate the violence of his mistress's passion, and reclaim her from her criminal intention; but they produced a contrary effect; for his persuasions to chastity served only to inflame her desire; till at length she endeavoured to effect that compliance by force, which she could not obtain by the most flattering blandishments.

Lost to all sense of shame, she seized and held him by his garment, till the youth was under a necessity of leaving a part behind him, in order to extricate himself, and flee from her enchanting embraces. Fired by a repulse on the one hand, and impelled by fear of detection on the other, she determined to shield herself under a malicious accusation, as well as by that means to avenge herself on Joseph, for the supposed indignity he had offered her. She therefore assumed the guise of grief and indignation, excited by an attempt on her honour and chastity, which Potiphar perceiving on his return, afforded her an opportunity, on his enquiring into the cause, of addressing him in terms to the following purport:

He is accused to Potiphar, by his mistress, of having attempted to violate her chastity.

"Thou deservest no longer from me a return of conjugal affection, if thou dost not rigorously punish that audacious slave, who has attempted to violate the honour of thy bed; who, unmindful of every tie of duty and of gratitude, has endeavoured to injure thee in the tenderest point; and that too in thine absence, and on a day of festivity. Hence it is manifest, that his apparent modesty is founded on the deepest dissimulation, and that the favours you have conferred upon him have emboldened him to arrogate a claim even to the possession of thy wife."

To enforce this address, and confirm her husband in the belief of it, she produced the tattered remnant of his garment, which, as she declared, he left behind him, after a struggle to violate her chastity. Potiphar, affected by this declaration of his wife, accompanied with tears, and fired with resentment against Joseph, committed him, without enquiring into the merits of the cause, to prison, amongst the common malefactors: while he applauded the chastity of his wife, thus confirmed and approved, as he imagined, by the clearest evidence.

CHAP. V.

Joseph conciliates esteem in the prison. Expounds the king's butler and baker's dreams. Explains Pharaoh's dream concerning the famine. Is released from prison, and promoted to the highest dignities.

SUPPORTED by conscious innocence, Joseph did not attempt to exculpate himself, but patiently submitted himself to imprisonment, placing his sole reliance on the interposition of Divine Providence. Nor was he frustrated in his dependence: for in a short time the keeper of the prison, attracted by the courtesy of his behaviour, not only freed him from fetters, but shewed him singular marks of indulgence, and thereby alleviated the punishment of being confined. The prisoners, as was common in their circumstances, conferring together during their intervals of suspension from labour, on the causes of their commitments, and other topics, Joseph, by those means, became familiar with one who had been king Pharaoh's butler, once high in favour, but now, from some particular disgust of that monarch, cast into prison. This person, observing, in the course of conversation, that Joseph possessed uncommon penetration, related to him a dream, and requested an interpretation, lamenting, an aggravation of the misfortunes fallen upon him, from having incurred his sovereign's displeasure, his perplexity arising from dreams, which constantly disturbed his repose. He informed Joseph, that, in his sleep, he saw three clusters of grapes, perfectly ripe, hanging from as many vine-branches; that having pressed the juice of the fruit into a vessel, which the king held for that purpose, his majesty drank, and was abundantly satisfied.

The confines of a prison cannot obscure the virtues and abilities of Joseph.

Gen. xl. 1, &c. The king's butler relates an extraordinary dream to Joseph, who expounds it to him.

The butler having thus related his dream, and repeated his desire of an explanation, Joseph bade him take courage, as within the space of three days he should be released from prison, and restored to the king's favour and service. The juice of the vine (said the interpreter) was given for the use and delight of mankind; the moderate and discreet use of it cements friendship, banishes anger, dissipates care, and disposes to complacency of mind. The king's receiving the wine favourably, which you had pressed from the three clusters, presages good, and indicates your deliverance within the three days represented by those distinct clusters. When you find my prediction fulfilled in the obtaining your liberty, let not it (said he) erase from your memory the bondage of your late fellow prisoners. It is not through guilt I thus suffer, but through an inflexible adherence to, and regard for, my master's honour, in preference to the gratification of my mistress's desires and my own emolument. Happy in this interpretation of his dream, the butler, with longing expectation, waited the event.

There happened to be at the same time in the prison another of the king's servants, who had been the chief baker, till, like the butler, he had incurred his displeasure, and became subject to the same punishment. Encouraged by Joseph's late interpretation, this man requested of him the explanation of a dream he had the night past, which he thus related. "I imagined, in my sleep, (said he,) I carried on my head three baskets, two of which were filled with bread, and the other with the choicest viands, prepared for the king's table; but the birds of the air hovered round me as I passed in spite of all my endeavours, and devoured the contents of the whole." This said, he expected a preface favourable as the former: but Joseph, having attended to the particulars, and premised that he could have wished to have been the harbinger of more welcome news, ingenuously assured him that he had only two days to live, for that on the third day he should be hanged, and exposed to the prey of those birds he could not drive from the basket of provision. Joseph's predictions were fully verified; for the third day, from that time, being the anniversary of Pharaoh's nativity, he ordered the baker to be hanged, and the butler to be restored to his former office.

Joseph had now lain two years in prison, unassisted in any degree by the ungrateful butler, when the following singular interposition of Providence procured him his liberty.

King

Gen. xli. 1, &c. Joseph, at the interposition of the butler, is delivered out of prison, after a confinement of two years.

Pharaoh relates to Joseph his prophetic dreams.

Joseph interprets the king's dreams of the lean kine, and the withered ears of corn, as preceding the long famine that happened in Egypt.

Give the king counsel how to preserve Egypt from destruction.

King Pharaoh having in one night had two dreams, which he conceived imported him evil, (though the interpretation that had been given of them at the same time had slipt his memory,) early in the morning summoned several of the Egyptian sages, and required of them an explanation. Their hesitation indicating doubt or inability, increased his anxiety, which the butler observing, and Joseph's expertness in such matters occurring to his mind, he immediately repaired to his master, and informed him of the singular manner in which his predictions, from the circumstances of his own dream, and that of the baker, had been respectively verified. He further represented to the king, that he had been formerly servant to Potiphar, treasurer of his household, and that, from his own account, he was an Hebrew, descended from honourable parents. Animated by this intelligence of the ability of Joseph, the king immediately sent for him into the royal presence, courteously took him by the hand, and thus addressed him. "I understand, by one of my attendants, that thou art remarkably expert in interpreting of dreams, of which thou hast given him a singular instance: reveal, therefore, unto me my dreams in the same manner as thou didst unto him; but do not exaggerate or extenuate any circumstance, from motives either of fear or flattery, but speak the truth plainly and impartially. In my sleep I fancied I was walking by the side of a river, (a,) and that I saw seven large and fat oxen, which went from the river towards a pasture: after which I saw seven lean meagre oxen, which seemed to come from the pasture towards the river, and, meeting the fat cattle in the way, devoured them, without any apparent increase in their own bulk. Upon this I awoke, and, as I was reflecting on the nature and import of my dream, fell insensibly asleep again, and saw a vision more extraordinary, and which affects me more than the former. I beheld, as it were, seven ears of corn spring out of one stem, which were so weighty with the grain they bore, that their heads inclined to the earth. Afterwards there appeared seven other ears, scanty and bare of grain, which, to my astonishment, devoured the former."

Joseph then informed the king, that one interpretation would suffice for both dreams. "The fat and lean oxen, and the full and scanty ears of corn, portended, that seven years of plenty would be immediately succeeded by as many years of famine, so that the abundance of the first seven years would not be adequate to the demands of the ensuing dearth, represented by the lean cattle devouring the fat, and the scanty ears of grain swallowing the full." He added, "that the Almighty was pleased to afford such intimations, not to terrify his creatures, but in order that they might provide for extremities, and alleviate distresses through prudence and forecast, and requested the king to make a due application of his remarks, as the most effectual means of averting the calamities which would otherwise ensue from so long a series of famine." The king, charmed with the sagacity of Joseph in the exposition of his dreams, requested his advice with respect to the precaution necessary to be taken, in order to guard against the impending calamity. He immediately recommended the strictest parsimony, and the retrenchment of all superfluity, in order to furnish a reserve for future exigencies; also that a number of magazines should be amply stocked, out of which the people should be supplied with no more than was barely sufficient for present subsistence.

(a) The river here alluded to was the Nile, so much celebrated in ancient history. This river has its rise in Numidia, and after running many miles northward, through a country scorched with the violent heat of the sun, enters Upper Egypt with great force, and passes over a cataract or broken rock. From hence it continues its course still north, and, receiving the addition of many other rivers, falls over another cataract, and then continues its course to the Lower Egypt far the Grand Cairo; after which it divides itself into three branches, in the form of a triangle, and then empties itself into the Mediterranean Sea. Once every year it overflows the greater part of Lower Egypt, and from that proceeds either scarcity or plenty. If the water rises too high scarcity ensues, because it lies too long on the ground; and if too low, then there is not a sufficiency to fertilize the soil.

No. 3.

Pharaoh was so struck with admiration at the extraordinary wisdom of Joseph in these important concerns, that he made him superintendant of his stores, with full authority to proceed in such manner as might appear to him most conducive to promote the general good; observing, that no man was so proper to put in execution a plan of public utility as the author. Being thus vested with authority, and all its splendid appendages, Joseph proceeded to the execution of his plan, making a tour in a chariot of state throughout Egypt, depositing the grain in the king's magazines, and distributing only what was necessary for a present supply, without assigning to any man the cause of his proceedings.

CHAP. VI.

Joseph forms an honourable alliance. The famine. His brethren arrive in Egypt. Art practised on his brethren. Supplies them with grain, and dismisses them home for their brother Benjamin.

AT the time of this distinguished prosperity Joseph was about thirty years of age, when, as a singular mark of his wisdom, the king called him by a name which, in the Egyptian language, signifies, A Discoverer of hidden things. He also, at the instigation of his sovereign, formed an alliance equally honourable and advantageous, by marrying the daughter of Potiphar, (b,) the priest of On, (c,) or Heliopolis, who brought him two children previous to the famine; Manasses, or Oblivion, alluding to his late miseries; and Ephraim, or Restitution, referring to his exalted situation at the time of his birth.

The years of plenty being expired according to Joseph's prediction, the famine began to rage, inasmuch that the multitude, sorely oppressed, repaired in crowds to the stores and magazines of the king. Being referred to Joseph, for redress, he supplied their wants with such discretion, and at the same time with such competency, that he acquired the venerable appellation of Saviour of the People. Indeed he had respect not only to natives, but foreigners, on the sublime principle of universal philanthropy, which naturally produces universal benevolence.

The famine not being confined to Egypt alone, but raging in Canaan, and, indeed, throughout the greatest part of the continent, Jacob, being informed that strangers were permitted to purchase grain in Egypt, deputed all his sons, Benjamin (who was born of Rachael, and brother on both sides to Joseph) excepted, with an especial commission to provide for his family. Upon their arrival in Egypt, the ten brethren applied, in the most submissive terms, to Joseph, intreating permission to purchase grain; being informed that their reception at court depended on the deference shewn to the king's dignified favourite. Joseph recognized them at the first glance, though they had not the smallest recollection of him. He therefore determined to put them to a severe trial, in order to sound their dispositions and intentions. To effect this, he not only refused them his permission to purchase grain, but ordered them to be apprehended as spies; alledging, that they appeared to him to be of different births, though they pretended to be kindred, as it was highly improbable that an individual subject should have so numerous and comely a progeny; a blessing rarely accorded to kings. This insinuation was to draw from his brethren the precise situation of his family, and particularly of his brother Benjamin, as he was apprehensive that youth had been exposed to the same treatment from them with himself. They were much alarmed at this stern and distant reception, as well as apprehensive that the design of their journey would be defeated, till at length Reuben, the eldest, undertook to plead the common cause, in terms to the following effect. "We come not hither (said he) as spies to annoy his majesty's subjects, but as constrained by dire necessity, to purchase corn for the subsistence of our family, at the hands of those who have signalized their humanity, not only in supplying natives, but opening a trade to strangers in general. That we are brothers, it is presumed, must appear from the similitude of our features. Our father, Jacob, is an Hebrew by birth; and we were in all twelve sons, born to him by four women. While they all lived, prosperity attended our family; but when our brother Joseph was taken from us, our calamities accumulated. Our father still laments his loss, and his sorrows render us inconsolable, as we were when mischance first deprived us of our dearest brother. During our absence on this commission, the care of our aged parent devolves on our youngest brother Benjamin. If you are still dubious of our sincerity, you have only to dispatch a messenger to our father's house."

(b) This is a different person from him who was captain of the guard, and was in a different quality; and therefore, as the learned Vossius justly observes, there is no reason, from the similarity of names, to think that Joseph married the daughter of him who had been his master; for he would certainly have abhorred an alliance with one that was born of so lewd a woman as his mistress.

(c) On was a famous city in Egypt, situated between the Nile and the Arabian Gulph, about twenty miles from Memphis, the metropolis of the kingdom. Here was celebrated an annual festival in honour of the sun, from which it was afterwards called Heliopolis. The word we translate priest, may signify one who ministers at the altar, or one who governs in civil affairs. Priests were antiently the chief men of the kingdom; for kings themselves were priests.

Gen. xli. 46, &c. Joseph, at 30 years of age, made director of the affairs of Egypt.

Reuben's eloquent apology.

The other brethren are sent to fetch Benjamin, but Simeon is retained as a pledge of their return.

Joseph, being thus assured of the welfare both of his father and his brother Benjamin, committed them to close custody for further examination. Summoning them before him at the expiration of three days, he thus addressed them: "Since ye affirm that ye came not hither as spies, or to annoy his majesty's subjects, and aver that ye are brethren, and the sons of Jacob, to convince me of the truth of your assertions, let one remain here as a pledge of the integrity of all. The rest shall be supplied with corn, and permitted to go to Canaan, but under this positive injunction, that they bring back with them their youngest brother, Benjamin, as the surest test of their probity. You may be assured that the hostage who remains shall experience the kindest treatment."

Alarmed at this proposition, and dreading the extreme calamity approaching, as another instance of the Divine vengeance for their cruelty to their brother Joseph, they melted into tears: but Reuben reprehended their unseasonable repentance, and recommended to them a patient submission to the Divine will. This conversation passed in the Hebrew tongue, which they supposed none of the bystanders understood: but Joseph was so affected by the scene, that he thought it expedient to retire, lest he should be discovered by his sensibility. On his return, however, he selected Simeon (a) as his hostage; then gave them permission to purchase what grain they required; and having previously commanded his servants to put every man's money into the mouth of his sack, issued orders for their departure.

THE brethren proceeded to Canaan, and, on their arrival, related to their father the singular events which had befallen them in Egypt; particularly that they had been taken for spies, and impostors in their pretence to affinity of blood, inasmuch, that, at the special requisition of the governor, Simeon was left behind as an hostage, till their return with their brother Benjamin should confirm the truth of what they

(a) It is particularly assigned as a reason why Simeon was selected from the rest of his brethren as Joseph's prisoner, that he was one of the most inveterate of all his brethren against him.

(b) It was the custom among the ancients for all the provision to be placed on one table, and the matter of the feast to distribute to every one his portion. Joseph certainly did this, not only to shew his particular regard to Benjamin, but also to observe whether the rest would look upon their younger brother with the same envious eye as they had formerly done upon himaverred. They therefore intreated Jacob to consent to their younger brother's departure with them, as a matter of indispensable necessity. The old man was much dissatisfied with the conduct of his sons, and greatly affected by the loss of Simeon; but became inconsolable at the thought of resigning Benjamin, whom he prized dearer than life: nor could Reuben, with all his solicitations, enforced by offering his own children as pledges for the security of Benjamin, obtain his consent. In this state of confusion their anxiety was increased on discovering the money they had paid for the grain enclosed in their sacks. When their provision began to fail, and famine to stare them in the face, Jacob was induced to deliberate on the injunction his sons had received of bringing with them their brother Benjamin, without whom they dared not, on their peril, to return to Egypt; but still inclining to hesitate at parting with his best beloved, Judah, of a temper more vehement and resolute than the rest, thus addressed his father on the pressing occasion. "You are too anxiously, as well as partially, solicitous for the safety of Benjamin, whom nothing can befall, either at home or abroad, without the interference of Divine Providence. Do you not hazard the loss of your own and our lives through famine, and also leave our brother Simeon in a most perilous situation, in thus hesitating to comply with what is so indispensably necessary for the preservation of us all? Resign, therefore, your son to the care and protection of the Almighty, and rest assured that I will either restore him to you in safety, or perish myself in the attempt."

Jacob, being at length wrought into a compliance, delivered up Benjamin to his brethren, together with a double portion of money for the purchase of the grain, and the choicest produce of Canaan, such as balm, myrrh, turpentine, and honey, as presents for the governor. The separation was mutually affecting; the father being anxious for the welfare of his sons, and the sons apprehensive that their departure and absence might put a period to their father's existence before their return.

Upon their arrival in Egypt they repaired to Joseph, and, lest they should be accused of having fraudulently conveyed away with them the purchase money for the former portion of grain, represented to the steward, that, without their privacy, the money had been put into their sacks, which, as bound in duty, they now brought back with them on their return. The steward disclaimed any knowledge of the matter; so that they were not only freed from anxious apprehension, but greatly encouraged in their expectations, by Simeon's being set at full liberty, and thereby having the opportunity of constant intercourse with them. As soon as Joseph returned from attending on the king, they presented their respective gifts, and he was made happy in hearing, on enquiry, of the welfare of his father; but when he beheld Benjamin, and the brethren replied in the affirmative, on his asking, Is this your youngest brother? he could not refrain from exclaiming, "The providence of God directeth all things," which having pronounced, such was his agitation of mind, that he withdrew, lest his tears should betray him to his brethren. In the evening he invited them to a banquet, and causing them to be placed in the same order as they were wont to be at their father's table, treated them courteously; but discovered a particular attachment to Benjamin, in allotting him a double portion of whatever was served up, (b).

During the time of repose, after the banquet, he ordered every man's sack to be filled, and the money to be deposited as before; but the steward was directed to convey into Benjamin's sack the goblet, out of which the governor himself usually drank. This self. The custom of allotting the largest portion at the banquets of the ancients to any particular person, by way of preference, was practised in Homer's days, as appears from Agamemnon's speech to Idomeneus:

was done in order to put to the test the affection of his brethren for Benjamin, in standing by him in case of an accusation of theft, or to detect their hypocritical collusion in deserting, and leaving him to be punished as a malefactor, and returning to their father unconcerned at the event.

The necessary preparations being made, according to Joseph's orders, they set out on their journey early in the morning, rejoicing in the view of restoring both Simeon and Benjamin to the arms of their aged, doating parent: but their joy was soon damped, by being suddenly overtaken, and assaulted, by a troop of horsemen, amongst whom was the party who conveyed the goblet into Benjamin's sack. Reproaching the soldiers with violating the laws of hospitality, by so sudden a reverse of behaviour, they were loaded by them with the severest invectives for returning evil for good, and trespassing on the humanity of the governor, in the commission of a theft, which, however they might have concealed from the observation of the officer who attended at table, they could not hide from God's all-seeing eye; and demanded how they could be so stupidly insensible, as to indulge a hope of escaping the punishment due to so flagrant a crime?

In this manner were they reviled and tormented by the Egyptians; whilst, armed with conscious innocence, they expressed the greatest surprize that even a suspicion should be entertained of their integrity, after having offered to restore the money formerly deposited in their sacks, without, at least, the confessed privacy of any person whatever; and this they repeatedly alledged to invalidate the accusation.

To give, however, their assailants ample satisfaction, they desired them to search their sacks, subjecting themselves individually to condign punishment, if any one of them was proved guilty of the theft with which they were charged. The proposal was agreed to, with this exception, that punishment should only be inflicted on the guilty. They then proceeded to the search, and making the scrutiny according to seniority, they at last came to Benjamin's sack, where, according to their previous knowledge, the goblet of course was found. The rest being exculpated, and assured of the integrity of Benjamin, were upbraiding their pursuers for detaining them so long from their journey, at the very instant the goblet was found in his sack, a circumstance equally surprising and afflictive, from the consideration of their brother's being exposed to immediate death, and their consequent inability of producing him, according to solemn promise, to their father, on their return. To aggravate their grief, this calamity befel them when they least suspected it; nor could they but consider themselves, from their pressing importunity with their father to consent to Benjamin's departure, as the authors of these remediless evils.

The Egyptians having secured Benjamin, conducted him, accompanied by his sorrowful brothers, unto Joseph, who, to carry on the design, thus sternly upbraided them: "Basest of men, (said he,) is it thus you acknowledge the bounty of Providence, or requite my hospitality, in so glaring an instance of injustice and ingratitude?" They all mournfully replied, they were really ready to suffer in the place of Benjamin, reproaching themselves, at the same time, in their own language, with their treatment of Joseph, who was happy, (if dead,) in being exempt from the casualties incidental to human life, and inferring, (if living,) that the Almighty had inflicted this punishment on them for his sake. Reuben also awakened in their minds a most poignant sense of their cruel behaviour towards their virtuous and innocent brother.

Joseph then dismissed them all as exculpated, the convict Benjamin excepted, declaring, that as he could not conscientiously punish the innocent for the guilty, or release the guilty at the requisition of the innocent, he should therefore only detain Benjamin, and desired that the rest might depart in peace, assuring them of safe conduct in their way. Equally alarmed and affected by these expressions, they stood, as it were, speechless. Judah, who had before signalled himself in the very occasion of prevailing with his father to send Benjamin with them, thus replied, in the name of the rest:

"We acknowledge, my Lord, that the crime of which our youngest brother stands guilty, merits the severest punishment; and should absolutely despair of his life, were it not for the proofs we have had of your clemency and goodness. Suffer yourself, therefore, to be actuated in this matter, not by the rigid maxims of distributive justice, but by that god-like benevolence which so eminently adorns your character. Let not those perils who throw themselves on your mercy; and as you have delivered us from the famine, the most horrid of deaths, by a liberal supply of our wants, deign to extend your compassion, and spare the lives you vouchsafed to preserve. By these means (as preserving and sparing life are equally objects of mercy) your goodness will be enhanced; and to you we shall stand indebted, not only for the means of subsistence, but for existence itself. It seems that the Wise Disposer of Events has now afforded you a singular opportunity for the display of that most amiable of virtues, the pardon of an injury: let it be known then, that you are as humane as liberal; as merciful as charitable. It is praise-worthy to relieve the distressed of the indigent; but exalted characters display a clemency almost divine, when they remit punishment to offences committed against themselves. I am induced to be thus importunate, from a consciousness of our father's inconsolable grief for the fate of our brother Benjamin, as well as a desire of your adding to the honours you have already acquired. Our own lives we consider of little moment, and would willingly resign them, were it not for the anxiety our deaths would surely give an aged parent. For his sake, not our own; for the sake of a father eminent for his piety and virtue, and to avert the miseries our punishment must inevitably entail on him, we are now your humble supplicants. The tidings of our fate, with the infamy of the cause, would put a period to his existence. Let lenity, then, for our venerable parent plead in our favour. It is yours either to take or spare our lives. Pronounce the pardon, and live long to reap the reward of conscious goodness, of imitating the brightest of all the Divine Perfections: to shall the Almighty and Universal Father crown you with numberless blessings, for compassionating the case of the aged Jacob. In pardoning our brother, you give life to us all; inasmuch as our lives depend upon his. We cannot return to our father but with Benjamin. If you remain inexorable, we only request to be included in the punishment, as if we had been accomplices in the guilt; a more eligible death than, in consequence of the loss of our brother, laying violent hands on ourselves. I here might plead his youth and want of experience, but these considerations your candour will suggest: so that I will close the address I have the honour to prefer, with shewing, that, whether we are condemned through the inability of the advocate, or absolved through the spontaneous clemency of the judge, the merit will be wholly yours. If, after all, my Lord, you adjudge him to death, admit me as his substitute, and vicarious victim; but if you are pleased to sentence him to slavery, I offer myself in his place to bear the severest hardships, (a)."

Judah and his brethren now fell prostrate at the feet of Joseph, (b) whose feelings were so strongly impressed, that, having dismissed his attendants, he thus disclosed himself:

"I cannot but applaud the affection you have shewn for your brother Benjamin, especially as, upon former occasions, you have been so much wanting in fraternal regard for me. In this instance I have put your disposition to the test, and, from your present behaviour, am disposed to impute the evils which, through your proceedings, befell me, to the will of God, for wise and gracious purposes. The information I receive of my father's welfare, together with the manifest proofs of your ardent affection for my youngest brother, afford me the supremest pleasure; so that I blot from my re-

This happened in the second year of the famine.

The Israelites go back to their father with royal presents in their hands.

Stung with remorse at their former treatment of so affectionate a brother, tears suppressed their verbal acknowledgement of his extraordinary goodness. Joseph, however, cordially embraced, and prepared for them a magnificent entertainment; after which they were honoured with tokens of the royal munificence, as presents for themselves, their father, and families; and then dismissed by Joseph, with many presents of fraternal regard; which was shewn to his youngest brother, Benjamin, in a most distinguished manner.

Gen. xlv. 1 to 34.

WHEN Jacob learnt from his sons, on their return, that Joseph was not only alive, but had attained to a degree of pre-eminence in Egypt next to the king himself, he returned unfeigned thanks to the Supreme Governor of the Universe for his infinite mercies towards him, after he had been tossed a long time to and fro on the billows of adversity, and then made the necessary preparations for paying him a visit.

When he came near the Well of the Covenant, he offered an oblation to God; but apprehensive that the fertility of the soil of Egypt might induce his posterity to fix their residence on that spot, by which means they would of course lose possession of the promised land of Canaan, he began to entertain doubts whether his proposed journey had the Divine sanction, and also whether his life should be prolonged to see his darling son Joseph, till it pleased the Almighty to give him an extraordinary manifestation of his Divine will.

Jacob seeks the Divine direction as to his journey into Egypt.

He is favoured with the Divine appearance.

One night on the journey he fell into a profound sleep, and being twice distinctly called on by name, and asking who it was that called him, he received from the Divine voice the following intimation: "Dost thou not know, O Jacob, that I am the God who protected thee and thy ancestors, who appeared for thee in all thy exigencies? who, contrary to thy father's intention, secured to thee thine inheritance? who brought about thy marriage in Mesopotamia, and effected thy return into thine own country, crowned with opulence and a numerous progeny? When Joseph, to all appearance, was lost, did I not raise him in Egypt to a dignity exalted next to that of the king? The design of my present appearance is, to direct thee in thy journey, and to foretell that thou shalt depart this life in the arms of thy son Joseph, and that your descendants shall become a mighty nation, and possess the land which I have promised them."

Animated by this vision, he prosecuted his journey into Egypt with greater alacrity, having with him his sons with their families, amounting to threescore and ten persons. Their names, on account of their harshness, I should have omitted, were it not necessary to mention them, in order to convince those to the contrary, who imagine that we are not Mesopotamians, but Egyptians.

The sons of Jacob were twelve, of whom Joseph went long before the rest into Egypt. The others are these, with their sons: Reuben, who had four sons, Hanoch, Phallu, Assaron, and Charmi. Simeon, who had six, Jamuel, Jamin, Ohad, Jachin, Zoar, and Shaul. Levi, who had three, Garson, Chaath, and Merari. Judah, who had also three, Salah, Pharez, and Zarah; and two grandsons by Phares, Efron and Amyr. Issachar, who had four, Thulas, Phuas, and Samaron. Zebulon, who had three, Saran, Elon, and Jalel. These were the children that Jacob had by Leah, who carried with her Dinah, her daughter; the number of whom, with their offspring and attendants, amounted to thirty-three persons. Jacob had, by Rachael, two sons, Joseph and Benjamin. From the former descended Manasses and Ephraim; from the latter, Bolau, Bacharis, Asabel, Gera, Naaman, Ies, Ros, Momphis, Opphis, and Arad, who, added to the other thirty-three, amount to the number of forty-seven.

The progeny of Jacob are enumerated.

These were the legitimate issue of Jacob. By Bilhah, his concubine, he had two sons, Dan and Naphthali. The former had only one son, Ussis; but the latter had four, Jesei, Guni, Issares, and Sellim, which, added to the above number, make fifty-four. By Zilpah, his other concubine, Jacob had two sons, Gad and Asser. The former had seven sons, Sophonias, Augis, Sunis, Azabon, Aerin, Eroed, and Ariel. The latter had one daughter, Sarah, and six sons, Jomnes, Isus, Isuis, Baris, Abar, and Melchiel, which sixteen, added to the former, amount to seventy persons, without including Jacob himself.

As they drew near their journey's end, Judah was dispatched to announce his father's approach unto Joseph, who immediately set out to meet him. The interview happened at a place called Heros, or Heliopolis, and was of so affecting a nature, that both father and son almost sunk under mutual transport.

Joseph desired his aged parent to proceed by slow and easy journeys, while he himself, taking five of his brethren, hastened to the king to pay their devoirs, before the arrival of the rest of the family in his dominions.

Affecting interview between Jacob and his son Joseph.

Pharaoh, pleased with the news, enquired of Joseph into the nature of their occupations, in order that he might assign them proper employment. He replied, that they had, in general, been trained to rural pursuits, and that the pastoral life was what they mostly affected. The design of this answer was, that, by living contiguously, they might be the better able to concur in their assiduities to their aged father; and also to suppress any envious emotions in the minds of the natives, that might arise from the family interfering with their professions, as the Egyptians had little or no knowledge of pasturage.

When Jacob was introduced to the king, and had paid his obedience with the usual formalities, Pharaoh courteously raised him, and enquired his age. Being answered one hundred and thirty, and expressing much surprise, Jacob gave him to understand, that the lives of his ancestors had been extended to a much greater length. The king then gave permission to him and his family to reside at Heliopolis.

As the earth received no moisture, either from the kindly rain of heaven, or the usual overflowing of the Nile, the famine raged, of course, with more severity, and horrid were the calamities thereby entailed. The situation of the poorer and common sort was piteous beyond description; for, having laid in but a very scanty store, and not being able to obtain a supply without ready money, when that was exhausted, they were reduced to the necessity of exchanging their cattle, slaves, lands, nay their last little all, to procure grain from the king's granaries, to protract a needy miserable life. When, by these means, they became totally destitute, they were abandoned to a desolate world, that the king might secure their bartered possessions: but the priests (a) were

The famine increases in Egypt.

(a) The Egyptian priests were the whole body of the nobility of the land. They were the king's counsellors, and (according to Diodorus Siculus) in some things his joint agents. They were the most learned body of the nation, particularly in astronomy. They also acted as magistrates, and filled the chief offices of state; for the original word equally signifies prince and priest. Hence we see the reason why Joseph did not purchase their lands, namely, from the greatness of their authority, which rendered their persons, and consequently their estates, too sacred to be taxed, or alienated to the crown. The king, during the famine, distributed to them provisions sufficient for their subsistence; so that they were not under the necessity of selling their lands.

exempted from this rigorous treatment, and permitted to continue in the possession of their landed property. Such, however, was the general calamity of the nation, that the minds and bodies of the people were affected to the greatest degree, and equally embarrassed to devise means of subsistence.

But when, at length, the river overflowed, watered the earth, revived drooping nature, and produced a fertile aspect, Joseph made the tour of the kingdom, and summoning the respective landholders, restored to them such parts as they had sold to the king, on condition of their paying a fifth, as tribute to him by virtue of his prerogative; and then enjoined them to the same diligence in their improvements, as if they were to derive the emoluments resulting from the whole.

Transported at the returning prospect of plenty, and the restitution of their landed property, the people applied themselves to agriculture with unremitting assiduity; so that, by this well-timed act of policy, Joseph established his own authority in Egypt, and increased the standing revenue of all its succeeding monarchs.

The good old Jacob, having resided with his family in Egypt seventeen years, at length expired in the presence of his sons, in the 147th year of his age. After commending them to the Divine blessing and protection, and prophesying that the posterity of each of them should hereafter possess a part of the land of Canaan, as well as bestowing the highest encomiums on Joseph, for his singular piety towards God, and parental and fraternal affection towards him and his brethren, he enjoined them to receive Joseph's sons Ephraim and Manasse into their number, and admit them to a participation of the land of Canaan, when it should be divided according to the Divine prediction. His last request was that he might be interred in Hebron.

Jacob, in piety and virtue, followed the example of his worthy progenitors, and was as eminently favoured by especial tokens of the Divine regard and protection. By the king's permission, Joseph caused his body to be conveyed to Hebron, and there interred him, with due honours, in the sepulchral tomb of his ancestors. When the funeral rites were performed, his brethren expressed much reluctance at returning to Egypt; still apprehensive, from conscious guilt, of Joseph's resentment, especially as they had lost their advocate in the death of their father; but he quieted their suspicions, brought them back, endowed them with large possessions, and continued to shew them every instance of brotherly kindness.

This eminent character paid the debt of nature when he had attained to the age of 110 years. Joseph possessed very singular and shining talents, equally adapted to acquire and maintain the highest preferments. The rest of the brethren lived with honour, and died in peace in Egypt, and were, at the respective periods of their demise, conveyed, by their surviving relatives, to Hebron, in order to be interred in the tomb of their ancestors. The bones of Joseph were afterwards conveyed by the Hebrews, on their departure out of Egypt, into Canaan, according to his own express injunction, (a). But of this, and other transactions relative to the Jewish nation, we shall treat in due order.

CHAPTER IX.

The Hebrews incur the envy of the Egyptians. Are subject to slavery for 400 years. Prophecy respecting Moses. Pharaoh's edict for the destruction of the male children of the Hebrews. Birth of Moses. His miraculous preservation. Adopted by Pharaoh's daughter.

THE Egyptians being addicted to luxury and effeminate pursuits, and of course averse to laborious exercises, it was natural for them to conceive an ill-will and hatred towards the Hebrews, who, by dint of industry, crowned with the Divine blessing, had rendered themselves a numerous and formidable people.

The advantages resulting from the political administration of Joseph being now forgotten, and the crown transferred to another line, it became the study and delight of the Egyptians to devise means for oppressing the Hebrews; such as cutting trenches for carrying off the river Nile in small streams, encompassing the city with walls, and raising fortifications and banks, to prevent any damage that might arise from inundations. The stupendous pyramids, monuments of Egyptian folly and vanity, which remain to this day, were raised by the art and labour of our nation, which was subjected to Egyptian vassalage for the space of 400 years.

In process of time an event occurred which exasperated them more against the Hebrews, for one of their scribes, or magi (to whose judgment and opinion the people in general paid a most implicit deference,) informing the king, that, about that period, an Hebrew male child would be born, who should humble the power of the Egyptians, and exalt that of the Israelites to so great a degree, as to acquire immortal honour, Pharaoh, alarmed at such intimation, instantly issued his royal edict, commanding that all male children, henceforward born to the Israelites, should be immediately cast into the river and drowned. He likewise commanded the Egyptian (b) midwives minutely to attend to the state of the pregnancy of the Hebrew women, and annexed the penalty of death to the whole family of such as should dare to attempt an evasion of the purport of the edict, by concealing the birth of any child.

The calamity of the Hebrews, on this occasion, was beyond description; not only as it subjected them to the loss of their children, and, in some degree, rendered them accessory to their deaths, but as it must eventually have tended to the extirpation of their race. Human efforts, however, opposed to the Divine will, must at length prove abortive. The Hebrew child, alluded to by the scribe, was born, and brought up, notwithstanding the terror of the edict, and the scrupulous investigation of the king's spies, and lived to fulfill what was predicted concerning him to the utmost extent.

Amram, an Hebrew of noble birth, anxious, at the last stage of his wife's pregnancy, both from motives of natural affection, and the loss the nation must sustain through want of male progeny, had recourse, by prayer, to the Father of Mercies, the all-wise God, that he would vouchsafe his protection to his long favoured people, and avert the impending ruin that threatened their nation.

The Almighty appeared to Amram in a dream, exhorting him to be of good courage, nor despair as to future events; for the piety of his ancestors being ever before him, he would, in due time, accomplish the deliverance of their descendants, as he had formerly interposed in their favour. He was pleased to remind him, that he had brought up Abraham alone out of Mesopotamia into Canaan, and there placed him in a blissful situation; that he had favoured him with a son by his wife, who had long been barren; that he had rendered his children rich and powerful, bestowing Arabia on Ishmael, on the sons of Chetura the country of the Troglodytes, and upon Isaac the land of Canaan; and that the name of Jacob had not only acquired renown amongst foreign nations for his personal achievements, and the immense possessions of his descendants, but that, from the inconsiderable number of 70 persons in family, who accompanied their father into Egypt, they were now increased to upwards of 60,000. He then assured him of his care and protection, both to the nation in general, and himself in particular, that the male child, whose life the Egyptians sought, should be born, elude their artifices, effect the deliverance of the Hebrews from their bondage, and obtain thereby an immortal name, not only amongst his own people, but throughout most distant realms; and lastly, that this victorious instrument should have not Israelites, which is highly probable, it not being easy to suppose that Pharaoh could trust to the Israelitish midwives to execute so barbarous a command against their own nation.

brother, who would fill the office of high priest with such dignity, as to render it perpetual in his family.

Amram relates his Divine revelation. The birth of Moses.

Amram revealed these particulars to his wife Jo-chabel, which, on the first reflection, rather increased their suspicions; not only with respect to the fate of the child in its infancy, but in advanced life. The manner of her delivery, however, soon confirmed the Divine intimation; for a gentle labour, unattended with the usual pains and exclamations, afforded an opportunity for eluding the vigilance of the spies; so that the infant was cherished at home three months without detection, till Amram, fearing the result of a discovery, determined to commit him to the care and protection of Divine Providence, rather than expose his life, and, indeed, the lives of the whole family, to continual danger.

Moses cast into the river.

Forming this resolution, they made a cradle (a) of wicker, and, after tempering it with pitch to keep out the water, placed the child therein, launched it into the stream, and committed him to the mercy of an over-ruling Providence. As it floated down the stream, Mariam, the child's sister, by command of the mother, walked on the opposite bank to watch the fate of its innocent, but precious inhabitant, when an event took place, that, amongst others, singularly manifested the superiority of Divine wisdom and power, and that the will of God must be accomplished in spite of all opposition.

Thermuthis the king's daughter discovers the infant, procures his mother for his nurse, and takes care of him as her own son.

It happened that Thermuthis, (b) the king's daughter, walking by the river side, observed the cradle floating with the stream, and ordered some of her attendants to bring it on shore. When it approached the bank, and the princess discovered the features of its beauteous inhabitant, she broke into a rhapsody of delight and complacency; for such were the personal attractions of this favourite of heaven, that even those, who, at his birth, appeared determined on his destruction, were, on beholding the serenity of his countenance, disposed to shew him favour and protection.

A woman, at the command of the princess, being brought to suckle the child, he rejected her breast, as he had those of several other Egyptian women; on which Mariam, who had now mixed with her retinue, representing the cause of disgust as arising from their being of another nation, and recommending an Hebrew nurse, the princess committed that branch of his nurture to her care, declaring an acquiescence in her choice. She therefore introduced the mother, unknown to any of the attendants, who, with the permission of the princess, both suckled him, and took care of his education.

To preserve the memory of the accident which befell this extraordinary person at his birth, he was called Moses, or Moyse, which, in the Egyptian language, signifies Water, and Yse served. Indeed he became, according to the Divine prediction, the most shining character that ever adorned the Hebrew nation. According to lineal descent he was the seventh from Abraham, being the son of Amram, who sprung from Caleb, whose father was Levi, the son of Jacob, who was born unto Isaac, the son of Abraham. In his childhood, he gave proofs of knowledge far superior to his years; and so eminent were his mental abilities, and personal attractions, that he became an object of admiration to all who beheld him. Thermuthis, therefore, having no issue, adopted him as her heir, and presented him to the king her father, with this address: "I have trained up an infant, as singular for his genius as the symmetry of his person; and having miraculously received him from the

The extraordinary mental and personal endowment of Moses.

(a) Though this cradle, or boat, is said to have been made with rushes, it is most probable that it was formed with flags of the tree papyrus, of which the Egyptians made their paper, and which grew particularly on the banks of the Nile. Clemens Alexandrinus expressly says, that the vessel was made of papyrus, the product of the country; and his assertion is confirmed by several other profane writers.

(b) Philo says that this princess was the king's only daughter; and that being some time married, without having issue, she pretended to be big with child, and to be delivered of Moses, whom she owned as her son. That he was esteemed so is evident from what the apostle to the Hebrews says, namely, "That when Moses was grown up, he scorned to be thought the son of Pharaoh's daughter. See Heb. xi. 24."

(c) Moses excelled in wisdom and conduct; Aaron, his brother, in eloquence. Such is the wise order of Providence, which

"river to which he was committed, am determined to adopt him as my son, and establish him as thy successor on the throne of Egypt." Having thus said, she conveyed him to the arms of her father, who, after many fond embraces, to conciliate the mind of his daughter, put the crown on the child's head; but Moses, with a look of contempt, snatched it from his head, cast it on the ground, and spurned it with his feet; an act supposed ominous to the state. The scribe, who, from his nativity, had predicted the decline of the Egyptian empire, recommended, from this event, his immediate destruction; observing, in most pointed terms, to the king, "that the prelude concerning this child was amply confirmed by the insult offered his dignity in spurning the crown, and that nothing but his death could deliver the Egyptians from the direst apprehensions, as well as disappoint the Hebrews in their towering expectations of his mighty achievements." But Thermuthis, to secure the life of her favourite, caused him to be conveyed off; nor did the king seem disposed to follow the advice of the scribe. Moses was therefore educated under the immediate care of the princess, and grew up the hope and glory of the Hebrews (c). Indeed the Egyptians themselves began to abate in their prejudices; and concluding, on mature reflection, that there was no apparent heir better qualified to promote the interest of the state, than the successor appointed by the king, desisted from their design on his life.

CHAP. X.

The Ethiopians make inroads on the Egyptians. Moses undertakes the conduct of the war. Obtains a victory over the Ethiopians. Invests Saba their metropolis. Marries Tharbis, the king's daughter, on condition of its being surrendered to the Egyptians.

AN opportunity soon offered for putting the wisdom, as well as prowess, of this extraordinary Hebrew to the severest test. The Ethiopians, who inhabited the lands that lay contiguous to Egypt, having made inroads into their country, committed depredations on the Egyptians, who, to retaliate the injuries they had sustained, levied an army, and marched against them; but victory declaring in favour of the plunderers, the Egyptians were under a necessity of making an ignominious retreat. Elated with success, the Ethiopians pursued their fortune, and determining to avail themselves of the advantages they had already obtained, entered the country, laid all waste before them, and meeting with no effectual opposition, extended their victorious arms towards Memphis and the sea, still encouraged in their ravages by the pusillanimity of the inhabitants, who tamely submitted to the most flagrant injuries.

In this perilous situation the Egyptians had recourse to the oracle, in order to obtain intimations of the means to extricate themselves from their present calamities. Being given to understand, "that they should make choice of an Hebrew to conduct the war," the king immediately dispatched his mandate to his daughter to deliver up Moses, in order that he might vest in him the command of the Egyptian army (d). Having exacted an oath from her father to secure the indemnity of his person, the princess delivered him up, esteeming it a fortunate event for Moses to be thus singled out for the defence of the country, as well as a just reproach on those scribes, in calling for the assistance of one, whom they adjudged to death, as a common enemy. has dispensed different gifts to different persons, that they may each be assisting to one another, and knit more firmly the band of society! Thus Polydamus, in Homer, Iiad 13, tells Hector, God gives to different men different accomplishments:

To some the powers of bloody war belong;
To some sweet music, and the charm of song;
To few, and wondrous few, has Jove assign'd
A wife, extensive, all-confiding mind.

POPE.

(d) The history of Moses, as General of the Egyptians against the Ethiopians, is not to be found in the sacred records, but is cited by Irenæus, who says, "that when Moses was nourished in the king's palace, he was appointed general of the army against the Ethiopians, and conquered them; when he married the king's daughter, because, out of her affection for him, she delivered the city up to him."

stance of the king and princess, cheerfully undertook the command, which gave much satisfaction to the priests of both nations: to those of the Egyptians, as they cherished a hope, that the conquest he might obtain over their enemies, would facilitate the means for dispatching him by guile; to those of the Hebrews, as if he proved able and expert in the manoeuvres of the field, he might deliver them from their tedious bondage.

Moses marches against the Ethiopians.

Moses, therefore, before the enemy was apprised of the appointment, mustered his forces, and led them, not along the banks of the river, but through the main land, in which he displayed a striking instance of military skill. Foreseeing that an inland march would expose the troops to great danger, from the multitude of serpents with which the country was infested, and which are of the most destructive and malignant kind, he had recourse, by way of prevention, to an admirable device. Having ordered some baskets to be prepared, in the shape of coffers, he filled them with certain birds, called Ibis, [Storks,] and ordered them to be carried as part of the baggage. These birds being mortal enemies to serpents, those reptiles ever seek to avoid them; but are sometimes overtaken in flight, when they infallibly become their prey. In other instances the birds are harmless and tractable; but, as the Greeks are acquainted with their species and instinct, a further description is unnecessary.

Obtains a complete victory.

On arrival, therefore, in that part of the country infested with these serpents, he caused the birds to be dispersed, thereby totally obviating the annoyance; and coming up with the Ethiopians, lulled in security, suddenly charged, routed them, and not only blasted their hopes of conquering Egypt, but retaliated amply on the foe the depredations and slaughter they had so lately experienced from them.

Elated also with success, under the conduct of Moses, the Egyptians pursued their conquests, especially as the enemy seemed driven to a state of despair, till at length, having followed them to Saba, their metropolis, (so called by Cambyfes Meroe, in honour of his sister,) they laid close siege to them in the garrison, whither they had betaken themselves for shelter. This place was deemed impregnable, being almost encompassed with the river Nile; and the rapid current of the rivers Astaphus and Astabora, on the other side, nearly stopping up the passage to it. Besides, it was environed with a very stout wall, between which and the rivers ramparts were erected; so that it seemed formed by nature and art to repel the most vigorous attack.

Tharbis, the king's daughter, delivers up Saba, and herself to Moses at the same time.

As the enemy would not face him in the open field, and his army was incompetent to the reduction of their city, Moses remained in a state of embarrassment, till relieved by an extraordinary incident. Tharbis, the daughter of the king of Ethiopia, struck with admiration of the military achievements and personal accomplishments of Moses, who, in so short a time, had reversed the fortunes of the Ethiopians and the Egyptians, became passionately enamoured of the young hero, and sent some of her suite to offer him her hand. Moses acceded to the proposal, on condition of the surrender of the city; solemnly promising to consummate the marriage as soon as the terms should be fulfilled; so that this point being settled, without delay, he fully accomplished the purport of his commission, celebrated his nuptials; and sent back the Egyptians to their own country.

CHAPTER XI.

The Egyptians seek the life of Moses, who flies into Midian. He is protected by Jethro, and marries his daughter.

THE Egyptians, notwithstanding the very important services they had so lately derived from Moses, in the total defeat of their Ethiopian enemies, could not suppress the envy and hatred they had imbibed; inasmuch, that, fearful he would assume too great a power, to the prejudice of their state, and the aggrandizement of his own people, they prosecuted their design of compassing his death. To this end, they accused him of murder before the king, who, indulging former suspicions, and prevailed on by a jealousy he entertained from his late acts of valour, as well as the instigation of all present, used that as a pretence to justify his mandate for causing him to be apprehended.

But Moses, apprised of their design, withdrew; and to elude the vigilance of the soldiers, who were posted in the roads to intercept him, directed his flight through the deserts, where he encountered the greatest difficulties with invincible fortitude and magnanimity. Arriving near a city of the Midians, which is situated upon the shore of the Red Sea, and takes its name from one of the sons of Abraham by Chetura, he sat down near a well to refresh himself after the fatigues of his journey; it being then about noon, and the city within sight. An incident afforded an opportunity of displaying his courage, and the improvement of his fortune.

Moses flies to the city of Midian.

A drought often prevailing in these climates, the shepherds are extremely anxious to reach the wells, in order to procure a sufficient supply of water for their own herds, lest they should be anticipated and deprived of it by others. To this well repaired seven virgin daughters of Raguel, otherwise Jethro, the priest, a man of respectable character. These daughters, according to the custom of the Troglodytes, having the care of their father's flocks, were busily employed in serving them, when they were rudely interrupted, and driven from the well, by some shepherds, that they might engross the water. Moses, incensed at a behaviour so unbecoming the male character, espoused the cause of the virgins, protected them from the assault of the shepherds, whom he drove from the spot, and thereby left the well free and unincumbered.

Deserves well of the daughters of Raguel, or Jethro.

On their return, the virgins, retaining a grateful sense of this signal interposition in their favour, related the circumstance to their father, and intreated him to shew some token of regard for the brave and resolute stranger, who had thus vindicated their right, when invaded by a number of dastardly males. The father commending his daughters' gratitude for their intrepid deliverer, sent for Moses, in order to confer on him a reward due to his merit. He attended, and was assured of the grateful sense his daughters entertained, both of his humanity and his courage. After passing many encomiums on his virtues, he added, that his good offices had not been shewn to such as were insensible of them, or incapable of rewarding them, and that he should soon meet with an adequate compensation. Soon after he adopted Moses as his son, gave him in marriage to his daughter Zipporah, and made him superintendant of his flocks; an honourable station in those days, when pasturage was the general source of wealth.

Jethro adopts Moses, and sets him over his flocks.

CHAPTER XII.

Divine appearance to Moses in the bush. His rod turned into a serpent. Divers miracles wrought to confirm the Israelites in their belief of God's promises.

MOSES, having received these honourable tokens at the hands of Jethro, resided with him as superintendant of his flocks. Happening to lead the cattle to a mountain, called Sinai, which, though abounding with the choicest herbage, and most commodiously situated for pasturage, had never been grazed upon, from an opinion which prevailed, that it was the peculiar residence of the Deity, an extraordinary prodigy appeared to him upon this spot. A flame of fire seemed to seize the whole substance of a bush, without affecting the verdure of the plant, the variegated colours of the flowers, or the fruit pendant from the branches. To add to his surprize and amazement, he heard a voice, issuing from the fire, call him distinctly by name, reprehend his audacity in daring to tread upon ground hitherto inviolate, and admonish him to depart, nor stay to indulge a criminal curiosity, lest, though he was a good and virtuous man, awful consequences might ensue. The same voice also assured him, that, through the Divine protection, he should attain to the highest honour and dignity amongst men; and commanded him to go boldly into Egypt, where he should be the guide and deliverer of the Hebrew nation from the usurpation and bondage of the Egyptians: for (continued the voice) they shall possess that fertile country once inhabited by your father Abraham, and, through your direction, enjoy the most important and invaluable blessings. It further commanded him him, that, having rescued the Hebrews from Egyptian bondage, an oblation should be offered on this very spot.

Such were the intimations communicated to Moses out of the flame, after which he thus expressed his wonder and adoration: "To distrust thy power, manifested to me and my ancestors, would, O Father of Mercies, be culpable in the highest degree; yet may I presume to express my doubts of my ability, through want of power of speech, to persuade my countrymen to leave the place they now inhabit, and follow me whither I am to conduct them; also, of the possibility of prevailing with Pharaoh to permit them to depart, as, through their toil and industry, the Egyptians daily increase in opulence."

The Almighty was then pleased to animate him with the promise of every necessary aid, whether of speech or action, for the accomplishment of the great and important purposes of his will; and, to confirm the same, ordered him to drop his staff upon the ground, which having done, a serpent crept upon the place, and, winding itself into a circular figure, erected his crest, as if in defiance of those who should assail him, and then resumed its former figure of a staff. He was then commanded to put his hand into his bosom, which having obeyed, he drew it out white as chalk, and soon after it recovered its natural colour. He was next commanded to draw water out of an adjoining well, and pour it on the ground, when it appeared of the colour of blood. Whilst he was lost in amazement at these wonders, he was exhorted to assume resolution, and assured that he should meet with such aid as should enable him to overcome every difficulty. He was also enjoined to display these signs in the face of men, to establish them in a belief that he executed the Divine commands at the Divine will, and by the Divine power and authority. The voice commanded him to hasten with all possible speed into Egypt, to the relief of the Hebrews, thus grievously oppressed.

Moses, encouraged by these extraordinary revelations of the Divine will and pleasure, entreated the exertion of the same power in Egypt, if it should be necessary. He also supplicated, that the Divine Being would deign to communicate to him the appellation by which he should invoke him, when he offered the oblations according to command, and this favour was most graciously vouchsafed. By this especial power vested in Moses, and the signs which appeared to him in the burning bush, he was confirmed in the truth of God's promises of his protection, and rendered fully confident that he should deliver his countrymen from the calamities they suffered in Egypt.

CHAP. XIII.

Moses departs from Midian to go into Egypt. Entertained by the Hebrews. Displays his miracles. Solicits the king to dismiss the Israelites. Shews wonders to Pharaoh, who oppresses the Hebrews the more, and remains inflexible in his resolution of detaining them.

HAVING received authentic intelligence of the death of Pharaoh, from whose tyranny he had fled, Moses requested of Jethro permission to go into Egypt, to attempt the deliverance of his countrymen; and, taking with him his wife Zipporah, the daughter of Jethro, and the two children, Gershom and Eleazar, whom he had by her, set forward accordingly. Gershom, in the Hebrew language, signifies foreign, and Eleazar favoured by God; and these names were given them as a token that Moses had escaped from amongst the Egyptians by the assistance of the God of his fathers.

As he approached the borders, he was met, on special appointment, by his brother Aaron, to whom he communicated the revelation of the Divine will, as he had received it on the mountain. As they advanced, the principal men of their nation came forth to meet them; when it was found requisite for Moses to display his power of working miracles, as the most effectual means of gaining their confidence in the Divine promise, that they should be delivered from their oppression. When he found that the Hebrews, animated by a spirit of liberty, were disposed implicitly to obey whatever he should enjoin them, he presented himself before the king, (who had lately succeeded to the throne,) and having laid before him the signal services he had rendered the Egyptians, at the very juncture of their sustaining the most ignominious treatment from the Ethiopians, who had ravaged their country, and rendered them a bye-word amongst nations, recapitulated the dangers he had encountered for their deliverance, and recited the occurrences that had passed on Mount Sinai, together with the extraordinary revelations communicated to him there, he exhorted the king by no means to oppose the Divine will.

Pharaoh treated his representation with raillery; whereupon Moses proceeded to display the miracles as wrought upon the mount: but this, instead of convincing, incensed him the more, inasmuch that he reviled Moses as a slave lately escaped from Egyptian bondage, who now endeavoured, by the aid of magic, to impose himself on the credulity of the people, as a mighty man of wisdom and valour. To confirm his opinion, the king ordered some magicians to be called in, and to demonstrate that the Egyptians were skilled in those arts, which, though Moses declared them to be Divine operations, were, he affirmed, mere human devices to delude the vulgar. The magicians, at the royal command, casting their rods on the ground; they became, to appearance, serpents. Moses, unaffected by this circumstance, coolly assured the king, that, though he by no means despised the learning or abilities of the Egyptians, the signs he had wrought as far surpassed their magic art, as the Divine power transcends the human. To demonstrate this, he dropped his staff on the ground, commanding that it should change into a serpent. The transformation was instant; and that particular (a) serpent having devoured those produced by the art of the magicians, Moses took it up, and it reassumed its form of a staff.

But this effort, on the part of Moses, had the same effect with the king as the former: therefore, to retaliate what he judged an imposition to reflect disgrace on the Egyptians, he issued immediate orders to the superintendants of the works to double their tasks, nor grant them the least intermission from the severest labour. To add to their toil, they were no longer indulged with straw to make bricks, but reduced to the necessity of providing that material in the night time, after they had been fatigued with the excessive hardships of the day.

Moses, however, was not in the least dismayed, either at the menaces of the king, or the vexatious importunity of his countrymen; but bravely persevered in the design he was determined to accomplish. To this end he applied to the king for permission for the Hebrews to go to Mount Sinai, to offer up a solemn oblation to God. He urged his importunity, by representing the importance of the Divine favour on the one hand, and the indignation and consequent calamities he would entail on himself, his children, and people, on the other hand, should he, by persevering in his obstinacy, render them objects of the Divine vengeance. He concluded, however, with declaring, that, at all events, the Hebrews would effect their deliverance, and the Egyptians meet with the punishment due to their obstinacy and disobedience.

CHAP. XIV.

The ten plagues of Egypt. Institution of the Passover.

AS Pharaoh still continued obdurate, and despised both the menaces and admonitions of Moses, the severest calamities soon befel the Egyptian nation. To these I shall circumstantially attend for three distinct causes, viz. as they were punishments never inflicted on any nation before; as they confirmed the predictions of Moses; and as they afford a lesson to mankind, not to incur the Divine displeasure, by an obstinate perseverance or disobedience to his will.

The first calamity that befel the Egyptians was the river Nile being turned into blood, so that the people were deprived of all means of quenching their thirst, as they had no other fountain of water: besides, the water was not only changed in colour, but in quality, and affected those, whose parching thirst compelled them to drink, with the severest pains. To the Hebrews its former taste remained, and it therefore answered its former purposes.

Prevailed on by this alarming incident, Pharaoh issued his licence for the departure of the Hebrews; but the cause no sooner ceased than he revoked it. The whole country was then infested with frogs (a), which abounded in the river to such a degree, that, dying and becoming putrified, the water was rendered nauseous and loathsome. They also corrupted their food of every kind, and caused a stench to exhale deadly and poisonous in its effects. This calamity inclined the king to recoil again; and he no sooner consented that Moses should proceed on his journey with the Hebrews, than it ceased, and the face of nature re-assumed its wonted form. But this plague was no sooner removed, than the obstinacy of Pharaoh brought on a third, which was a swarm of lice, that corroded the bodies of the Egyptians in a most miraculous manner; nor could any means be found to counteract the malignity of these pestiferous vermin, or effect their extirpation. Pharaoh, again dreading the extermination of his subjects in a manner of all others most infamous, gave the Hebrews assurance of their departure, on condition that their wives and children should be left behind as hostages for their return. This incensed the Almighty the more, it carried with it a presumptuous hope of over-ruling his Divine will, and argued a belief that it was Moses, and not Providence, that interposed in behalf of the Hebrews. The land was therefore covered with a vast variety of flies and insects, which not only proved fatal to many persons, but totally suspended the pursuit of agriculture; for what they did not destroy was killed by a distemper, that was also baneful to the cattle. Notwithstanding these distresses, Pharaoh remained inflexible, nor would suffer the Hebrews to depart, but on the beforementioned conditions. The Almighty was therefore pleased to punish his contumacy with forer afflictions. The bodies of the Egyptians were covered with ulcers, which proved mortal to many: but the king still persevering in his obstinacy, an extraordinary kind of hail, such as had never been seen before in Egypt, poured down in torrents, and instantaneously destroyed the fruits of the earth. This was followed by a swarm of locusts (b), which nipped the rising grain, and blasted all their hopes of harvest.

Such judgments might be deemed sufficient to soften the most obdurate heart, and enforce acquiescence with the Divine will; but Pharaoh, instigated by malice, sacrificed his subjects to his obstinacy, and impiously set the Almighty at defiance. He at length enjoined Moses to lead away the Hebrews with their wives, but to leave their effects behind them, as an equivalent for the loss the Egyptians had sustained on their account.

Whilst Moses was remonstrating with him on the injustice of this proposal, which, if complied with, would take from them the means of offering an oblation to God, an impenetrable darkness, or fog, overspread the land of Egypt, which deprived many of their sight, and, by stopping respiration, proved mortal to others. The darkness having continued three days, and as many nights, without producing the due effect upon Pharaoh, Moses at length thus addressed him. "How long will you persist to trample on the counsel of the Most High? It is the "Divine command that the Hebrews depart; nor can you be freed from the curses of the Almighty but by obedience to his will." Incensed at this peremptory observation, the king threatened him with the loss of his head, if he even dared to renew his importunities in his presence. Moses replied, that he should urge him no further, but that, in a short time, both himself and the principal of his subjects would entreat the Hebrews to depart; which said, he withdrew.

But the Almighty, being pleased to give another proof of his vengeance against the Egyptians, commanded Moses to enjoin the people to prepare the sacrifice by the tenth day of the month Xanthicus, that it might be celebrated on the fourteenth of the same month, and that he should then lead the Hebrews away, with all their effects. This month is called by the Egyptians Pharmuthi, by the Hebrews Nisan, and by the Macedonians Xanthicus. Moses accordingly caused the necessary preparations to be made; and, on the dawn of the fourteenth day, the whole people (drawn up ready for a march) offered sacrifice, and, with small bundles of hyssop, purified their houses, sprinkling them with blood. Having supped, they burned the residue of the meat, as being on the point of departure. To this day we retain this custom, calling the festival Pascha, that is to say Passage; because, on that night, God having in mercy spared and passed by the Hebrews, struck the Egyptians with a terrible plague, which, in the course of a few hours, exterminated all their first-born; so that Pharaoh was harrassed with importunate solicitations to dismiss the Hebrews. Sending, therefore, for Moses, he gave immediate orders for their departure, supposing that their absence would exempt the country from its accumulated plagues. The Egyptians made them ample presents to hasten their journey, and as a token of the intercourse and familiarity which had so long subsisted between them.

CHAP. XV.

The Israelites leave Egypt under the conduct of Moses. Institution of the feast of the Azymes, or unleavened bread. The Israelites pursued by the Egyptians. Make to the Red Sea. Much perplexed. Exorted by Moses to rely on the Divine protection.

THE Hebrews had no sooner taken their departure than the Egyptians discovered much remorse for the cruelties they had exercised over them. Having taken their route towards Letopolis, at that time deserted, though the spot on which Babylon was afterwards built, about the time that Cambyzes depopulated Egypt, they arrived on the third day at Beelzephon, near the Red Sea. In this desert they lived upon cakes, lightly kneaded, and prepared with small heat, for the space of thirty days; for they had brought no more provision out of Egypt, than what was barely sufficient to serve them for that time. In commemoration of this scarcity, we still observe a feast for the space of eight days, called the feast of Azymes, or of (c) UNLEAVENED BREAD.

The numbers of the Israelites, who came out of Egypt, including such only as were able to bear arms, are computed at six hundred thousand.

They took their departure from Egypt on the fifteenth day of the month Xanthicus, 415 years from our father Abraham's settling in Canaan, 250 years from Jacob's arrival in Egypt, and in the 80th year for three, four, five, and six weeks. There are many accounts given of these devouring insects. Pliny says, that these creatures generally made their appearance while the strong east winds continued; and we read that, in 1527, a vast swarm of locusts were driven by an east wind out of Turkey into Poland, where they did much mischief. We read further that, in 1536, a prodigious swarm of locusts were driven from the Euxine Pontus to Podolia, where they destroyed every thing that came in their way for twenty miles round. In August, 1747, a swarm of these insects, so numerous as to darken the air, settled in Transylvania, where they devoured the vegetable productions of the country to the very roots.

(c) The use of unleavened bread might be enjoined to remind them of sincerity; leaven being a kind of corruption. But others think it was ordered to commemorate their hasty deliverance, which did not allow them time to leaven it.

(a) This plague of the frogs, well that of the water being changed into blood, was excellently adapted to subvert the superstitions of Egypt, and to demonstrate the over-ruling power of the Almighty; for, as the banks of the river Nile was the grand scene of the magical operations of the Egyptians, in which blood and frogs made a principal part of the apparatus, so, by commanding that river to produce such an infinite multitude of these creatures to annoy them, the Almighty adapted their chastisement to the nature of their crimes: for frogs were not only the instruments of their abominations, but likewise the emblems of those impure demons whom they invoked by their incantations.

(b) In the year 1748 great numbers of these insects visited different parts of England, but happily their stay was of short duration. Many of them were taken alive, in the months of August and September, of the length of two inches and a half to that of four inches, some of which were taken and kept alive of the life of Moses, whose brother Aaron was three years older than himself. They also carried with them the bones of Joseph, according to the injunction he had laid on his descendants.

Bones of Joseph carried away with them.

They are pursued by the Egyptians.

Moses prudently leads the Hebrews near the Red Sea.

The Egyptians soon began to repent them of the dismissal of the Israelites; and Pharaoh to conclude, that all their calamities arose from the enchantment of Moses. Forming, therefore, a resolution to pursue them, they provided the necessary implements of war, not doubting but to overtake and bring them back to their late bondage, especially as they were unprepared for an attack, and harassed with the fatigues of their journey. Enquiring their route, they pursued them with alacrity; though the badness of the roads was such, as not only to obstruct the progress of an army, but inconvenient to single passengers. Moses conducted them this way, in order to foil the Egyptians, if they should be maliciously disposed to follow them; as well as to evade the discovery of the Philistines, who had conceived an ancient grudge to the Hebrews, their country bordering upon Egypt. Travelling, therefore, through the desert, where he knew they must undergo many hardships, his intent was to bring them into Canaan, that he might afterwards lead them to Mount Sinai, there to offer up the oblation, according to the Divine command.

As soon as the Egyptians had overtaken the Israelites, they drew up in order of battle, amounting, in number, to fifty thousand horse, two hundred thousand foot, attended by six hundred chariots. They had obtained every advantage; blocked up the Hebrews between inaccessible rocks on the one side, and the sea on the other; and, by pitching their tents at the mouth of the aperture, cut off all possibility of their escape. In this embarrassed situation, unable to sustain a siege through want of provision, to effect their flight from being blockaded, or to maintain a battle through want of arms, they had no apparent resource but to surrender at mercy to the enemy. They now began to inveigh most severely against Moses, totally unmindful of the wonders performed by the Divine Power through his agency: nay, they were driven to such despair, that notwithstanding his exhortation to rely on the arm of Omnipotence, they were ready to express their resentment by stoning him, and then voluntarily resigning themselves to the thralldom of the Egyptians. To this they were instigated by the piercing cries of the women and children, who had nothing in view but immediate destruction. Moses bore the invectives of the multitude with the calmest composure, nor discovered the least diffidence of the Divine promises. Assuring them that the Almighty would not suffer them to be subjected to their enemies, he thus addressed them: "If your interests and concerns had been under the direction of human prudence only, you would have been justified in your doubts and suspicions of the event; but your distrust of the Divine Power shews at once your impiety and your folly, especially as you have had such convincing tokens of his care, in your deliverance by me, at a time most unexpected. This should encourage your hope, that God will extricate you out of present difficulties, as he has out of former, though they appear both to you and your enemies insurmountable, in order to display his goodness and power. Rely, then, on the aid of Omnipotence, which can either elate or deject at pleasure. Be not dismayed at the terrific numbers of the Egyptians, nor despair of your lives, though escape seems impracticable; but remember that the Almighty, if consistent with his Divine will, can level the mountains, and turn the sea into dry land."

A tumult arises among the Hebrews from their desperate situation.

Moses exhorts the people to rely on the Divine protection.

CHAP. XVI.

The prayer of Moses. The Red Sea divided. The Hebrews secure their retreat. The Egyptians are drowned.

(a) There have been many objections made to this passage of the Israelites over the Red Sea in one night; but the most eminent geographers, and ablest mathematicians, inform us, that this sea, for about five days journey, is no where more than about 8 or 9 miles across, and in one place but 4 or 5 miles, Song of Moses. The arms of the Egyptians driven into the camp of the Hebrews, who sacrifice on Mount Sinai.

MOSES, having concluded his address, conducted the Hebrews towards the sea, in full view of the Egyptians; who, tired with the fatigues of the pursuit, declined the combat till the ensuing day. As soon as Moses arrived at the bank, he invoked the Divine assistance, to the following effect:

"Thou well knowest, Almighty Father, that human force can never effect our escape from the calamities impending. Thou, alone, canst save this multitude, who have forsaken Egypt at thine especial command. We therefore commend ourselves to the protection of thy Providence, assured that by that means alone we can be delivered from the rage of the Egyptians. Manifest, therefore, thy power in our weakness; relieve and animate thy people, though, through distrust, they have offended thee. Thou canst free us from the difficulties with which we are surrounded. The sea is thine, the dry land is thine, the expanse of the universe is thine. The sea shall divide itself at thy command; the powers of the air shall also obey."

Having thus invoked the Divine protection, he struck the sea with his rod, which suddenly dividing (a) and retiring back, left a dry passage for the escape of the Hebrews. Moses immediately entered, and commanding the multitude to follow him, they boldly marched through the passage thus opened, congratulating one another on the danger of their enemies, and their own miraculous preservation, through the interposition of Divine Providence. The Egyptians at first thought, that, raving with despair, they had precipitated themselves into perdition; but, observing them make a considerable progress, without the least obstruction in their passage, they also determined to follow, and, ordering their cavalry to keep in front, marched with their whole army. While the Egyptians were employed in putting on their armour, the Hebrews had reached the opposite shore, which further animated the former to follow them, without the least suspicion of danger or difficulty; ignorant that the passage was opened for the Hebrews alone, and impassable to any others. As the whole body of the Egyptians was proceeding up the channels, the sea again diffused itself, and, with a force reverberated by the driving winds, overwhelmed them in the waves. Impetuous showers, attended with roaring peals of thunder, and almost incessant flashes of lightning, added to the horrors of the scene, which exhibited the most tremendous tokens of the Divine vengeance; and so total was their destruction, that not one escaped to carry back the tidings of this awful catastrophe.

The Hebrews were transported beyond degree at their own signal deliverance, and the overthrow of their enemies, and, as a testimony of their gratitude, passed the night in offering up praises and thanksgivings, and singing hymns, which Moses had composed and adapted to the occasion.

I have recited these occurrences as they stand recorded in holy writ; nor let any person suspect the credibility of them, since, not long ago, the sea of Pamphylia divided itself, and opened a passage for Alexander, king of Macedon, when the Almighty was pleased, by his means, to subvert the Persian empire. This fact is attested by the several historians who have recorded the memorable deeds of that renowned monarch.

The next day the arms and baggage of the Egyptians were carried, by the force of the waves, to the Hebrew camp, which Moses considering as a token of the Divine regard, he caused to be collected for future use, and then led the Hebrews to Mount Sinai, to offer up their oblations to the Almighty for their signal deliverance, according to his own especial command.

according to De Lisle's map, which is made from the best travellers themselves, and not copied from others. De Castro, a mathematician, who surveyed this sea with great exactness, declares that there is a great flux or reflux in these parts. Vain and groundless are the subtleties of sceptics and unbelievers.

[Recording a Period of about Two Years.]

CHAP. I.

The Israelites distressed for water in the desert. The water purified at the intercession of Moses. The people murmur for want of sustenance. Moses enumerates the Divine favours to appease them. Implores the Divine aid. They are relieved by a flight of quails. Manna sent. Command respecting the manner of gathering it. Support of the Israelites for forty years. Drought prevails. Moses produces water.

1, &c.
The Hebrews undergo the severest hardships in the desert.
THE joy resulting from the Israelites late deliverance was soon damped by a succession of difficulties in their progress to Mount Sinai (a), the country being desert, and destitute of food, water, and provisions of every kind, for man and beast. The water that, by command of their leader, they had brought with them from the places through which they lately passed, being now expended, they were under the necessity of sinking wells, at immense toil, through the hardness of the ground; and after all their labours the water was by no means adequate to their wants, either in quality or quantity. Proceeding on their journey, they arrived, about dusk, at a certain spot, which, from the brackishness of its water, they called Marah, that is, bitterness, and, being fatigued with travel and fasting, resided there for some time. To this they were induced on account of the well, which, though incompetent to the full supply of so numerous a body, afforded them considerable relief. Besides, they were given to understand, by their scouts, that, in their progress, they would find the water wholly unfit for their own use, as well as that of their cattle.

When Moses observed the general despair that prevailed amongst the multitude, and reflected that his people were not composed of a body of men possessed of fortitude to sustain hardships, but comprised a promiscuous collection of women and children, who could not suppress the feelings of nature, he was extremely concerned, as if he had been the author of this calamity; which, added to the intreaties of the women in behalf of their children, and of the men in behalf of their wives, he had recourse, by supplication to the Father of Mercies, that he would graciously interfere in their present exigency. His request being granted, he took a piece of wood, cleft, and cast it into the pit, assuring the people, that the Almighty was disposed to accord to their desires, provided they would with alacrity perform that which should be commanded. On their expressing their conformity, he enjoined the strongest men amongst them to draw water, assuring them, by way of encouragement, that when the well was nearly exhausted, the residue would be potable. The event justified his declaration; for the water, purged by agitation, became agreeable to the palate, and refreshed the parching multitude.

They hence removed to Helim, or Elim, a region which, at a distance, afforded a pleasing prospect, being adorned with palm-trees, but, on a nearer survey, presented a barren aspect; for these palm-trees

The bitter waters of Marah made sweet.

(a) There is now a convent at Mount Sinai, founded by the empress Helena, and dedicated to the celebrated St. Catherine. It stands at the bottom of the mountain, and is an irregular, aukward building, of unburnt brick, walled round, and stopped up at every entrance, to prevent the incursions of the roving Arabs. The principal entrance is by a window, that is upwards of thirty feet from the ground, and through which people are drawn up in a machine by a windlass. Here is the shrine of St. Catharine. The relics are deposited in a marble chest, whereon are carved several pieces of foliage in basso relievo. Adjoining to the east end of the church, wherein these relics are preserved, is the chapel of the Holy Bush, which the monks assert grew on the same spot whereon now lies a flag of white marble, which Christians approach and most devoutly kiss; nor will they enter this chapel with their shoes on. Here are two wells: one is called the Well of Moses, which hath a very fine cool water, and is drank in summer; the other is called the Well of the Holy Bush, and is of a warmer temperature. The church, containing the relics of St. Catharine, is called the great church of the transfiguration, and is situated to the north east of the convent. The Turks destroyed the pavement of this church, digging it up in hopes of discovering treasures; but it was elegantly repaired by bishop Athanasius in the last century.

were but seventy in number, and those reduced in growth and sap from the dry and gravelly quality of the soil. There were also twelve springs; but the avenues were so contracted, that, instead of flowing, they could only be said to drop; and, on removal of the clogging sand by digging, the water was so muddy as not to be potable. The trees too, from continued droughts, yielded no fruit.

The wants of the Israelites increase on their removal to Helim. Again they threaten Moses.

The multitude again exclaimed against Moses, as the author of all their miseries; and their provision being exhausted, and no hope left of a supply, were reduced to their former state of despair, and threatened to vent their fury upon him in the same manner as before. But though he found the people thus wickedly incensed against him, he doubted not of the Divine assistance; for, conscious of his integrity, he presented himself in the midst of those who were most clamorous, and were preparing to stone him. Being well acquainted with human nature, and endeavouring to touch the passions by the prevailing force of his elocution, he found means to appease their indignation, by exhorting them not to suffer present ills to obliterate from their minds past blessings, but rather to expect deliverance from their woes by the providential interference of that God, who, to make trial of their resignation to his will, and to impress them with a just sense of former miracles wrought in their behalf, permitted them to labour under these adversities. He represented to them, that, to repine under their trials, argued at once the highest impiety and ingratitude, as well as contempt of the Divine will, in obedience to which they forsook Egypt; and added, that they were very culpable in persecuting, with unabated rigour, the agent employed in bringing about the Divine purposes, as he had ever acted with uprightness, and in strict conformity to the Divine command.

Moses expostulates with the multitude on their rashness and ingratitude.

Enumerates many instances of the Divine favour and protection, and draws from thence the most pertinent inferences, by way of counsel and advice.

He then proceeded to enumerate these particulars: That the Egyptians were first tormented, and then exterminated, for endeavouring to detain them in opposition to the decree of the Almighty; that the water of the very river, to their enemies rendered noxious, to them remained sweet and refreshing; that the very sea, which retired and opened to them a passage, again diffused itself, and overwhelmed the Egyptians in one general inundation: that, being without arms, they were amply supplied: that they had been frequently delivered from imminent danger, nay, from death itself: that since the power of God was infinite, they should not despair of its effects, but sustain their ills with patient resignation, persuaded that their deliverance, though late, was certain: that the delay, in redressing their grievance, was to make trial of their fortitude and constancy, in bearing the wants of natural refreshments as men, rather than have recourse to means, unbecoming the rank of creation in which they stood. And concluded with observing, that though he was less solicitous for his own life than their safety, he could not but dissuade them from rising against him, lest it should be deemed an impeachment of the Divine Wisdom and Government.

The multitude are appeased.

Having thus calmed their rage, and repressed their fury, he deemed it proper to address himself to the Father of Mercies: accordingly, therefore, ascending an eminence, he supplicated Him to shew compassion to the people in the relief of their exigencies, and implored his forgiveness of their repeated deviations from their duty, as they arose from a pungent sense of their calamities. The Almighty, having vouchsafed to promise his speedy aid, Moses came down to the multitude, who, observing a transport of joy on his countenance, no longer gave way to despair, but changed their former melancholy for a habit of cheerful complacency. Moses then informed them, that he came to bring them immediate remedy for their wants; when a vast number of quails (a) (birds that abound in the gulph of Arabia) rapidly flew across the sea, and being wearied with a long flight, fell in the center of the camp of the Hebrews, who caught and devoured them as a repast sent by Providence to relieve their outrageous famine. Moses, in duty bound, returned grateful acknowledgements to God for his present aid and future promises. This relief was succeeded by a supply of another sort; for while Moses stretched forth his hands in prayer, the dew fell, which adhering to them, he supposed to be a kind of food sent from heaven; and, on tasting, found it to be very pleasing to the palate. Addressing the people, who supposed it to be snow, as it was then the usual season for its descent, he informed them it was not the ordinary dew of heaven, but a substance providentially sent for their food and nourishment. Having eaten of it himself, he presented it to them, and they were greatly refreshed. In flavour it resembled honey, in odour bdellium, and in form the seed of coriander; so that it was gathered with the utmost care.

The Israelites relieved by a flight of quails;

Afterwards by the descent of manna.

No individual was permitted to gather in one day more than the measure of an ephah, (the tenth part of an ephah); a precaution taken to prevent the stronger from encroaching on the weaker, in gathering more than sufficed them. Those, indeed, who sought to provide more than the limited quantity, were frustrated in their expectations; for that which remained till the next morning became bitter, and overrun with vermin. So nutrimental was this food, that it was of itself sufficient sustenance; nay, to this day, a flower is to be seen in that country bearing some resemblance of that with which Moses was so peculiarly favoured. The Hebrews call it manna (b); for, in our language, the word man is an interrogation, signifying, What is this or that? Upon this food they lived forty years, that is, the whole space of time they were in the desert.

Upon their arrival at Rephidim they were much distressed for want of water, and again became incensed with Moses, who, his never-failing resource, applied himself, in humble supplication, to the Giver of every good and perfect gift, beseeching him, that, he had vouchsafed them food in the direst necessity, he would now be graciously pleased to afford them drink, without which they must inevitably perish. The Almighty was pleased to attend to his supplication, and assured him that a fountain should spring from a spot whence he least expected it. He then commanded him to strike, with his rod, an adjacent rock, in the presence of the people, and they should be supplied with water without the least pains or labour. Moses had no sooner obtained the promise, than he hastened to the multitude, who waited with the utmost impatience his descent from the rock, where he had addressed the Almighty in their behalf. He immediately communicated to them the Divine assurance of relief in their present calamity, by causing a fountain to flow from an adjacent rock. Whilst they were lost between doubt and expectation, Moses struck the rock (c) with his rod,

(a) It is to be observed, that this extraordinary descent of quails was at that time of the year when those birds are known to fly from Egypt across the Red Sea in prodigious numbers: so that this miracle did not so much consist in the number of the birds, as in their direction to the camp of the Israelites, and on that very evening when they were promised food.

(b) This manna, in several parts of scripture, is called Angel's Food. See Psalm lxxviii. 95. John vi. 31.

(c) The rock from whence this water flowed in so miraculous a manner is particularly noticed by Dr. Shaw, who says, "After we had descended, with no small difficulty, down the other, or western side of Mount Sinai, we came into the plain, or wilderness of Rephidim, where we saw that extraordinary antiquity the Rock of Meribah, which has continued down to this day, without the least injury from time or accidents. This is rightly called, from its hardness, Deut. viii. 15. a rock of flint; though, from the purple, or reddish colour of it, it may be rather rendered, the rock of amethyst, or the amethystine, or garnet rock. It is about six yards square, lying tottering, it were, and loose, near the middle of the valley; and seems to have been formerly a part, or cliff, of Mount Sinai, which hangs in a variety of precipices all over this plain. The waters which gushed out, and the streams which flowed withal, Psalm lxxviii. 21. have hollowed, across one corner of this rock, a channel about two inches deep, and twenty wide, all over incrustated like the inside of a tea-kettle which has been long used. Besides several mossy productions, which are still preserved by the dew, we see all this channel a great number of holes, some of them four or five inches deep, and one or two in diameter; the lively and demonstrative tokens of their having been formerly so many fountains. Neither could art or chance be concerned in the contrivance; inasmuch every circumstance points out to us a miracle; and, in the same manner with the rent in the rock of Mount Calvary at Jerusalem, never fails to produce the greatest seriousness and devotion in all who see it. The Arabs, who were our guards, were ready to stone me, for attempting to break off a corner of it.

and there issued forth a most copious and limpid stream, to their great surprize as well as consolation; for they soon found that the water was grateful to their taste, and a peculiar instance of the Divine power and bounty. Moses was now held in the greatest veneration, as highly favoured of God, whose miraculous interposition they gratefully acknowledged, by offering up oblations and solemn thanksgivings. The sacred records, which are deposited in the temple of Jerusalem, declare that Moses, at the especial command of the Most High, in this manner caused water to issue from the rock.

Necessary preparations for action.

THE increasing numbers and power of the Hebrews now spread an alarm throughout the adjacent countries, insomuch, that embassies were sent from one to the other to concert the means of their expulsion and extirpation. The inhabitants of the country of Gobel and the city Petra, called Amalekites, the most warlike of all the neighbouring nations, were peculiarly active in this expedition. The kings of those districts stirred up each other, as well as those who lived contiguous, to wage war against the Hebrews; alledging, that they were an army of aliens escaped from Egyptian bondage, and recommending it as a maxim of sound policy to make the attack in the desert, before their numbers and power increased, rather than, by delay, afford them an opportunity of possessing themselves of lands, and acquiring additional strength to sustain a conflict. These considerations having been duly weighed by the several combined parties, it was unanimously resolved to commence hostilities against the Hebrews. Moses, suspecting no hostile proceedings, was rather alarmed at receiving intimation of their design; but when the enemy was in sight, and there was an inevitable necessity for hazarding an engagement, a general panic and confusion prevailed throughout the Hebrew camp, from a dread of entering upon action with men well prepared, and trained to the exercise of arms. Moses, therefore, emboldened them to the conflict, by reminding them of former exertions of the Divine Power in their behalf; as a ground for reliance on future assistance; and observing, that however inferior they might be, in point of weapons and ammunition, to the enemy, as they had the arm of Omnipotence engaged for them, they need not doubt of success. This he enforced by adding, that, in the severest contests with famine and thirst, and the perils of blockade, they had been brought off more than conquerors through the same resolute power.

Having then animated the multitude, he summoned the chiefs of the respective tribes, and enjoined the younger to obey the elder, while he enforced an universal obedience to the command of the general. Spurning danger, and glowing to enter upon action, which they hoped would terminate their calamities, they anxiously pressed to be led against the enemy, that their ardour might not be abated by an untimely delay.

From the whole multitude he selected Joshua, the son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, as commander in chief, being a man expert in arms, patient of labour, and zealous for the honour of God, according to the instructions he had imbibed from Moses his preceptor. A party was ordered to take their stand round the water, and another stationed so as to guard the camp. They continued all night under arms, expecting the signal for a general attack. Moses passed the night without sleep, giving instructions to Joshua respecting the disposition of the army. At day-break he again encouraged the troops by an address, exhorting Joshua, as commander, to acquit himself in a manner worthy of the rank he held, and the cause in which he was engaged; and the Hebrews in general, whether superior or subordinate, to sustain the conflict as became good soldiers. Having given the necessary orders, he commended them to the protection of God, and delegating the command to Joshua, retired to a mountain.

No. 4.

The engagement was maintained for some time with equal fury and doubtful success. Whilst Moses extended his hands the Hebrews had the advantage; but, as he observed, that, when they dropped through fatigue, the enemy prevailed, he requested his brother Aaron, and Hur, the husband of his sister Miriam, to support his hands in an erect posture. This being done, the Hebrews charged the Amalekites with such resolution, that had not night put an end to the contest, a general slaughter must have ensued. Our ancestors, however, obtained a most glorious and seasonable victory; for, besides the renown they acquired by conquering so formidable an enemy, by becoming masters of their camp, they amassed immense riches; whereas, before, they were deprived of the means of common subsistence. But this victory was attended with prosperous effects, future as well as present, as it not only reduced their enemies to submission, but afterwards rendered them the terror of surrounding nations. The spoils taken were very considerable; for, besides a great quantity of gold and silver found in the camp, there were vessels and tables of brass, warlike implements, accoutrements for men and horse, with every requisite for the complete array of an army. The Hebrews, elated by this conquest, were ready to undertake the most arduous exploits.

The Amalekites are totally routed.

The next day Moses ordered the bodies of the slain to be rifled, and the scattered arms of those that fled to be collected. He conferred honours on those who had signalized their valour in the action, and, with the concurrence of the whole army, bestowed the highest eulogium on Joshua, their commander. Not one Hebrew fell upon the occasion. The hosts of the enemy were put to the sword. In token of their gratitude, an oblation was offered to the giver of all victory, and an altar erected with this inscription, TO GOD THE CONQUEROR. He denounced the extirpation of the Amalekites, for having assailed the Hebrews in circumstances of singular distress, arising from their situation in a desert, and their want of all necessaries. A general festival was then prepared; and thus concluded their first engagement from the day of their deliverance out of Egypt. After the multitude had been refreshed, Moses caused them to be drawn up in array, in order to supply such as were deficient, with the arms and ammunition taken from the enemy. Proceeding by slow marches, they arrived the third month after their departure from Egypt, at Mount Sinai, where Moses had the extraordinary visions already related.

Moses distributes praises and rewards according to merit, appoints a festival; dedicates an altar to God the Conqueror, and advances to Mount Sinai.

Jethro visits his son-in-law, Moses, at Mount Sinai, to congratulate him on his success.

JETHRO, the father-in-law of Moses, having received intelligence of his extraordinary success, came with his daughter Zipporah, and his two sons, to congratulate him upon the joyful occasion. Having offered an oblation to God, Moses prepared a banquet for the people, near the bush that withstood the flames, and thence took an opportunity for disposing them in ranks, according to the order of their respective tribes. Aaron, Jethro, and the multitude in general, in hymns of thanksgiving, ascribed to the Almighty the praises due for their mighty deliverance. They likewise, with united voice, extolled the wisdom and virtue of their leaders, which had brought events to so fortunate an issue; while Jethro passed equal commendations on the people, and on Moses, as concurring in the achievement of actions, at once honourable and serviceable to their country.

CHAP. IV.

Jethro counsels Moses respecting religious, civil, and military concerns.

JETHRO having remarked, in the course of observation, that Moses was much embarrassed, by reason that reference was made to him to decide in the disputes and controversies that arose amongst the people, who most implicitly submitted their causes to his arbitration, from a firm persuasion both of his ability and integrity, took an opportunity of offering his advice upon that subject. He counselled him to delegate matters of small importance to others, reserving to himself only those of moment, in which the national interest was essentially concerned; for there were many persons to be found amongst the Hebrews competent to determine in ordinary pleas, though he alone was adequate to the weightier concerns of the people, considered in a collective view. "Persuaded (said he) of your virtues, and the rectitude of your conduct towards the people, as the vicegerent of God, suffer them to submit their suits to the decision of others, whilst you are devoted to those matters which more immediately respect the service of God, and the defence and glory of the people committed to your care. If, therefore, you will listen to my advice in human affairs, muster the whole army, and appoint chieftains to preside over parties, composed of ten thousands, thousands, five hundreds, and fifties: over these, thus arranged, set judicial officers, who, dividing them into thirties and tens, may determine their suits and controversies. Let their titles signify the number over which they have charge, and let these speak by the people, as men of sound judgment, and inflexible integrity, hear and decide their differences. If any intricate matter arises, let it be referred to those who are highest in authority; and if it then remains undecided, let the last appeal be to yourself. By these means right will be preserved inviolate to the people, and you will have opportunity of attending to the service of God, and to your supplications for the general good."

The exemplary candor and justice of Moses.

Moses, convinced of the propriety of Jethro's counsel, made the respective arrangements, in exact conformity to his plan: nor did he arrogate to himself the merit of the service, but publicly ascribed it to the political talents of his father-in-law. Indeed, Jethro is recorded by him, in his writings, as the author of these regulations, esteeming it a duty to give merit its due praise, and thereby testifying a mind discerning, candid, and ingenuous.

CHAP. V.

Moses ascends Mount Sinai. Tempest, attended with tremendous thunder and lightening. Moses addresses the multitude. The Ten Commandments issued from the Divine Voice. Moses fasts forty days and forty nights, the time of his continuance in the mountain. Descends and displays, in the presence of the people, the two tables, containing the Ten Commandments.

Exod. xix. 1, &c. Moses ascends the tremendous mountain Sinai.

MOSES, having convened the multitude, informed them, that he must ascend Mount Sinai, to receive the Divine Commands, which he would communicate to them. At the same time he commanded them to pitch their tents at the foot of the mountain, that they might be the more ready to receive such intimation as the Almighty should be pleased to afford.

In the mean time the Hebrews purified themselves, fasted, and invoked the Divine favour.

He then ascended the mountain, which is not only the highest in that country, but, by reason of its craggy precipices, inaccessible, and formidable to the view; besides, an opinion prevailed, that it was the peculiar residence of the Divine Being. The Hebrews, in obedience to Moses, took their stand at the foot of the mountain, in full expectation of the blessings he had promised to procure. During the space they expected the return of their guide, they observed a strict temperance, abstaining from sensual gratifications, and purifying themselves for three days, according to command. They also besought the Almighty, that he would favour Moses with a gracious reception, and, through his means, vouchsafe, to confer on them the promised blessings. After this they held a sumptuous festival, and arrayed themselves, their wives, and children, in their best attire.

On the third day, before sun rise, a cloud (such as

(a) The meaning of this commandment is, that no object shall, at any time, so much attract our attention, as the service of that God, who is the universal Lord both of providence and grace.

(b) From the words of this precept it appears, that the worship of idols was then become general among the people in the east, and perhaps so in most other nations.

(c) The heathens were accustomed, on many occasions, to speak in an irreverend manner of those idols whom they worshipped; and, lest the children of Israel should have done so never had been seen before) bore down upon their camp, and environed the place where they had fixed their tents. Though the sky, in every other part, appeared serene, a sudden tempest arose in that quarter, attended with boisterous winds, torrents of rain, peals of thunder, and flashes of lightening, which not only diffused universal horror, but indicated that the Almighty was there present in an especial manner. Let those who read what I have recited, judge for themselves whether it be lawful for us to deviate from the letter of Holy Writ.

A terrible tempest indicates the Divine Presence.

The Hebrews were greatly agitated by this tremendous event, and, as they gave into the common opinion repeatedly specified, it impressed their minds with an universal dread; so that they kept within their tents, concluding that Moses had fallen a victim to the Divine Displeasure, and momentarily expected their own extermination.

The people are anxious for the safety of Moses.

In this state of anxiety and consternation, Moses suddenly presenting himself to them, with a countenance full of joy and majesty, which dissipated their fears, and encouraged their hopes, especially as the late terrific appearances were vanished. Moses assembled the whole multitude in order that he might recite in their hearing the Commandments he had received from the Almighty; to which purpose he ascended an eminence, that he might be the better seen and heard, and thus addressed them:

"The Almighty God, O Hebrews, who has never rejected my prayers, hath at this time received me with singular grace and favour, and vouchsafed to communicate to you, by my means, such rules and laws as, if obeyed, will equally conduce to your interest and happiness. Estimate not the importance of what I am about to deliver by the intrinsic merit of the agent, but the respect you owe to him at whose command it is delivered. It is not Moses, the son of Amram and Jochabel, who is about to give you these admirable precepts, but that Almighty Being who caused the river Nile to overflow with blood, and overwhelmed the Egyptians in great calamities for your deliverance. He who opened a passage for you in the midst of the ocean; He, who supplied you with food from heaven, in the direst extremity; He, who brought water from the rock to quench your thirst; He, who gave Adam and his posterity dominion over all things, both in earth and sea; He, by whom Noah was saved from the deluge; He, by whom our ancestor Abraham obtained the land of Canaan; He, by whose indulgence Isaac was born to his father and mother in an advanced age, by whom Jacob was blessed with a numerous and honourable progeny, and by whom Joseph attained to the first dignities amongst the Egyptians. Let these, his precepts, therefore, be held inviolate, and esteemed more precious than your wives and children."

He appears and expounds the will of God to them.

This said, he led the promiscuous multitude (men, women, and children) to a spot from which they might hear the instructions from the Divine Voice, that their authority might not be invalidated by the weakness and insufficiency of a human tongue. An audible voice was then heard to proceed from the mountain, so that each individual distinctly comprehended the several precepts, which Moses has transmitted to us, in the two tables of laws. I shall not state them word for word, according to the precise form in which they were delivered to Moses, but endeavour to express the sense and meaning, which seem to be to the following purport:

The multitude hear the voice of God.

1. There is but one God, who alone is to be worshipped (a).
2. No image of any living creature is to be worshipped (b).
3. We are not to swear rashly by the name of God (c).

Summary of the Ten Commandments.

with respect to the name of the true God, they are here strictly prohibited from it. Every person is guilty of a breach of this commandment, who uses the name of God in an unnecessary manner; but the most aggravated breach is that of swearing falsely, or, in other words, going into a court of judicature to commit perjury. Holy and reverend is the name of God; and therefore let us never mention it but when necessary, either in prayer, or to decide, by an oath, controversies among our fellow-creatures.

4. The

4. The seventh day is to be kept holy, and not prophaned by labour (a).
5. Father and mother are to be honoured (b).
6. We must not commit murder (c).
7. We must abstain from adultery (d).
8. No man must steal (e).
9. False testimony must not be borne (f).
10. No man must covet any manner of thing that is his neighbour's (g).

The people require a further system of laws.

The people having thus heard the declaration of God confirmed by the Divine Voice, were dismissed to their tents. But in a short time they importuned Moses to procure such laws as might serve for the better regulation of their government.

This he performed; but I pass them over at present, reserving them for the subject of a particular book.

Moses re-ascends the mountain, and continues there forty days.

Soon after these occurrences, Moses, having given previous notice, re-ascended the mountain in the sight of the multitude; but being absent forty days, they became apprehensive that some ill had befallen him. Various were their conjectures concerning his fate. Some were of opinion that he was devoured by wild beasts, and others that he was translated to the Divine Presence: but the wiser party, who neither listened to, or were affected by, mere surmise, bore his absence with patient resignation, from a persuasion of his integrity, and the favour of the Almighty so frequently displayed towards him; though they could not but regret even a temporary loss of so wise and virtuous a leader. They durst not decamp, because Moses had enjoined them there to fix their tents, and await his return.

At the expiration of the forty days he appeared, having, during that space of time, taken no human sustenance. His presence diffused a joy throughout the whole multitude, whom he assured of the Divine regard for their welfare; adding, that, while he was absent, he had received intimation of the means of establishing their government on an happy and prosperous basis; and that it was the Almighty's especial command to them to erect a tabernacle (b), into which he would occasionally descend, and which might be constructed on such a plan, as to be rendered portable from place to place, and thereby obviate the necessity of ascending Mount Sinai. He then displayed the two tables, including the Ten Commandments, as issued from the mount by the Divine Voice.

(a) Here God, by a written command, enjoins one day in seven for two of the most valuable purposes that could be imagined. First, to keep alive in the minds of the people the remembrance of all those wonders that God had wrought for them; and, secondly, that their beasts, such as horses and oxen, might enjoy a day's rest. We read, that when God had finished the works of creation, he rested on the seventh day; and there is no doubt but the same was observed by all those that feared him, to the time of Jacob's going down into Egypt, although not expressly mentioned. It seems, that while the children of Israel were in Egypt, they had either forgot the sabbath, or, perhaps, had been forced to work on that day by their cruel task-masters. This seems to have been the reason why God commanded Moses to set one day in seven apart: and the greatest divines, both ancient and modern, are of opinion, that the first sabbath kept by the children of Israel, answered exactly to the weekly return of that day on which God finished the works of creation.

(b) Disobedience to parents is a crime of such a nature that it leads to many others. How is it possible that we can ever, consistent with the nature of subordination in society, pay obedience to our civil superiors, while we refuse to honour our natural parents? As to the promise of long life, it must not be understood to extend any further than God shall see proper for his own glory, and the good of the obedient person. God may, for wise reasons, see proper to remove, by death, a very obedient child; but, in a natural sense, perhaps the greatest number of obedient children to their parents, both prosper well in the world, and also arrive at a good old age.

(c) As God is the author, giver, and supporter of life, so none but he has a right to take it away. With respect to civil society, the power of taking away life is entrusted with the magistrate; but no private person has a right to do it without his consent. Murder is less than high-treason, or open rebellion against God; for it is actually taking upon ourselves to exercise his regal power and authority.

(d) Adultery, or the seduction of a married woman, is not all

CHAP. VI.

Moses erects a tabernacle in the Desert. Form, and other particulars, of the structure, with their significations. Construction of the ark: Tables deposited therein.

THE multitude, overjoyed with what Moses had communicated to them, applied themselves, with the utmost assiduity, to the building of the tabernacle. They cheerfully contributed gold, silver, and brass, with store of wood of a durable nature; also goats hair, and sheep skins, dyed of different colours, and variously ornamented, together with wool, precious stones, and every material requisite for the completion of the work proposed. The materials, thus liberally furnished, Moses appointed artificers, whose names are to be seen in the Sacred Records, as follows: Bezaleel, the son of Uri, of the tribe of Judah; and Marian, Moses's sister; and Aholiab, the son of Aheliamath, of the tribe of Dan. The people were so zealous for promoting the undertaking, by contributing materially, that Moses was under the necessity of issuing a proclamation, that he was authorised, by the artificers, to declare, that they had already sent in what was fully adequate to complete the building. Moses, as he had been previously instructed, gave the necessary directions as to the model; and so zealous were the very women, as to emulate each other in preparing vestments for the priests, and every thing that could contribute to the honour and service of God.

The necessary preparations being made, a solemn festival and sacrifice were held at the particular institution of Moses, after which they proceeded to the accomplishment of their important undertaking.

Moses erects a tabernacle.

The model.

The outward court was to be 50 cubits in breadth, and 100 in length. On each side were to be 20 brazen pillars long-ways, and 10 a-cross: every pillar was 5 cubits in height, with rings and borders to it of silver. The bases were of brass, curiously wrought and gilt, fastened to the earth with pins of a cubit length, pointed at the end like a spear, which, by means of cords, that passed through the rings, connected the whole, and secured it against the most violent tempests. It was also encompassed by a veil of curiously wrought linen, that hung from the cornices to the bases, and subserved the purpose of a general enclosure.

These were the dimensions of three sides of the structure. It was 50 cubits in front, the space of that is implied in this precept; for it includes all sorts of uncleanness, or the pollution of our bodies in any manner whatever. It prohibits the seduction of young women, and, by implication, forbids the indulging of impure thoughts, or making use of obscene expressions.

(e) It is certainly very wrong for a man to take away the goods of his neighbour, because they are generally either the fruits of his own industry, or what has been left him by his own relations. Were not theft prohibited in the severest manner, there would be an end of honest industry; and the preservation of civil society would be totally destroyed.

(f) To speak ill of our neighbour, when he has done some trifling fault, makes us appear mean-spirited wretches. To utter a falsehood against him while we know it to be such, is a thousand times worse: but when either his life or his property are at stake, to go into a court of judicature, and deliberately commit perjury, is what all nations have constantly abhorred; and the person guilty of it has, on most occasions, been driven out of society.

(g) All the other commandments depend upon this; for if we never covet, or think evil, we shall never be led to do criminal actions.

(h) The word translated tabernacle, signifies a portable tent, that could be removed from one place to another. This was in every respect suitable to the travelling state of the Jews, who, for forty years, had no fixed habitation, but were obliged to dwell in tents in the wilderness. The whole was contrived in such a manner, as to strike the eye of the beholder; and we find, from several passages of the New Testament, particularly in the epistle to the Hebrews, that the tabernacle was, in all respects, a type of the passion of Christ; and there is no wonder that it should be so, seeing he was to be the end of the law; or, in other words, he was to fulfil all righteousness. Indeed, almost every thing in the Mosaic law was typical of our Divine Redeemer, who, in the fulness of time, came and fulfilled all the ceremonies, as well as the ceremonial law.

twenty was left open for an entrance, with two columns on each side of the passage. These were covered with silver work; only the bases were of brass. To strengthen the work, six other planks, three on each hand, were conjoined, and a curtain, curiously wrought, drawn over them. The grand entrance being twenty cubits wide, and five in depth, was ornamented with an elegant embroidery of flowers and figures of variegated colours, but not one representing any living creature.

The position of the tabernacle.

In the center of this court stood the tabernacle, fronting the east, that it might receive the radiant beams of the rising sun. It was 30 cubits in length, and 12 in breadth. One side of it looked towards the south, another to the north, and the back part of it to the west. The two sides were composed of 40 wooden planks, 20 on each side. They were of a quadrangular form, a cubit and a half in breadth, and in thickness four fingers. They were plated with gold; two tenons to every plank; and two silver bases, with mortises, to receive those tenons. On the west side were six other boards, likewise overlaid with gold, and connected in so masterly a manner, that they seemed an entire piece. These twenty boards being each of them a cubit and a half over, just amount to the length of thirty cubits. The six boards on the western side were no more than nine cubits; but then they were joined by two planks, one at each corner, in the same position, and of the same length and breadth with the other, but much thicker, the more effectually to secure that side of the tabernacle. There were golden rings, or staples, driven into every plank, and disposed in such order, that they answered each other in a direct line. Through these rings passed several bars five cubits long, and plated with gold, which reaching from end to end, kept the whole quarter firm and compact. At the lower end of this structure the boards were all arranged in the same manner, by passing a gilt bar through as many rings as there were plates, and accommodating one bar to another. There were, moreover, bolts and staples at the corners, to connect ends and sides, which, with the help of mortises, to bind one piece to another, secured the tabernacle from the violence of wind and weather.

The division and mystery of the taber-

The inside of the tabernacle was divided into partitions of ten cubits in length. At ten cubits from the bottom there stood four pillars across, of the same workmanship, the same materials, and the same bases as those already described, but standing at equal distances from each other. Within these pillars was the most holy place, which was inaccessible even to the priests, to whom the rest of the tabernacle was open. The division of the tabernacle into three parts, seems to have borne some resemblance to the universe. The first part, into which the priests were not permitted to enter, represented heaven, sacred to the Deity alone. The space of twenty cubits, to which the priests only had admittance, had some resemblance to the earth and sea.

At the entrance of the tabernacle were five gilded columns, fixed upon bases of brass, and covered with curtains of fine yarn, dyed of variegated colours, and interwoven. The first of these curtains was ten cubits square, and served as a covering to the partition between the most holy place and the holy, to veil the former.

tains.

The temple itself was called Holy; but the space between the four pillars bore the name of Sanctum Sanctorum. The curtain, or veil, was embellished with curious flowers and figures, living creatures only excepted. There was another veil in every respect equal to the former, which encompassed the five pillars at the entrance. It was fastened at the top with hooks and eyes, and so down to the middle of the five columns, leaving the rest open for the priests to enter. This veil had another over it of the same size, and almost contiguous, but of flaxen ground. It had rings, with a string through them, to draw at pleasure, especially on festival days, to indulge the people with a view of the under curtain, curiously embellished with embroidery. At other times, and particularly in boisterous weather, the upper curtain served as a covert to secure the inner, being composed of a stuff that was proof against rain. This kind of curtain has been used at the door of the temple, from the building of it to the present day.

The Holy of Holies.

There were likewise ten pieces of hanging, in compass twenty-eight cubits, in depth four cubits, and so nicely connected with golden loops, as to seem one entire piece. These hangings covered the whole tabernacle, within one foot of the ground. There were also eleven hangings more of the same depth, but thirty cubits in length, woven, with the same art, of hair, as the others were of wool. These were a covering to the other ten, and, as they negligently flowed upon the ground, in some degree resembled a canopy. The eleventh served to cover the entrance. These were covered with divers skins, as an outward tegument to preserve them from the effects of heats or rains. The spectacle, indeed, was an object of admiration, as the columns shone with such lustre as to resemble the firmament of heaven.

The tabernacle, thus finished, they proceeded to the construction of the ark of God, which was framed of a particular wood, durable and impenetrable in its nature, called, by the Hebrews, heron. The figure was as follows: It was two cubits and an half in length, one and an half in breadth, and as much in depth, and so covered with the purest gold, that no part of the wood was to be seen. The cover was cramped with golden hooks, so well finished, and so smooth in every part, that there was no danger of its sustaining any damage from rubbing. At the two ends were rivetted into the frame four golden rings, one at each corner. Through these rings were passed two gilded bars on each side, to remove the ark from place to place, as occasion might require; for it was never shifted but on the shoulders of the priests and Levites. On the cover were two figures, which the Hebrews call cherubims, having wings according to the description of what Moses saw about the Divine throne, and unseen by mortal before. In this ark were deposited the two tables of the decalogue. Each table comprised five of the commandments, two and a half in a column. The ark was laid up in the sanctuary.

In this holy place was a table not unlike that at Delphi, two cubits in length, one in breadth, and a cubit and an half in height. The feet, from the middle downwards, resembled those the Dorians make use of for their beds; but from thence upwards, they were square, with a border projecting about four fingers, and a crown of gold over it and under it on every side. Under this border were four rings of gold, fastened into the upper part of the four feet, one at each corner; and gilt bars of the finest wood passed through them, and served as handles on its removal from place to place. This table stood in the temple towards the north, not far from the sanctuary itself. There were placed on it twelve loaves of unleavened bread, in two rows, six on each side. They were made of the finest flour, two assarons in quantity, or seven attic cotylas, after the Hebrew measure, each cake containing two omers. Over these loaves were two golden dishes of incense. At the end of seven days these loaves were taken away, and others put in their places. The seventh day we call our Sabbath: but of this hereafter.

show-bread.

The unleavened bread.

Opposite this table, on the south side, stood a golden candlestick, of hollow cast. It weighed an hundred moises, which the Hebrews call chinchares, and the Greeks talents. This candlestick was wrought with bowls, lilies, pomegranates, and small cups, all in pure gold, to the number of seventy pieces, which shot from the shank into seven branches, answering to the number of the planets, and they were ranged in uniform order. On the top of these seven branches were as many lamps, which, according to the position of the candlestick, faced towards the east and the south.

candlestick.

Between the candlestick and the table was a little altar for incense, made of the same durable wood with the ark. It was in length and breadth a cubit, and in height two. It had a golden fire-hearth, and a crown of the purest gold round about from corner to corner, with rings and staves through them for the convenience of carriage.

incense.

There was also another altar before the tabernacle, of the same materials with the former, five cubits square, and three in height, and finished after the same design, excepting its being plated with brass, and its having in the middle, a brazen grate for the ashes to fall through. There were also funnels, phials, censers, cups, and other necessities for the service of the altar, all of pure gold. Thus much for for the Tabernacle, and the vessels thereunto appertaining.

The Effen, or Logion.

WE now proceed to treat of the vestments appointed both for the priests in ordinary, called Chaaneans, and the Anarabaches, or High Priest, and shall begin with the former. No priest could officiate, according to law, without being first purified. His under garment was of fine twisted linen, made in the form of drawers. The Hebrews call it a manachafe, or binder. The feet were put through it, and being drawn over the thighs, it was fastened at the waistband. Over this was a garment of very fine linen, which the Hebrews call chethemene, that is, a linen cloth, as Chethem is taken from the flax of which it was made. It sat close, had narrow sleeves, and reached down to the heels. It was fastened with a girdle round the middle, about four fingers broad; and so curiously adorned with needle-work of different colours, that it bore some resemblance to the skin of a snake. It was ornamented with variegated flowers and figures, but the ground was linen. This girdle went twice about the body of the priest, and, for the sake of a graceful appearance, hung from the breast to the feet; except when in the exercise of his function, on which occasion he cast it over his left shoulder, that it might not encumber him. Moses calls this girdle abaneth; but we now call it emian, a word borrowed from the Babylonians. This garment was made without plaits or folds, wide in the neck, and buckled before and behind. The Hebrew name is massaba-anzes.

The priest wore a kind of mitre, or bonnet, resembling a small helmet, and covering rather more than half his head. It is called masnaemphthes, made of linen, and bound with a fillet to keep it steady. This was covered with a cap of curious fine linen, which came so low, that the smallest part of it could not be seen; and every part was so secured, as to prevent its falling or encumbering the priest in his office. Such were the vestments of the priests in ordinary.

The high-priest, besides the ornaments already described, had others peculiar to his office. He wore a purple robe that reached down to his ancles, which we call metbir, with a girdle, for colours and figures, resembling the beforementioned, excepting the addition of an intermixture of gold. The skirt of this vest was trimmed with a fringe, and hung round with pomegranates, and golden bells of curious workmanship, interchangeably placed at equal distances from each other. This garment was without seam, and had no opening, except lengthways, a little below the shoulders, behind and about the middle of the breast before, with two borders, one to cover the opening, and another as a kind of ornament to that part of it that was left for the arms to pass through the sleeves.

Over this vestment was a third, called the ephod, and much the same with the epomis of the Greeks. It was a cubit in length, embroidered with variegated colours, intermixed with gold, and covered the whole breast. It had likewise sleeves, and was, in effect, a kind of additional ornament.

Upon the fore part of this robe, and in the middle of the breast, was left a vacant space for the essen, which the Greeks call logion, and the Latins, rationale, that is, the oracle. This square piece exactly filled up the vacant space. There were golden rings at each corner, through which ran purple ribbons, to connect the ephod and the rationale. The high-priest wore, upon each shoulder, a sardonyx, set in gold, which served as buckles to clasp one part of the ephod to the other. They had golden ringlets to bind them and the rationale together. Upon these stones were engraved, in Hebrew characters, the names of Jacob's twelve sons; the six elder on the right shoulder, and the other six on the left. The essen, or rationale, was distinguished also by twelve stones, of such extraordinary magnitude and lustre, that, for value and ornament, were inestimable. They were disposed in four rows, at three in a row, and so divided from each other by little partitions of gold, as to secure them from falling out. In the first row was a sardonyx, a topaz, and an emerald; in the second, a ruby, a jasper, and a sapphire; in the third, a lygyrius, an amethyst, and an agate; and in the fourth, a chrysolite, an onyx, and a beryl. Upon these twelve precious stones were severally inscribed the names of Jacob's twelve sons, whom we deem the heads of our tribes; so that the names were inserted in the order of seniority. And as hooks were too weak to sustain the weight of these precious stones, stronger fastenings were fixed to the upper part of the rationale, that projected from the work of the garment. To this were annexed two wreathed golden chains, that were conveyed, by secret passages, up to the shoulder-piece. The upper end of these chains was carried about to the back, and hooked with a ring behind upon the border of the ephod; and by this means the whole was kept in a firm and uniform state. There was also fixed to the rationale a girdle, of the colour beforementioned, but interwoven with gold. It went twice about the body, and being tied in a knot before, the two ends were left flowing, with a curious gold fringe as an ornament to each.

The high priest's tiara, or mitre, was the same with that of other priests, excepting that it was covered with another of a purple colour, and encircled with a triple crown of gold, on which was raised, in gold, the resemblance of a cup, in form like the bud of a plant, by us called saccharus, and, by the Greeks, hyoscyamos.

For the information of those who may be ignorant of the nature of this plant, it may not be improper briefly to describe it. It commonly rises above three spans high: its root is like that of a turnip, and its leaf like mint: it branches out into a round bud, invested with a coat, which it sheds as the fruit ripens.

The cup, that was placed over the golden crown, was about the size of the joint of the smaller finger, round and hollow, like the inside of a goblet. In figure it was a kind of hemisphere, narrowing a little upwards, and then being dilated towards the brim into the form of a basin, like a pomegranate cut in two. To this there was annexed a round cover (a great natural curiosity) with sharp points, rising out of it like the prickles of a pomegranate. Within this cup and cover, the fruit was nourished and preserved. The seed is like that of the plant Sideritis, or Wall-sage; and the flower like plantane.

Thus was the mitre adorned from the back part of the head round to the temples; but the forehead had a golden plate over it, inscribed with the venerable name of the Deity. Such were the vestments of the high priest.

It is matter of wonder that other nations have imbibed a prejudice against us, as blasphemers of that Divine Being whom they profess to adore. Let any person attend to the structure of the tabernacle, the vestments of the priests, and the vessels used in the performance of our sacred rites, and he must be convinced that our lawgiver was a pious man, and that the clamours against us are mere calumny and slander. The particulars alluded to are a representation of the world, as will appear to every candid observer. The division of the tabernacle into three parts, that is, two for the priests in general, as a place common to all, and free of access, represents the earth and the sea; but the third place, accessible to no mortal, is like the heavens, the peculiar residence of the Deity. The twelve loaves of shew-bread upon the table, denote the twelve months of the year. The candlestick, composed of seventy pieces, refers to the twelve signs of the zodiac, thro' which the seven planets take their course; and the seven lamps, on the top of the seven branches, bears an analogy to the planets themselves. The curtains, with the four colours of their materials, represent the four elements. The linen may signify the earth from whence it was derived, and the purple the sea, from the blood of a shell-fish, called murex, that gives it the tincture. The violet colour is a symbol of the air, and the scarlet of the fire. The linen garment of the high priest, typifies the earth, and the violet colour the heavens. The pomegranates resemble the lightning, as do the sound of the bells the thunder. The four coloured ephod bears a resemblance to the four elements, and the interweaving it with gold, seems to refer to the rays from which we derive light. The middle of the essen, or rationale, denotes the position of the earth in the center of the world; and the girdle about the body of the priest, the sea, which environs all things. The two stones of sardonyx signify the sun and moon; and the twelve other stones the twelve signs in the circle, which the Greeks call Zodiac. The purple coloured tiara, or mitre, hath an allusion to heaven; and the triple crown and plate may point out the glory of the Majesty on high.

The tabernacle and priests' vestments are figures of the universe.

This shall suffice for the present: the sequel will furnish ample matter for the display of the piety and wisdom of our incomparable lawgiver.

C H A P. VIII.

Aaron elected high priest. Tax, rites, and ceremonies. Dedication of the tabernacle and priests. Punishment of death inflicted on Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, for disobeying the injunction of Moses. Sacrifices and gifts of the heads of the tribes. Moses supplicates intimation of the Divine will in the tabernacle.

Levit. viii.
Aaron declared high priest by Moses.

AFTER the tabernacle was completed, but before its consecration, Moses received the Divine command to appoint his brother Aaron high priest, being a man who, from his superior virtues, merited that dignity. To this end, having assembled the multitude, and, by expatiating on his virtues, his affections for them, and the dangers he had encountered in their behalf, obtained their unanimous applause and approbation of the choice of his brother, he thus addressed them.

"The work, O men of Israel, is now completed according to the will of God, through the means and abilities we have derived from his bounty; but as this tabernacle is the place which it pleaseth him to honour with his presence in an especial manner, the choice of a person to officiate in holy things, and make supplication for the people, becomes a main and principal concern. If this important matter had been committed to me, I might have deemed myself entitled to the office; not only from a principal of self-love, but a consciousness of the laborious tasks I have repeatedly performed to promote your interest: but it is the will of the Almighty, that Aaron be raised to the dignity of high priest, as a token of his approbation of his integrity. Let him therefore be invested with the sacred robes, the care of the altars, the performance of sacrifices, and the putting up supplications in behalf of the people. God will vouchsafe graciously to attend, from the singular regard he has shewn for your race, as well as the man appointed by his Divine command to the important office."

(a) The multitude, pleased with this address, unanimously acquiesced in the choice. Indeed, it must be admitted that Aaron, by reason of his descent, alliance to Moses, and many extraordinary qualifications, had superior claim to this honour. He had at this time four sons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar.

Moses gave orders that the remainder of what had been collected for the building of the tabernacle, should be laid out in covers for the sacred vessels, and, indeed, for the general service of the tabernacle itself, to prevent the sustaining of any damage from rain or dust. Having once more convened the people, he levied, by way of impost, from each individual, half a shekel. The shekel is an Hebrew coin, equivalent to four Athenian drachms. They complied without the least reluctance. The number that offered amounted to six hundred and five thousand, five hundred and fifty. All these were persons of free condition, and from twenty to fifty years of age; and the money thus raised was appropriated to the service of the tabernacle.

Then followed the ceremony of the purification of the tabernacle and the priests in this manner. Having taken five hundred shekels worth of choice myrrh, and the like quantity of iris, cinnamon, and balsam (of most fragrant smell) half of the above weight, he caused them all to be pulverized; and being mixed in an hin of oil of olives, (the Hebrew hin contains two Athenian choas) to be boiled up so as to compose an ointment. With this he anointed the priests, the tabernacle, and all the appurtenances, by way of purification. He also gave orders for the odours, and all necessary articles for the altar of incense: but these I shall not enumerate, lest I should be thought too prolix. It is necessary, however, to observe, that twice a day (that is before sun-rise and about sun-set) they were to burn incense, and supply the lamps with purified oil; three of which, in reverence to the Deity, were to remain burning every day upon the sacred candlestick, and the rest were to be lighted in the evening. The artificers, who acquired the greatest reputation in the performance of the various articles heretofore mentioned, were Bezaleel and Aholiab; for they improved and embellished the plans of others, as well as produced plans of their own; but Bezaleel, in the general opinion, had the preference. These grand and important works were finished in seven months; and this period completed a year from the time of their deliverance from out of Egypt.

In the beginning of the second year, in the month called, by the Macedonians, Xanthicus, and by us Nisan, upon the new moon, they dedicated the tabernacle, with all its appurtenances, to the immediate service of God, who vouchsafed to signify his approbation of the same, by the manifestation of his presence in an especial manner. The rest of the sky being serene, a kind of (b) cloud overspread the tabernacle, not dark and gloomy, as precedes a winter storm, but almost penetrable to the human eye: from this distilled a dew giving intimation of the Divine Presence.

Moses having recompensed the several artificers according to their respective merit, offered a sacrifice, at the Divine command, near the porch of the tabernacle, of a bull, a ram, and a kid, for the sins of the people. Of the particular ceremonies I shall speak hereafter. He then with the blood of the victims, sprinkled the vestment of Aaron; purifying both him and his sons with precious ointment and spring water, as priests of the Most High. This ceremony of purification, both of the tabernacle and the priests, was continued for seven successive days; but, on the eighth, a festival was appointed for the people, who, upon that occasion, vied with each other in shewing their liberality. No sooner were the victims placed on the altar, than a spontaneous fire issued from them, the flame of which resembled a flash of lightning, which consumed all before it.

Aaron at the same time was visited with an affliction poignant as could befall a father; but he bore it with becoming patience and resignation; persuaded that nothing could happen without the Divine permission to accomplish the Divine purposes. His two eldest sons, Nadab and Abihu, bringing to the altar other victims than those appointed by Moses, were so scorched by the violence of the flames, that immediate death ensued.

Moses gave orders for their funerals without the camp, and their sudden departure was universally regretted. Their relatives were strictly enjoined not to lament, as it would be unbecoming the sacerdotal office, by which they were solely devoted to the honour of God. Moses, rejecting all dignities proffered him by the people, gave himself wholly up to the service of the Most High. He went no longer to Mount Sinai, but entering the tabernacle, there sought intimation of the Divine will. He appeared in every respect in a private capacity, nor distinguished himself in any instance, but in his care and concern for the common weal. He enacted such laws, for the regulation of the state, as tended to the honour of God, and the interest of the community. These laws, which he gave them in writing, will be particularized on a future occasion.

But here I must digress a little, to make some re-

(a) It is worthy of observation, that the two principal qualifications of the high priest were, that he should have an excellent character for virtuous and good actions, and also that he should have the approbation of the people.

(b) This cloud was afterwards a signal to the Hebrews, by which they knew when to march and when to rest. While the cloud remained on the tabernacle, they continued where it stood; but when the cloud left it, they proceeded in their march.

marks on the priests' vestments, which, in reality, afford no scope to false prophets, or the circulation of their impostures, ■ they can never adduce proofs of the Divine sanction, though the Hebrews had so many indubitable testimonies thereof.

The miraculous lustre of the sardonyx, upon the high priest's right shoulder.

The sparkling of the high priest's jewels a preface of victory.

The sardonyx, which was fixed on the right shoulder of the high priest, shone remarkably bright whilst the Divine Being was propitiously present ■ the sacrifice ■ though the stone has no natural splendour; a circumstance that must raise the admiration of all, but those who effect ■ ridicule whatever is solemn and sacred. Another more extraordinary instance was the indication of victory by the singular brilliancy of the twelve stones affixed to the ephod upon the breast of the high priest, which had so powerful an effect as to assure the people of the Divine aid, upon the approach of a conflict with their enemies. The Greeks confirm, rather than dispute, this point, by terming the ephod, in their language, logion, or oracle. But these extraordinary appearances ceasing two hundred years before I undertook this work, ■ the Deity withdrew such manifestations of his favour from ■ people who proved unworthy, I shall refer them to future consideration, and revert to the former subject.

Oblations of the tribes.

The concerns of the tabernacle and priests being fully settled, the people, elated with assurance of the Divine favour and protection, vied with each other in presenting oblations, and shewing their gratitude to the Author of all mercies. The heads of the twelve tribes offered six waggons, with a yoke of oxen to each, to transport the tabernacle, as occasion might require; besides a silver charger, of an hundred and thirty shekels weight, and a silver bowl, of seventy shekels, both full of fine flour, mingled with oil, ■ be used in the sacrifices, with an incense cup full of perfumes, valued at ten daricks. They offered likewise ■ young bullock, ■ ram, and ■ lamb of a year old, for a burnt-offering, with a he-goat for ■ sin-offering. They brought besides their peace-offerings, that is, two bullocks a day, five rams, with as many lambs and he-goats of a year old. These sacrifices continued for twelve successive days.

As heretofore observed, Moses ceased to ascend the mountain, but received instructions for the formation of laws for regulating the government in the tabernacle. But this subject shall be discussed hereafter.

CHAP. IX.

Description of sacrifices, with their various forms and ceremonies.

Sacrifices particular and public. Leviticus.

SACRIFICES are of two kinds; one for private persons, the other for the people in general; and they are performed in two distinct forms. In the one, all that ■ placed on the altar is consumed, whence it is called holocaust, or burned. The other is in token of thanksgiving, and made as ■ feast to those who perform the ceremony.

A burnt-offering. Bullock.

With respect to the first, a private person brings an ox, a lamb, and a kid; each of the two last one year old; the former may be older; but they must all be males. These being killed, the priests sprinkle the altar with the blood; then having dissected the victim, and sprinkled it with salt, they lay it on the altar, where a fire is already kindled; after which, having cleaned the feet and intestines, they are laid with the rest. The skins are the perquisites of the priests. Such is the form of the burnt-offering, or holocaust.

A peace-offering. Levit. iii.

In sacrifices of peace-offering, or thanksgiving, the victims are of the same kind; but they may be more than a year old, and of different genders. When these are offered, the altar is sprinkled with blood ■ but the reins and caul, and all the fat, with the lobe of the liver, together with the tail of the lamb, are laid upon the altar. The breast, and right shoulder, are reserved for the entertainment of the priests: but what remains may be eaten during two days by the offerers, and the rest must be consumed by fire. The same ceremony is observed in sacrifices for sins: but those who cannot purchase larger victims, may offer two young pigeons or turtles; one of which becomes the perquisite of the priest, and the other is consumed.

A sin-offering.

A peace-offering.

Those who sin through ignorance, offer ■ lamb and ■ female kid, of the same age. The priest besprinkles the altar with the blood, but not in the same manner ■ before, confining it to the extremities, or horns of the altar. The perquisites of the priests, in this case, are the skins, and the flesh, which they must ■ the same day in the tabernacle, as they are prohibited from reserving any thing for the ensuing day. He who is conscious of a sin, though unknown to others; is to bring ■ ram, to be eaten by the priests in the tabernacle the same day. Heads of tribes, making sacrifice for their own sins, offer in the same manner as private men, excepting that they bring ■ bull and a male kid.

Laws for feasts and sacrifices.

In sacrifices, both private and public, the finest flour was to be used: to a lamb, the measure of an ephah; to a ram, two; to a bullock, three. The flour is first mixed with oil; and then consecrated upon the altar. Those who sacrifice bring with them oil in proportion to the victim; for an ox, the half of an hin; for ■ ram, ■ third; and for a lamb, a fourth. They present wine in the same proportion as oil, and sprinkle it about the altar. If any person, without sacrificing, and only to accomplish a vow, brings fine flour, ■ small handful is put upon the altar, and the rest becomes the perquisite of the priest; but whatever the priest offers must be burned. It is forbidden to sacrifice the young of any beast with its dam; and also till it is eight days old. There are other sacrifices for the cure of maladies, where cakes are eaten with the victims; but nothing must be reserved till the next morning, after the priests have taken such parts as law allots them.

CHAP. X.

Manner of celebrating festivals, with an account of divers solemnities.

ACCORDING to positive command, a lamb of a year old must be daily offered at the public charge; one in the morning, and the other in the evening: but two were to be sacrificed on the seventh, or sabbath-day, at the times stated above. Upon the solemnities of the new moons, besides the daily offerings, they present seven lambs of a year's growth, ■ ram, and a kid, as an expiation of those sins of omission, which happen through forgetfulness. Upon the seventh month (which the Macedonians call Hyperberetus) in addition to the above mentioned are offered a bullock, one sheep, seven lambs, and a kid. On the tenth of the same month they fast till evening, and sacrifice the same day a young bullock, two rams, seven lambs, and a goat for a sin offering. Besides these, two kids are brought, one of which is sent into the desert, as a scape-goat, or general expiation for sin: the other is carried a short space from the tents, and by fire reduced to ashes. In like manner they sacrifice the bullock, which is not produced at the public charge, but at the expence of the high priest. After the death, the blood both of the bullock and kid, being conveyed into the tabernacle, the priest sprinkles the cover, with his fingers dipped in it, seven times, upwards and downwards; and taking the remainder into the court, he pours it about the great altar. The high priest also presents a ram for ■ burnt-offering.

Numb. xxviii. & xxix.

Upon the fifteenth day of the same month (winter now approaching) the people were commanded to pitch their tents contiguous to each other, as more convenient during the extremity of the inclement season. On their arrival in the promised land, they were to repair to the metropolis as the seat of the holy temple, and there to celebrate a festival for the space of eight days, and offer oblations of various kinds unto the Almighty, bearing in their hands a bundle, composed of myrtle, willow, palm, and citron.

On the first of these eight days they were to sacrifice thirteen oxen, fourteen lambs, two rams, and a kid, for a sin-offering. The number of the lambs and rams, with the goat, were to be the same for six days; but one bullock was to be abated daily, till the number was reduced to seven. The eighth was to be a day of rest, and observed as before described. This was the Feast of Tabernacles upon the Hebrews erecting their tents, and is constantly observed by our nation.

new moon, the sun being then in the first sign of the Zodiac, called Aries, we are commanded to solemnize an anniversary sacrifice, called pascho, in commemoration of our deliverance out of Egypt. This feast is celebrated in tribes, without any reserve of what is offered. It is succeeded by that of the azymes, or unleavened bread, which commences the fifteenth, and continues seven days, during which are diurnally sacrificed two bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs, for a burnt-offering, which are all consumed by fire; to which is added a kid as a sin-offering, as a donation to the priests.

On the second day of this festival they begin to taste of the fruits of the earth, which, though gathered the preceding harvest season, remain till that time untouched. But previous to this, as a token of their gratitude to that Being from whom they derive every mercy, they offer the first fruits of the barley, in the following manner: having dried a handful of the ears, and, by beating, cleaned it from the chaff, they offer an assaron of the same upon the altar, leaving the rest for the use of the priests. After this ceremony they are allowed to avail themselves of the produce of the harvest at discretion. With these first fruits they likewise present a lamb for a holocaust.

Seven weeks (or forty-nine days) being elapsed after the passover, upon the fiftieth day, which the Hebrews call assartha, (of the same signification as pentecost, a fiftieth,) they offered two assarons of leavened bread made of the finest flour, and two lambs as a sacrifice. These being solely oblations to the Deity, after the ceremony devolve to the priests, who make a reserve of them to the next day. The burnt-offerings consisted of three calves, two rams, and fourteen lambs, besides two kids for a sin-offering. No festival is celebrated without a burnt-offering, and desisting from manual labour, and all their forms and ceremonies are prescribed by laws. The unleavened bread, composed of twenty-four assarons of fine flour, was furnished at the public charge. The loaves are prepared the day before the sabbath, and in the morning are placed upon the sacred table, in the same order, and devoted in the same manner, as before described. The incense being cast into the sacred fire in which the burnt-offerings were consumed, fresh was supplied upon fresh loaves. The high priest, at his own charge, offered twice a day of the finest flour, mixed with oil, and a little hardened by fire. The measure of the flour is an assaron. But of these ceremonies I shall treat more largely on a future occasion.

CHAP. XI.

Purification, with its particular laws, forms, and ceremonies.

Numb. iii. The tribe of Levi set apart to minister to the priests in holy things.

Levit. xii. 1. Persons clean and unclean.

MOSESES, having separated the tribe of Levi, as selected for the immediate service of God, purified them with spring water and sacrifices adapted to the occasion. To their charge he committed the tabernacle with its appurtenances, and appointed them to minister to the priests, being consecrated and set apart to that office. An ordinance was likewise established, respecting abstinence from certain living creatures. The eating of blood was most solemnly prohibited, as containing the very life of the animal; as was also the flesh of beasts that died of themselves, together with the caul of goats, sheep, or oxen. Leprous persons were separated from society. Women, at certain temporary returns, were restricted from male intercourse for the space of seven days. Those who assisted at funerals were debarred from converse for the same space. In a word, such as laboured under any infection, or had rendered themselves by any means unclean and obnoxious, were either subject to certain modes of purification, or secluded from society. Those who recovered from leprosy, or any infectious diseases, were enjoined to testify their gratitude, by offering oblations according to the best of their abilities.

This proves the envy and fallacy of a fabulous report that Moses fled out of Egypt, because he was infected with a leprosy, and that the Hebrews, whom he conducted towards the land of Canaan, laboured, in general, under that disease: for, had that been the case, Moses would not have formed a law that reflected disgrace on himself, or countenanced such a law if proposed by another. Besides, in many other nations, persons infected with that disease are not only exempt from the injunctions laid upon the Hebrews, but admitted to offices of the first dignity, both in the army and the state, as well as to religious privileges in general. Furthermore, admitting that Moses had been infected according to this report, he might have introduced causes in particular statutes to obviate the odium and penalty annexed to the same. It is therefore evident that malice is the source of this obloquy, and that the statutes were ordained from laudable motives. But let every man judge for himself.

Vindication of Moses.

Women, after delivery of a male child, were forbidden the temple for forty days. On their entrance they were to present their oblations, of which one part was consecrated, and the other belonged to the priests.

Levit. xii. Laws for women in childbirth.

If any man suspected his wife of adultery, he was to bring an assaron of barley meal, and casting an handful upon the altar, the rest was reserved for the priests. Then one of the priests, placing the woman in the porch opposite the temple, and uncovering her head, writes the sacred name of the Deity on a parchment, and causes her to swear, with deadly imprecations on herself if perjured, that she has not violated her chastity: but if the suspicion arises thro' excess of love or jealousy, to implore that in ten months after she may bring forth a son. After this solemnity the priest dips the parchment in water to erase the sacred name, pours it into a phial, and then taking some of the dust of the temple, and mingling it with the same, gives it to the woman to drink. If she has been unjustly accused, she should prove pregnant, and bring forth a child; but if guilty, she should die an ignominious death. These are the laws prescribed by Moses concerning sacrifices and purifications. Those respecting other particulars are as follow.

For adultery or jealousy.

CHAP. XII.

Various laws respecting adultery, incest, and the marriage of priests. Cessation from tillage every seventh year. The year of jubilee. Customs of war. Disposition of the army. Uses of the trumpets of silver.

ADULTERY was most solemnly prohibited, conjugal fidelity being justly deemed the basis of social happiness, as well as most effectual security of the property and interest of the state in general, and of private families in particular. Incest, deviations from the laws of decency, and unnatural propensities in general, were likewise strictly forbidden; and those who transgressed were severely punished.

But the priests were enjoined to observe laws more rigid (a) than the people in common, being commanded to abstain not only from enormous crimes, but interdicted from marrying women cast off, or such as were prisoners, that had dwelt in any house of common reception, or had been divorced from any cause whatever. The high-priest was not permitted even to marry a widow, (though lawful for the other priests,) but had liberty only to take a virgin to wife. He was also forbidden to approach a dead person, whilst other priests were allowed to see their deceased relatives.

Particular restrictions on the priests.

Priests, in general, were to be men of integrity, of manners, and of sound body. If any one received an accidental blemish, he was allowed his portion with the other priests, but not permitted to minister in holy things. Purity was not only enjoined them in the performance of their sacred functions, but they were to preserve a rectitude of manners throughout their general conduct. Those, therefore, who entered on the sacerdotal office, were to be men chaste and abstemious. They were forbidden the use of wine in

(a) These words of Josephus are remarkable, that the Law-giver of the Jews required of the priest a double degree of purity in comparison of that required of the people, of which he gives several instances. This was also the case amongst the first Christians, of the clergy in comparison of the laity, as the apostolical constitutions and canons every where inform us.

their vestments, and were to offer up entire sacrifices without any defect.

These laws were to be observed during their continuance in the desert; but there were others that were not to take place till they should enter into possession of the land of Canaan. Every seventh year the earth was neither tilled or planted, as the people ceased from labour every seventh day. The spontaneous product was to be common without reservation, for the use of strangers as well as natives. The same decree was to take effect at the expiration of seven times seven years; and the year following being the fiftieth, was called, by the Hebrews, jubilee or liberty. All debtors, on this occasion, were to be released from imprisonment; bondmen, enjoined to servitude for transgressions of the laws, were to be set free; and all lands were to be restored to their first proprietors after this manner. Upon the approach of the jubilee, the seller and purchaser met together, and took an estimate of the profits and expences that had been derived from and laid out on the land. If the former exceeded the latter, the seller immediately received possession; but if the contrary appeared, the purchaser, on satisfaction made him for the deficiencies, reinstated the seller in his property. If the profits and expences were equal, restitution was made to the antient possessor. The same law held good with respect to houses; for if the seller, within the space of the year, refunded the purchase money, the buyer restored him the premises; but if the year was expired, and the money not deposited, it became the legal property of the purchaser. These laws Moses received from the Divine intimation upon Mount Sinai, and they were by him communicated to the Hebrews for their due observation.

All matters relative to civil government being thus adjusted, Moses turned his thoughts to such concerns as respected the army. He issued a mandate to all the heads of tribes (that of Levi excepted) to muster, and make a report of all who were able to bear arms, in consequence of which they were found to amount to six hundred and three thousand and upwards, between the years of twenty and fifty. In the place of Levi (whose tribe was exempt from military engagements) he raised Manasses, the son of Joseph, as leader, and for Joseph substituted

While the army was encamped (a) the tabernacle was pitched in the center, and guarded by three tribes, who took their respective stations. Between them were left spaces to pass and repass. They had likewise a market, and goods exposed to sale by artizans of the different occupations, so that it resembled a trading city. The priests were assigned their posts round about the tabernacle, and next to them the Levites (for of them there were, by computation, males, exceeding the age of thirty, 23,880) as they officiated as assistants in holy concerns. During the time that the cloud hovered over the tabernacle, in token of the Divine presence, the people remained in the same places, and moved as they were directed by the cloud.

Moses invented a trumpet, made of silver, according to this model: in length it was almost a cubit; it was a little thicker than a flute; the pipe was strait; and the cavity, which was to convey and receive the wind, ended in the form of a bell, like trumpets in common. It is called, in the Hebrew language, a sophra. There were two of these trumpets made; one was to call the people to general assemblies, and the other to summon the heads of the tribes to hold consultation on the affairs of state; but at the sound of both, the princes, or heads, and the people, were to assemble in general.

The tabernacle was moved in this solemn order: On the first alarm of the trumpet, those who were encamped towards the east dislodged; on the next those to the southward; then the tabernacle was unfixed, and carried in the center, between six tribes in the front, and six in the rear, all the Levites officially attending. At the third alarm those to the westward moved; and at the fourth those on the north followed them. These trumpets were also used on sacred occasions, both on the sabbath and other days. Then also was the first passover celebrated by our ancestors, after that in the desert, in commemoration of their deliverance from Egyptian bondage.

The whole form, order, and mode of encampment of the Israelites, with the disposition of the twelve tribes, and the respective numbers of each, will be seen, at one view, by the following table.

(a) Each of these camps had its peculiar banner or standard, and each standard its motto or inscription. Each standard had likewise a distinct figure marked on it. Reuben's standard had the figure of a man; Judah's, of a lion; Ephraim, of an ox; and Dan's, that of an eagle. The same four creatures are used by the prophet Ezekiel in the description of his first vision. Every cherub is said to have had four faces; the face of a man, to shew his understanding; of a lion, to shew his power; of an ox, to shew his ministerial office; and of an eagle, to shew his swiftness in the execution of God's will. Under the same four, in the opinion of the Fathers, are represented the four Evangelists. The Man represents St. Matthew, because he begins his Gospel with the generation of Christ; the Lion, St. Mark, because he begins his Gospel from the voice of the lion roaring in the wilderness; the Ox, St. Luke, because he begins with Zacharias, the priest; and the Eagle, St. John, who, soaring aloft, beginneth with the divinity of Christ.

Sedition against Moses. Hebrews obtain relief. Punished for mutiny.

The people become seditionous again for want of food.

Second miracle of quails.

SOON after the Hebrews left Mount Sinai, and, after a few stations by the way, they arrived at a place called Jeremoth. There the people again began to be mutinous, and to blame Moses for the hardships they had encountered in their travels; charging him with having persuaded them to leave a fertile country, and now reduced them to a necessity of wandering about in a state of misery and want, inasmuch, that they had not water to drink, and should it happen that manna failed them, they must inevitably perish. Whilst they were loading him with the bitterest invectives, notwithstanding his consummate abilities, one of the multitude stepped forth, and exhorted them to regard him with gratitude for the wonders he had done for them, nor ever despair of the aid and assistance of the Almighty. But this friendly admonition incensed them the more, and increased their spleen against Moses, who, nevertheless, encouraged them in their despairing situation, and assured them that, notwithstanding the obloquy he had received at their hands, he would procure for them a store of provisions, not for one, but for many days. When they remained incredulous, and one of them asked whence he could raise provision for so numerous a body, he answered, "The great God and his servant, notwithstanding your reproaches, will never cease to be careful for you, as you will shortly perceive." Scarce had he spoken this, when the camp was covered with quails, (a) of which they took great numbers. However they were soon punished for their insolent reproaches, by so great a (b) plague amongst them, that the place retains the memory of their destruction to this day, and is called Cabrothaba, or Kibroth-hattavah; or, The Sepulchres of concupiscence.

CHAP. XIV.

Spies sent to Canaan. Multitude differently affected by their report. Mutiny against Moses. Appeased by Caleb and Joshua. Moses and Aaron intercede for the people. Their prayers heard.

Numb. xiii. 14.

WHEN Moses had conducted the Hebrews from thence to a place called Pharan, or the Straits, upon the confines of Canaan, he summoned the heads to a council, and thus addressed them. "Of the two great benefits, liberty and the possession of an happy country, promised you by the God of truth, you already enjoy the one, and the other will speedily follow. We are now on the borders of Canaan, nor can the force of united nations deprive us of the acquisition of it. Let us, therefore, prepare for a vigorous exertion, we cannot expect that the inhabitants will resign their title without resistance, or that we should obtain a conquest without resolution. My counsel is, that certain spies be sent out to survey the country, and the strength of the inhabitants. But above all things let me recommend unanimity, and a firm reliance on the power and protection of the Almighty."

Spies are sent to the land of Canaan.

The proposal of Moses met with general approbation, and twelve men of the first rank, one out of each tribe, were appointed as spies. Having surveyed the land of Canaan from the borders of Egypt, they came to mount Libanus, and having explored the nature of the soil, as well as the inhabitants, they returned after an absence of forty days. They

(a) Commentators have differed in their opinions what this food was, which we translate quails; some endeavouring to prove that our translation is right, whilst others attempt to shew, that, instead of quails, the word should have been rendered locusts. The original term implies both, and perhaps both were sent at the same time. They complained for want of variety, and therefore God might give them the variety they lusted after. The Psalmist seems to favour this interpretation, when he says, that God rained flesh upon them as thick as dust, and feathered fowls as the sand of the sea, Psal. lxxviii. 27.

(b) Or, as some writers say, the leprosy, which proceeds from brought with them samples of the fruits of the land, pointed out their excellence, and gave so pleasing an account of the country in general, as to inspire the people with resolution to engage in a contest. But they were dismayed on the other hand by the difficulty of the acquisition, being informed that the rivers were so wide and deep as to be impassable, and the mountains so steep as to be inaccessible; also that their cities were strongly fortified with walls and bulwarks. They also reported that, in Hebron, they had found the posterity of the giants. Upon the whole the spies, intimidated themselves, represented the difficulties and horrors they had encountered in such a light, as struck the multitude with consternation; so that giving up the conquest as impracticable, they dissolved the assembly, and returned home to their wives and children deploring their fate, as if the great Arbiter of all things had promised that which would never be effected. They also blamed Moses, and reviled both him and his brother Aaron, the high priest. They passed the night in disquiet and reproaches, and in the morning re-assembled in a tumultuous manner, with an intention (c) to stone both Moses and Aaron, and then return to Egypt.

The multitude at first encouraged, but afterwards dismayed, at the report of the spies.

Another mutiny against Moses, with a resolution of returning to Egypt.

Caleb and Joshua endeavour to appease the people.

Moses and Aaron intercede for them. Their prayers prevail.

But two of the spies, Joshua, the son of Nun, of the tribe of Ephraim, and Caleb, of the tribe of Judah, fearful of the consequences of these tumults, rushed into the midst of the multitude, whom they endeavoured to appease, by desiring them not to despair of the accomplishment of the Divine promises, from any rumours that had been spread respecting the situation of affairs in Canaan, and exhorting them to attend to those who would be the principal agents in bringing about the expected event. "For (continued they) neither the height of mountains, nor the depth of rivers, can deter men of valour from the attempt, especially when they rely on the Divine aid. Let us, therefore, go forward without dismay, and in full confidence of victory, having the arm of Omnipotence to protect and defend us." Thus did they endeavour at once to appease the multitude, and inspire them with resolution; whilst Moses and Aaron, falling prostrate, humbly besought the Almighty, not for their own safety, but that he would be pleased to restore the despairing people to a quiet mind, who were now in such a state of tumult and disorder. The cloud then appeared, and resting upon the tabernacle, gave testimony of the Divine Presence.

CHAP. XV.

Moses foretells that the Israelites should wander in the desert forty years. They repent. Instances of the authority of Moses.

MOSES now boldly presented himself to the multitude, and informed them, that the Almighty, provoked at their outrages, was determined to punish them; not, indeed, according to their deserts, but as tender parents chastised their children. For, that while he continued in the tabernacle, and besought Him in their behalf, he had recounted the benefits conferred upon them, and the many instances of their ingratitude and disobedience, particularly in giving more credit to the report of the spies than to his promise; for which cause, though he would not exterminate their whole race, (whom he had preferred to the rest of mankind,) yet he would not permit them to take possession of the land of Canaan, nor enjoy its abundance, but would cause them to wander in the desert for forty years; promising, at the same time, to their children, the possession and enjoyment of those good things, which they had forfeited by their murmuring and disobedience."

a precarious and ill disposition of the blood and juices; but the more immediate cause is an infinity of small imperceptible worms, that insinuate themselves between the flesh and the skin, which prey upon the scarf skin, then upon the inner skin, and afterwards upon the extremities of the nerves and muscles, from whence arises a total corruption of the whole mass of blood.

(c) From this design it appears evident that the children of Israel were very obdurate hard hearted wretches; for, although God was daily working miracles in their sight, yet they would not believe, nor would they trust in him.

When Moses had communicated these particulars, the people were greatly affected, and entreated him to procure their reconciliation with the offended Majesty of Heaven, that they might not continue to lead a wandering life, but be indulged with a permanent residence. But he replied, that this was inadmissible; for the Almighty was not incensed against them after the manner of men, but had, for his own wise ends, denounced that punishment which could not be averted. Nor is it improbable that Moses, though but a single individual, should pacify such multitudes; for he was assisted by Power Divine, which now wrought the people into a persuasion, that all their calamities were the effect of their contumacy and disobedience.

But Moses was a admirable for his virtue and prevailing influence over the minds and conduct of men, not only during his natural life, but remains so in these our days, there is not one of the Hebrews but holds himself as much bound to obey his ordinances and institutions now, as if he were actually present with them. There are many reasons to suppose that his power was more than human. Amongst others, when certain strangers have travelled from parts beyond the Euphrates, at immense charge and great peril, to honour our temple and offer sacrifice, they were not permitted to partake of the victims, because Moses had forbidden it, from their being disqualified. Some have not sacrificed at all, while others have left their sacrifices unfinished; and many more have been forbidden access to the temple, chusing rather to adhere to the institutions of Moses, than in any one instance indulge their inclinations, and that from motives truly conscientious. Thus did the legislation of Moses appear to be truly Divine.

As another instance, a little before the wars of the Jews, when Claudius was emperor of the Romans, and Ishmael was an high priest, so great a famine prevailed, that an assaron of meal was sold for four drachms; and there was brought to the festival of Azymes the quantity of seventy corus, (which are equal to thirty-one Sicilian, and forty-one Athenian medimni), yet not one of the priests would touch a grain of it, notwithstanding the general distress, and that from an awful dread of the Divine punishment of sin, whatever plea might be urged by the offender.

The singular events of former times, therefore, should not excite our wonder, when we consider that the writings of Moses are in such force even to this day, that our professed enemies acknowledge our government and laws were instituted by God himself, and that through the means of his chosen servant.

CHAP. I.

The Hebrews wage war with the Canaanites without taking counsel from Moses, and are defeated.

The deliverance of the Hebrews, whether they should attack the Canaanites in opposition to the Divine authority.

A dangerous mutiny.

THE troubles and afflictions both of body and mind, to which the Hebrews were continually exposed in the desert, rendered them so desperate, that, notwithstanding the express prohibition of the Almighty, and the most powerful dissuaves of Moses, they determined on a war against the Canaanites, alledging, that God would vouchsafe them his aid, not out of regard to the intercession of Moses, but the especial favour he had shewn their nation from the time of their forefathers, whose virtues he had ever rewarded by singular interpositions of his providence. They had also a presumptuous reliance on their own strength and abilities, though Moses should endeavour to counteract their efforts. Indeed, they seemed to have imbibed a general opinion, that it would redound to their interest to establish a form of government amongst themselves; and that though Moses had been, in some degree, accessary to their deliverance from Egyptian bondage, it did not follow that they were under an obligation of submitting to his tyrannical impositions, as if God had communicated his will and pleasure concerning them from a partial attachment to him. The leaders of this design took care also to insinuate, that as they were all the posterity of Abraham, his vanity and pride were highly censurable, in affecting a foreknowledge of events that should happen to them from Divine intimation peculiar to himself, and that therefore it would be prudent in them to oppose his arrogant pretences, place their sole confidence in the Almighty, for obtaining possession of the country he had promised them, and, from a consideration of the calamities under which they still groaned, immediately proceed to a contest with the Canaanites, depending on the aid of Omnipotence, without the interference of any legislator.

This proposal being universally approved, as the wisest expedient, they sallied forth against their enemies, who not being the least intimidated, either by the attack, or the multitudinous body which made it, resisted so valiantly, that the Hebrews were routed with great slaughter, compelled to a most ignominious flight, and pursued even to their very camp. This unexpected overthrow reduced them to a state of desperation, as from thence they concluded it was inflicted as a punishment from the Almighty, for embarking in an enterprize without his counsel and approbation.

When Moses observed the desponding situation of his countrymen, and that the enemy were elated with their victory, he deemed it proper to withdraw the army into the wilderness, to a farther distance from the Canaanites. The people now resigned themselves up to his guidance, conscious that without him their affairs could not prosper. They accordingly decamped, and retired into the desert, resolving not to make a farther attempt against their enemies, before they were favoured with due intimation of the Divine will.

Moses withdraws the people into the desert.

But as it often happens amongst promiscuous multitudes, especially upon ill success, that the herd grows headstrong and disobedient to command, so it was with respect to the Hebrews upon this occasion; for amounting in number to six hundred thousand, and even in their better fortunes, having been refractory to their governors, they were now more exasperated by their distresses. This occasioned a sedition, of which there cannot be adduced a similar instance amongst the Greeks, or even Barbarians. It would have proved destructive, had not Moses, forgetting their designs on his life, interposed in their behalf. Nor were they totally abandoned by that Almighty power which had so often protected them; and now, notwithstanding the indignities they offered their law-giver, and their disobedience to the Divine commands, delivered them from that danger into which they brought themselves by their mutiny and rebellion, as will appear from the sequel.

The soldiers' mutiny; yet Moses interposes in their behalf.

CHAP.

CHAP. II.

Sedition of Corah and the multitude against Moses and his brother Aaron, concerning the priesthood. Corah raises a mutiny, and detaches many of the leaders from Moses, who addresses them upon that occasion.

CORAH, an Hebrew of great wealth and influence, and famous for his eloquence, becoming jealous of the dignity to which Moses had attained, raised a clamour against him amongst the Levites, who were of the same tribe, by suggesting to them, in an occasional harangue, "That it redounded to their dishonour thus tamely to suffer Moses, under pretence of the Divine command, to retain an unlimited authority, vest the priesthood in his brother Aaron without their suffrages, and bestow places of honour and profit at pleasure. He added, that these measures were the more oppressive and grievous, founded on the arts of sophistry and insinuation; that those who are conscious of deserving posts of dignity, endeavour to obtain them not by force, but mild persuasion; that it was the interest of a state to check the ambition of such aspiring individuals, before they acquired an influence that might prove destructive." He demanded by what authority Moses had conferred the priesthood on Aaron and his sons? enforced his own title as superior to theirs, both by descent and property; that if it was the will of God, it should be vested in the tribe of Levi; and concluded with observing, that if the honour appertained to the most ancient of the tribes, that of Reuben should enjoy it, in which cases it would fall to the lot of Dathan, Abiram, or Peleth, as claimants from antiquity and opulence."

This address of Corah might have had the semblance of public virtue; but it was dictated by interested principles, to raise a tumult, and obtrude himself into the office of the priesthood. In a short time, indeed, it had, in some degree, the desired effect; for the opinions he advanced being industriously propagated by his party, as well as exaggerated by report, those who were averse to the interest of Aaron, raised a party of two hundred and fifty to join in this conspiracy, wrest the priesthood from him, and transfer it to Corah. Nay, the multitude were so far prevailed on by these factious proceedings, that they attempted to stone Moses, and surrounded the tabernacle in tumultuous uproar, exclaiming, that the tyrant should be exterminated, who, under the pretext of the Divine command, had reduced them to a state of abject slavery; and adding, that if God had chosen one to the office of high priest, he would not have conferred it on a person who was far inferior to others; and also if it had been so decreed, Aaron would undoubtedly have obtained it by the suffrages of the people, and not the usurped authority of his brother.

Moses, conscious of his integrity, and that the appointment of his brother to the priesthood was pursuant to the Divine will, was by means dismayed by the calumny of Corah, nor its effect upon the incensed multitude, in whose presence he thus addressed their factious leader.

"I readily grant (said he) that you, Corah, and your associates, are all worthy of honour; but I condemn not the rest of the assembly, though inferior to you in riches, and other endowments. Aaron was not appointed to the office of high priest for his wealth, (for you are more opulent,) nor for his nobility; for in that we are equal, deriving our origin from the same progenitor. Nor have I deprived any man of his right in what I conferred on my brother. Nay, if I had not been actuated by becoming motives, I should have taken the office upon myself. Besides, it would have been the height of folly to expose myself to danger by an act of injustice, from which another might reap benefit, exclusive of myself; but far be from me such impiety and injustice. The Almighty

"would neither have suffered his honour to be thus violated, or you to have remained in such ignorance of what was acceptable to him. It was God who chose the priest: it is God who absolves me from the charge of criminality. But now admitting that Aaron holds the office by Divine appointment, without any partiality on my part, he shall rest his cause on your suffrages, without insisting upon the legality of what has passed, though with your approbation. This proposal is to convince you that ambition is not his motive, and that he is ready to part with his just right provided it could be the means of suppressing your seditions. It would have been highly impious to have refused an office of Divine appointment; so that the acceptance of it can be no just ground of offence. But as it is more reasonable that the donor should confirm the gift, let the matter be once again referred to the Divine appointment, and then you may abide by the person so chosen to the sacred function. Surely Corah would not be so presumptuous as to question the Divine right of appointing the office of high priest. One day, without farther controversy, will bring this point to an issue. Let all the claimants appear tomorrow with their censers in their hands, with fire and incense in them. You, Corah, must patiently wait the Divine determination, without presuming to arrogate a pre-eminence, but appear amongst the competitors. Nor do I see what should exclude Aaron from putting in his claim, as he hath hitherto maintained an unexceptionable character in the exercise of his function, and is also of the same tribe with yourself. When you are all together, you shall offer incense in the presence of the people; and let that person whose offerings shall be most acceptable in the sight of God, be declared and confirmed high priest. This will decide the point in dispute, and acquit me of the charge, as malevolently as falsely alledged against me."

CHAP. III.

Tremendous judgment on the authors of the sedition. The office of high priest confirmed to Aaron and his sons.

THIS address of Moses not only appeased the clamour of the multitude, but disposed them in his favour, as a person in every respect qualified to fill the character he represented; and hereupon the assembly separated.

The next day the people re-assembled to attend the sacrifice, and wait the event of the election, for which they were, in general, very solicitous, though attached to different interests. Some were tumultuous, and for proceeding in a riotous manner against Moses: but the wise and discreet part recommended peace and good order, persuaded that sedition and mutiny were subversive of all government, as the rabble are ever fond of novelty, and ready to revile their superiors, as well as receive and propagate slander upon every occasion.

Moses, however, summoned Dathan and Abiram to attend the issue of the sacrifice, and prefer their respective claims; but they absolutely refused, averring, that they would no longer submit to his usurped authority. Upon this answer Moses took some of the elders with him, and, notwithstanding his exalted station, went in person to these revolvers. When Dathan and his associate heard of the approach of Moses and the elders, they came out of their tents, with their wives and children, resolutely to wait for him, having their attendants at hand, in order to repel force by force, if necessity should require it. Moses proceeded quietly till he came to Dathan, when, lifting up his hands to heaven, he invoked the Almighty, in the hearing of the whole multitude, to the following effect:

"Almighty God, thou who art Lord of the Universe, the judge of all my actions, art witness that whatever I have done has been in perfect conformity to thy will; thou, who, in compassion to

"the Hebrews, hast been gracious to them, as well
 "as my constant support upon every occasion, hear

 "hearts, vouchsafe to bring the truth to light, and "manifest the ingratitude of these men; thou
 "from whom nothing can be hidden, and to whom "is known every action of my life, do thou be "pleased to bear testimony to my innocence, against "those who revile and slander me. Thou knowest "that I quitted a quiet and comfortable life, which I "enjoyed through thy blessing upon my endeavours, "and the favour of my father-in-law, Jethro, for the "exchange of hazardous enterprizes, for the liberty "and security of these people. But now, since I am "become obnoxious to those who, by my means, have "been delivered from the extremest difficulties and "dangers; do thou, Lord, that didst appear to me "out of the fire upon mount Sinai, let me hear thy "voice, and be witness of thy Divine directions.
 "Thou, that didst honour me with an embassy into "Egypt, humbling the pride of the Egyptians, and "delivering the Hebrews out of their bondage;
 "thou, that laidst the power of Pharaoh at my feet,
 "turning the sea into dry land, and that dry land "into sea again, for the safety of thy people, and the "confusion of their enemies; thou, who gavest us

 "us with water in extremity out of the rock, as well "as with food out of the sea, and meat from heaven;
 "thou, that didst lay the foundation of our govern"ment, that art the judge of all things, avenge my "cause, and witness for me, that I have not been "corrupted to favour injustice, or espouse the in"terest of a rich man to the oppression of a poor
 "one: yet I stand accused of partial administration,
 "as if I had confirmed the priesthood on my brother,
 "from motives of private affection, and not at thy "Divine command. Be pleased, therefore, to make "appear, that all things are disposed by thy pro"vidence, and brought to pass, not by chance, but "thy special appointment. Testify thy wonted "kindness to the Hebrews, by inflicting condign "punishment on Dathan and Abiram, for suggesting "that thy purposes are opposed by my arts. Visit
 "these detractors from thy glory with exemplary
 "vengeance. Let the earth on which they tread "swallow them up, with their families and substance,
 "for the manifestation of thy power, and as an "example to posterity, not to think unworthily of "the Majesty of Heaven. But if the charge alledged "is proved against me, may these curses light on "mine own head, and my accusers be perfectly "happy. After thou hast punished the disobedient,
 "keep therest in peace, concord, and the observance "of thy commandments, since it is contrary to thy "justice to confound the innocent with the guilty."

Moses had scarcely uttered these words, intermixed with tears, when suddenly the earth was so convulsed, that the multitude were struck with horror, and a dismal outcry was heard throughout all their tents. At length, with a dreadful noise, the ground opened, and swallowed up the seditious, with all their property, and immediately closed so exactly, that no sign of the rupture was to be seen.

Thus perished a seditious faction, as examples of the power and vengeance of the Most High. They fell unpitied by their own kindred: nay, the whole multitude rejoiced at this signal display of the Divine Justice, in the extermination of such obnoxious members of the state, such pests of their nation and society in general.

After the extinction of Dathan and his accomplices, Moses summoned the candidates for the priesthood, referring the people to the choice of that person whose sacrifice should be most acceptable unto God. There assembled upon the occasion two hundred and fifty persons, who, for the virtues of their ancestors, and their own merit, were held in esteem.
 With these stood forth Aaron and Corah, offering, before the tabernacle, the incense they brought in their censers, when suddenly appeared so fierce a fire as to exceed that of burning mountains, or the conflagration of whole forests. It was astonishingly bright and flaming, and, beyond doubt, came from heaven, as no earthly materials could have produced such a blaze. By the force of this fire, Corah, and his two hundred and fifty accomplices, were so totally consumed, that the least relic of their bodies was not to be found. Aaron alone remained untouched, as a certain evidence that it was the work of a Divine Power. Moses, to perpetuate the memory of this awful judgment, commanded Eleazar, the son of Aaron, to consecrate their censers, and fasten them to a brazen altar, as a warning to future generations not to presume to counteract the designs of the Most High. From these judgments it was evident, beyond a doubt, that Aaron obtained not the priesthood by sinister means, but by Divine appointment, so that he held it ever after, but not without dispute concerning his title.

CHAP. IV.

Various occurrences which befel the Hebrews in the desert, during the space of thirty-eight years. Regulations respecting the sacerdotal office, and other solemn concerns. Death of Mariam, the sister, and Aaron, the brother, of Moses.

NOTWITHSTANDING the punishments inflicted upon the abettors of the former faction, a new sedition arose, from an opinion which the people had imbibed, that the late judgments, admitted by them as the effects of a Divine Power, were brought to pass merely for the sake of Moses. To him, therefore, they imputed these calamities, suggesting, that these men were not punished for their sins, but through the solicitation of Moses; as no crime could be alledged to their charge, unless their zeal for the service of God could be so called. That Moses availed himself of the destruction of the people, in confirming his brother in the priesthood, and entailing it upon his line, since it was certain none of the former candidates would presume to put themselves in competition. The kindred of the deceased embraced this opportunity of representing to the multitude the necessity of restraining the exorbitant power of Moses, which they might do easily and effectually.

Moses, to prevent the consequences of another tumult, convened the multitude, heard their grievances; and, without making reply, lest they should be more incensed, appointed the heads of the tribes to bring every one a rod, with the names of their tribes inscribed upon them, promising that the priesthood should be vested in him, upon whose rod God should shew any particular sign. This proposal being acceded to, they brought their rods, with the inscriptions as directed. Aaron brought his rod amongst the rest, on which was inscribed the name of the tribe of Levi. Moses laid all their rods in the tabernacle, and the next day produced them, which were easily known by the respective marks that were set upon them. They were found all to remain in the same form, that of Aaron excepted, which sprouted out with branches and buds, and what was more wonderful, bearing ripe almonds; the rod being of the wood of the almond-tree. The people, amazed at this extraordinary spectacle, abated in their animosity towards Moses and Aaron, acknowledged the Divine interposition in favour of the latter, admitted his right of election, thus confirmed a third time by the Divine approbation, an event that put a happy period to the factions and seditions which had prevailed amongst the Hebrews.

The tribe of Levi being dedicated to God's immediate service, were already exempted from military concerns; but lest worldly cares might divert them from due attention to the duties of their function, Moses ordained that, after the land of Canaan should, by the Divine aid, be conquered, forty-eight of the best cities should be allotted for the maintenance of the Levites, with two thousand cubits of land contiguous to the walls of the place. He moreover enjoined a tenth part of the yearly profits arising from the fruits of the earth, and collected from the whole body of the people, to be paid as a duty to the priests and Levites, which has been duly observed ever since. Having mentioned these matters, we shall now state what exclusively belongs to the priests themselves.

It was ordained; that, of the forty-eight cities before mentioned, the Levites should yield thirteen of them to the priests, and the tenth part of the fifths, besides the first fruits of all the products of the earth, ■ an offering to God. The firstling of all four-footed beasts allowed for sacrifice: if a male, it was to be delivered to the priests to sacrifice, to be afterwards eaten in the city with their family. For those which, by the law, were forbidden to be eat, the owner was to present ■ shekel and a half, instead of ■ firstling; and for the first-born of a man, five shekels. There was a duty also imposed upon wool and corn, the one from sheep-shearing, the other from baking of bread.

Of the Nazareens.

When those who are called Nazareens, and are bound, by ■ vow, neither to cut their hair, or to drink wine, have accomplished their vow, and present themselves ■ have their hair consecrated, whatever they offer in sacrifice belong to the priests. Those that call themselves corban, that is, by interpretation, a gift, when they desire to be discharged of their obligation and voluntary vow, they pay a duty to the priest of fifty shekels for a man, and thirty for ■ woman; and those who have not the means, must refer themselves to the discretion of the priest. Those who kill ■ beast for private use, and not for sacrifice, were to allow the priest the breast and the right shoulder. This is the allotment by Moses to the priests, besides the sin-offering, as mentioned in the foregoing book. It was likewise ordained, that the wives, children, and servants of the priests, should have a share in all contributions, except the sin-offering, of which only those priests who officiate were to partake, and that in the tabernacle in the very same day.

The sedition crushed, Moses decamped, and desires a passage thro' Idumæa.

Affairs being thus settled, and the mutiny appeased, Moses removed the camp to the borders of Idumæa, having dispatched ambassadors to the king to grant his troops ■ free passage through his country, on condition of peaceable behaviour, and paying for whatever provision they might require. But the king refused to comply with the requisition, and drew up an army to oppose him, if he should offer to force his way. Moses sought Divine counsel; and being prohibited from making the first attack, took his way through the desert.

The death of Mariam, the sister of Moses.

At this time died Mariam (a), the sister of Moses, the fortieth year after their departure out of Egypt, and in the beginning of the month Xanthicus. She was magnificently interred, at the public charge, on a mountain called Sin; and, after thirty days mourning, Moses caused the people to be purified, in this manner: The high priest took a young red heifer, without blemish, into a very clean place, a little way from the camp, where he killed it, dipped his finger seven times in the blood, and therewith sprinkled the tabernacle. He then put the whole heifer into the fire, skin, entrails, and all, casting in a stick of cedar, ■ little hyssop, and scarlet wool. A young man, of unspotted chastity, gathered up the ashes, and put them in a clean place. Those who stood in need of purification, either from having touched a dead body, or assisted at a funeral, had only to cast some of those ashes into spring water, dip a branch of hyssop in it, and sprinkle themselves with it on the third and the seventh days. Moses ordained, that this ceremony of purification should be used when the Hebrews should be put in possession of the promised land.

Moses marches through the desert into Arabia.

These forms having been observed for the death of his sister, Moses led them through the desert into Arabia, and arrived at the metropolis formerly called Aree, now Petra, where there was ■ very high mountain. Aaron being foretold by his brother that his dissolution approached, ascended this mountain, divested himself of his priestly robes, which he delivered to his son Eleazar as his successor in office, and gave up the ghost there, in the sight of the whole multitude, in the 123d year of his age, and in the first moon of the month of August, called, by the Athenians, Hacatombæon; by the Macedonians, Lous; by the Hebrews, Sabba; and by the Romans, Augustus. His sister also departed this life in the same year.

CHAP. V.

Moses obtains a conquest over the kings Sehon and Og, and distributes their possessions, by lot, to two tribes and a half of the Hebrews.

AFTER the funeral (b) obsequies for his brother were past (which continued thirty days) Moses decamped, and pitched his tents near the river Arnon, that springs from the mountains of Arabia, and running through the desert, empties itself into the lake Asphaltitis, dividing the country of the Moabites from that of the Amorites. This country is very fruitful. Numb. xxi.

Moses sent a very respectful message to Sehon, king of the Amorites, requesting permission to pass through his territories, with assurance that the inhabitants should not be molested, and that all expences incurred should be duly discharged. Sehon refused him, and marched his forces to the banks of the river, to oppose the passage of the Hebrews. Moses sends ■ embassy to Sehon, king of the Amorites.

When Moses found the Amorites disposed to hostility, and considered that the Hebrews, through idleness and want, might again relapse into their former seditious spirit, he sought the Divine will whether he should force his passage by the sword.

Having not only obtained permission, but assurance of victory, he animated the army to such ■ degree, that, without hesitation, they marched up, and charged the enemy with the utmost resolution. Sehon, and his troops, notwithstanding their former defiance of the Hebrews, were now struck with consternation. Their only hope was in flight, and the security of their fortified places: but this was vain; for, at the first onset, they were routed, fled in the greatest confusion before the Hebrews, who, being alert, and light armed, as well as expert in the use of their slings and darts, reached those they could not otherwise overtake, and cut off vast numbers at the river, where they stopped to quench their thirst, and amongst the rest Sehon, their king. The victory, in fine, was decisive. The Hebrews obtained a prodigious booty, as well as abundance of corn, as the harvest was not yet gathered in. Indeed they ran sacked the country without controul, as they met with no resistance, and had only to enjoy the fruits of their conquest. The Hebrews attack and defeat the Amorites.

Thus were the Amorites destroyed, being destitute both of conduct and courage, either to prevent or oppose the fatal attack. The Hebrews, of course, became masters of their country, which is ■ kind of peninsula betwixt three rivers; Arnon on the south, Jaboc (that falls into the Jordan) on the north, and the Jordan itself on the west. In their prosperous situation the Hebrews had yet another enemy to encounter. This was Og, king of Galadene, and of Gaulonitis, who was marching to the relief of Sehon, his ally. Though informed, on his way, of the attack and total defeat, he determined to put the matter to the issue of another effort; but he was fatally disappointed, for he fell himself, and his army was totally cut off. Og and his army cut off.

Moses, after this victory, passed the river Jaboc, and, entering Og's dominions, laid all waste before him. The inhabitants were opulent and powerful: their king was brave and resolute, as well as of enormous bulk and stature, as appeared from the dimensions of his bed, found in his palace at Rabatha. The frame was of iron; was four cubits in breadth, and nine in length. This success was not only attended with present advantages to the Hebrews, but laid the

CHAP. VI.

War between the Hebrews and Midianites. Transactions between Balaak, king of the Moabites, and Balaam, a prophet. The Hebrews fall into idolatry. Fate of Zimri and Cosbi.

MOSESES, after these repeated successes, removed his camp to a spacious plain near Jericho, an opulent city, abounding with palm-trees and balm. The people being now elated with conquest, and disposed to gratify their martial propensity, their leader, after sacrificing and feasting, detached a party to lay waste the country of the Midianites. This war originated from the following causes.

The Hebrews proceed to hostilities against the Midianites.

Numb. xxii. 23, &c.

Balaak consults the Midianites — their security against the Hebrews.

Requests Balaam to curse the Hebrews.

Balaam is forbidden.

Balaam, importuned a second time, goes with the ambassadors.

He is resisted by an angel.

Reproved by his own beast.

Rebuked by the angel.

He goes to Balaak, who takes him to the top of a mountain to survey the armies.

Balaak, king of the Moabites, an ancient ally of the Midianites, from the increasing power of the Hebrews, began to entertain apprehensions for the security of his territories; not knowing that they were prohibited by the Divine injunction from attempting the (a) conquest of any country, but that of Canaan. Not deeming it by any means prudent to make a war upon a people flushed with victory, but yet desirous of stopping their progress, he sent ambassadors to the Midianites, to consult with them on the means of their common security. The Midianites dispatched Balaak's ambassadors, with some leading men of their own, to one Balaam beyond the Euphrates, a famous prophet, and attached to them, requesting him to come over to them, and curse the Israelites. The prophet entertained the ambassadors hospitably, and sought the Divine will as to the answer he should give them. Being forbidden to comply with their request, he told them that, though he had been disposed to gratify them, he was strictly enjoined to the contrary by that adorable Being to whom he owed the gift of prophecy; and added, that the people they desired him to curse were highly favoured of God. He therefore advised them to make peace with the Hebrews upon any conditions, and thus dismissed the ambassadors. But the Midianites, urged by the importunity of Balaak, sent back the same ambassadors upon the same errand, when Balaam again consulted the Divine will, and answer was given, "That he might go with the ambassadors." Not conceiving that the tone in which the answer was uttered implied disapprobation, although it was in the affirmative, he accordingly went with them. As he proceeded on his way, an angel met him in a narrow place betwixt two walls. The ass on which he rode, at the sight of the vision, stopped, and, upon his striking and pressing her to go forward, crushed him against the wall, nor could he by any means stimulate her to proceed. While the angel kept his station, and the prophet continued tormenting the beast, it pleased the Almighty to open her mouth in a complaint of the injustice and cruelty of her master in stimulating her to get forward, when the angel of the Lord stood in the passage to oppose his progress. As he stood amazed at the prodigy, the angel rebuked him for his conduct, telling him the beast was not in fault, but that he deserved chastisement, for presuming to take a journey contrary to the declared will of God.

Balaam would have returned; but he was commanded by God, through means of the angel, to proceed, charging him to utter only that with which he should be inspired.

After this charge he went to Balaak, who entertained him with respect. The prophet desired the king that he might be conducted to some high mountain to survey the Hebrew camp. Balaak, therefore,

(a) What Josephus remarks here is worthy of observation, viz. that the Hebrews were never to meddle with the Moabites, or any other people, but those belonging to the land of Canaan, and the countries of Sehon and Og beyond Jordan, and as far as the desert and Euphrates; and that therefore other accompanied the prophet, royally attended, to the top of the mountain, which was about sixty furlongs distant from the camp. The prophet, having made his observations, directed seven altars to be raised, and seven bulls, and as many rams, to be prepared for sacrifices. This being done, in order to form a judgment upon the point in question, Balaam, having digested his observations, with his face towards the Hebrews, spoke to the following purport:

"Happy people! Providence your guide, your support, you shall enjoy abundance of all good things, acquire a reputation above all men for your exemplary virtues, and your fame shall excel that of your progenitors, the Almighty will take you under his immediate protection; and render you, of all nations under the sun, peculiarly blessed. You shall possess the rich land promised you, and your posterity shall hold it for ever. Your fame shall be extended throughout the universe, and your issue so multiplied as to be diffused throughout every part of the earth. Wonderful body, thus composed of the descendants of one single man! The land of Canaan must, at present, suffice you, though not adequate to your number or dignity; but hereafter you shall have the whole world for your habitation; so that both on the islands, and the continent, your progeny shall equal the stars in the firmament. Though so numerous, you shall lack nothing, but enjoy plenty in peace, conquest in war, and you shall hold your enemies in subjection. May our adversaries, therefore, be yours: for destruction shall attend those who rise against you, and their posterity shall rue the conduct of their fathers, in daring to oppose you. For these extraordinary tokens of favour you are to adore the providence of God, who can exalt or deject, according to his sovereign will."

Prophecy of Balaam. Num. xxiv.

These words Balaam delivered as dictated by the spirit of prophecy, at which Balaak, being much incensed, exclaimed, that he had violated his promise, having, with a view of great rewards, been brought there to curse the Hebrews, and when it came to a crisis, pronounced a blessing instead of a curse. In vindication of himself, the prophet thus replied:

The king is highly offended — the prophet.

"Can the king imagine that, when prophets are called upon to speak concerning future events, they can discover or conceal what they list? They are only passive instruments to convey the Divine decrees. They speak without knowledge or thought. I am conscious that I came hither, at the earnest solicitation both of yourself and the Midianites, with a desire of giving you satisfaction. But can I counteract the power and will of God? Nay, I was disposed to do that, which I afterwards found I dared not presume to do. When once under the direction of the Superior Power, we are no longer under our own guidance. I entertained not a thought of uttering a word in favour of the Hebrews, or the blessing reserved for them; but as it is the will of God to render them a great and happy people, I have been compelled to speak, what you have heard, instead of what I had previously determined to say upon the subject. However, fully to comply with your desired and that of the Midianites, let us erect other altars, and provide new sacrifices, and once more make trial if it be the Divine will that I curse these people."

Balaam vindicates himself to Balaak.

Balaam proposes to consult God a second time.

Balaak highly approved of the proposal, and the sacrifices were accordingly repeated; but the prophet could not obtain permission to curse the Hebrews. On the contrary, he fell on his face, and foretold the fate of those kingdoms and cities which should oppose them, of which some are not yet extant, whilst others, to our knowledge, have fulfilled the prediction, both on the continent and in islands; from people had reason to fear their conquests; but that those countries given them by God, were their proper and peculiar portion among the nations; and all who endeavoured to dispossess them, should ever be justly destroyed by them.

whence we infer, upon good ground, that the remainder will, in due time, take effect.

Balaak being highly displeased with this disappointment of his hope and expectation, dismissed the prophet abruptly; but as he approached the Euphrates, on reflection, he desired to speak with the king and princes of the Midianites, whom he thus addressed:

Balaam proposes to Balaak an expedient instead of curing.

"To convince you, O king, and ye princes, of my disposition to gratify you, though, in some degree, contrary to the will of God, I have devised an expedient that, perhaps, may answer the purpose. Imagine not that war, pestilence, or famine, can effect the extinction of the Hebrews, as, by the superintending care of Providence, they will ever be free from the destructive consequences. Some temporary afflictions they may undergo; but these, in the event, will turn to their advantage. But if the gaining some present trivial ascendancy over them will afford you pleasure, attend to my counsel. Send to their camp a number of the most beautiful virgins you can select, decorated with all the ornaments of nature and of art, to captivate and allure. When their young men become enamoured, let them threaten to depart immediately, unless they will renounce the laws of their country, and the honour of God who preserved them, and adore the gods of the Midianites and the Moabites. This (said he) will draw upon their heads the Divine vengeance (a)."

The Midianites follow Balaam's counsel.

The Midianites, approving the counsel of Balaam, sent the virgins to the Hebrew camp; and the young men, falling into conversation with them, soon became enamoured. The virgins, according to instructions given them before their departure, affected a desire immediately to depart; but by solicitations of the young men, and assurances of absolute devotion to their will and pleasure, they were prevailed on to stay; and one of them, in the name of the rest, spoke to the following purport:

"Illustrious and valiant young men, we came not hither through want of fortune, credit, the love of our parents, or the respect of our kindred, much less for the prostitution of our persons: we are influenced only by motives of hospitality and courtesy, which, as strangers, we wish to shew you. As you profess so ardent an affection for us, and seem troubled at our departure, we are desirous of conciliating your esteem, which can only be done by terms of conjugal alliance; but you must permit us to express an apprehension of being sent back with scandal and reproach to our parents, should your importunity overcome our resolves."

Gain their point.

Finding the suitors compliant in every particular, she then proceeded:

"Since we are thus far agreed, it will be necessary to remind you of some customs peculiar to you, respecting certain meats and drinks, and to assure you, that if we intermarry, they must be dispensed with. You must worship our gods (b), as the most convincing proof of your affection for us. You can incur no blame by conforming to the religion of the country from whence we are come, and adoring our gods in common with nations in general; whereas your God is solely the object of your peoples consideration."

This was the alternative proposed to their consideration.

(a) This great maxim, that God's people could never be hurt, or destroyed, but by drawing them to sin against God, appears confirmed by the entire history of that people, both in the Bible and in Josephus, and is often taken notice of in them both.

(b) What Josephus here puts into the mouths of the Midianitish women, who came to entice the Hebrews to lewdness and idolatry, viz. that their worship of the one God, in opposition to their plurality of gods, implied their living according to the

The Hebrews, blinded and infatuated by their passions, consented to the requisition of the females, suffering themselves to be seduced to the renouncing of the religion of their forefathers, transgressing the most sacred ordinances, and lapsing into the idolatry of the country. They admitted a plurality of gods, used meats in common, and, to gratify the women, trample done very law which they before held solemn, obligatory, and binding. This licentious and dissolute turn prevailed throughout the younger part of the army, and occasioned a more dangerous mutiny than any former, so far as to the total subversion of regularity and good order, and the introduction of whatever was impious and prophane; for when the religion and morals of youth are once perverted, they make a rapid progress in the paths of vice and immorality. Indeed, high and low, great and small, became generally apostates.

The Hebrews are lulled into idolatry.

While this infatuation prevailed, Zimri, an Hebrew, one of the chiefs of the tribe of Simeon, married Cosbi, a Midianite, the daughter of Zur, a man of rank and eminence in that country. This Hebrew, at the instance of his wife, openly practised the most palpable idolatry, in flagrant violation of the rites, ceremonies, and constitution of the religion and laws of his forefathers. During this disordered state of affairs, Moses, lest some fatal consequences should ensue, summoned the people, and remonstrated with them how unworthy it was of the character which they and their ancestors had sustained for their piety and virtue, to prefer the gratification of ignoble passions to the veneration of their God, and the observance of his sacred commandments. He pointed out the necessity of timely repentance, and shewed the merit of their character as men, and particularly as Hebrews, not by contemning the Divine laws, but subduing their immoderate passions. He also represented the inconsistency of their behaviour, in thus abandoning themselves to luxury and dissipation, in a plentiful country, after having seen such examples of moderation in a desert; and squandering in profusion that which they had acquired by much toil, and in the time of distress.

Zimri, an Hebrew, marries Cosbi, a Midianite. Numb. xxv.

Moses reproaches the Hebrews with the scandal of idolatry.

He then endeavoured to bring the infatuated youth to a sense of shame, and an attention to the dictates of reason and conscience; but, in what he said, he reflected on no individual, judging, that personal reproof would render them more incorrigible, and that his main object was not to expose, but reclaim them. These oblique hints, however, gave occasion to Zimri to rise, and thus speak in vindication of himself:

"Moses, you are at liberty to contend for the use and observance of your own laws, which have obtained a sanction and authority by long custom alone, or you would have been brought to merited disgrace and punishment, and found, to your cost, that the Hebrews were not to be deluded by your arts. I will never subject myself to your tyrannical decrees; assured that, under a pretext or regard to religion and law, you seek to enslave us, and establish a supreme authority over us, by denying us those liberties to which all free-born men have an undoubted right. Was there a more grievous oppression, during the whole course of an Egyptian bondage, than the power you usurped of punishing every man by laws of your own formation? You particularly deserve punishment for abrogating and annulling those customs, laws, and privileges, which are authorized and established by the common consent of nations, and preferring the suggestions of your fancy, to rules so generally followed, and rationally founded. Conscious that I have done nothing wrong, I now frankly declare, in this assembly, that I have holy laws which the true God had given them by Moses, in opposition to those impure laws which were observed under their false gods, well deserves our consideration, and gives us a substantial reason for the great concern that was ever shewed under the law of Moses, to preserve the Hebrews from idolatry, and in the worship of the true God: it being of no less consequence than, whether God's people should be governed by the holy laws of the true God, or by the impure laws derived from demons under the pagan idolatry.

"married ■ strange woman. This I confess with ■ honest boldness, and would do the same in the face of the world. I also worship the gods whom thou hast forbidden to be worshipped, as I do not hold myself bound to submit to your arbitrary sway, either in matters of law or religion, but must assert the liberty of investigating the truth for myself, and directing my own personal concerns."

Zimri delivers the sense of the faction.

Zimri, in this speech, delivered the general sentiments of the whole faction, while the multitude silently waited the issue of his presumptuous conduct; for they apprehended much confusion would ensue. As Moses was not disposed to contend any longer, lest he might render ■ seditious man more outrageous, and lest others, incited by his example, should rise, and, by that means, the tumult become universal, he therefore, upon this consideration, dissolved the assembly; though the clamour most probably would have been productive of more mischievous effects, had not Zimri, the chief abettor of it, been suddenly cut off in the following manner.

Moses discharges the assembly.

The zeal of Phineas.

His contumacy, and flagrantly insolent behaviour to Moses, raised the resentment of one Phineas to the highest degree. He was a youth eminent for the dignity of his family, his singular prowess, and his personal virtues. Eleazar, the high priest, being his father, he was nearly allied to the great law-giver. Sensible that to suffer such indignity to pass with impunity, would bring both the religion and laws of the Hebrews into contempt, he determined to make an example of the ringleader of the faction, as his exalted rank would cause that example to have a greater influence on the minds of the people. His resolution being equal to his zeal, he repaired, without delay, to the tent of Zimri, and, at one stroke, slew both him and Cosbi, his wife. This resolute act excited an emulation amongst those of his contemporaries, who still maintained a regard for the honour of their country, to avenge themselves on those who had done it violation; inasmuch, that they fell most furiously upon the faction, and put great numbers of them to the sword. Those who escaped the vengeance of the sword, were cut off by a pestilence that followed soon after, and swept away not only those who took an active part in the sedition, but also their kindred, and those who, by their authority and influence, might have restrained, if not prevented, it. There perished by this pestilence fourteen thousand of the Hebrews.

Phineas slays Zimri and Cosbi in their tent.

The whole faction destroyed by the sword and the plague.

Moses sends an army against the Midianites. Num. xxxi.

Moses, incensed against the Midianites for their foul practices, sent out a powerful army to exterminate their nation. We shall shortly treat of that expedition; deeming it necessary, on this occasion, first to advert to the wisdom and candour of our great law-giver. Though Balaam, invited and allured, by presents from the Midianites, to curse the Hebrews, when he found, from the Divine prohibition, that he could not effect their purpose, suggested such an expedient to them, as tended to the ruin of the Hebrews, in misleading and corrupting them in their religion and laws, yet Moses did him great honour in inserting his prophecies in his writings. He had it in his power to assume the credit himself, as there could be no witness against him; but he was too noble and ingenuous to be guilty of a fallacy, or deviate from that principle of rectitude which so eminently adorned his character.

CHAP. VII.

Conquest of the Hebrews over the Midianites. Moses appoints Joshua his successor. Law respecting the alienation or transferring hereditary right.

Num. xxxi.

MOSES, as before observed, sent an army of twelve thousand men against the Midianites, choosing out of every tribe one thousand, and appointed Phineas to the command, as a reward of his extraordinary merit, in asserting their religion and laws, and avenging the common cause on Zimri, the leader of a seditious faction. The Midianites, on receiving intelligence of the approach of the enemy, collected their forces, lined the several passes through which they might break in upon them, and put themselves in as good ■ posture of defence as the time would permit. But no sooner did Phineas charge them at the head of the Hebrews, than they were totally routed with incredible slaughter. Five kings, viz. Ochus, Sures, Robeas, Ures, and Recem, fell on the spot. The capital city of Arabia, built by the latter, is known by his name to this day. They call it Reken, and the Grecians, Petrea.

The army of the Midianites totally routed, and five kings slain.

Reken, or Petrea, the capital of Arabia.

The Hebrews, having obtained an entire victory over their enemies, ravaged their whole country, putting all the inhabitants to the sword, the virgins excepted, in conformity to the especial command of Moses to Phineas, who returned with the army in safety, and brought with him ■ memorable and glorious booty, consisting of fifty-two thousand and sixty-seven oxen, sixty thousand asses, household plate, and vessels of gold and silver to an immense value: such were the opulence and luxury of the Midianites. They also brought with them above thirty thousand captive virgins.

The Hebrews obtain immense booty in cattle and treasure.

Moses, in the division of the booty, allotted one fiftieth part to Eleazar and the priests, another fiftieth to the Levites, and the rest to the people, which enabled them to enjoy the fruits of their toils and hazards in plenty and peace. Our great legislator, being now advanced in years, appointed Joshua to succeed him in the several offices of a prophet, a leader, and a governor, according to the Divine command; for he was most expert in the knowledge of their religion and laws, having been instructed therein by Moses, his preceptor.

Distribution of it.

About this time the tribes of Gad and Reuben, with half that of Manasses, joined in a petition to Moses, for a grant of the country of the Amorites, as a place lately conquered, abounding with rich pasturage, and therefore commodious for their herds, and other cattle. Moses imputed their request to pusillanimity, and reproached them in words to this purport.

"You desire to live in ease and luxury, and, by appropriating to yourselves the advantages of a common war, deprive others of their share of what has been jointly acquired. It still requires you, together with the rest of your brethren, to exert yourselves in extending your victorious arms beyond Jordan, in order to obtain possession of the land that God hath promised them." The tribes which preferred the petition, in order to soothe Moses, thus apparently incensed against them, declared, that they neither wished to avoid danger through fear, nor shun labour through sloth, but were only desirous of leaving their booty in a place of security, that they might be the more at liberty to prosecute the war: therefore, if Moses would assign them towns for the reception of their wives, their children, and their property, they were ready to march whithersoever they might be commanded, and venture their lives in the common cause. Moses, satisfied with what they advanced in their own vindication, in the presence of Eleazar, the high priest, Joshua, and the rest of the magistrates, granted them the land of the Amorites, according to request; but on condition that they should join with their countrymen in a league, offensive and defensive, against their common enemies, nor lay down their arms till the close of the war. Having acceded to these terms, they were put in possession of strong cities, where their wives, children, and substance were perfectly secure.

They exculpate themselves to Moses.

Their request is granted upon certain conditions.

Moses built ten cities in that country, which are to be reckoned amongst the forty-eight heretofore mentioned. He appointed three of them sanctuaries, or places of refuge, for those that fled thither in case of casual homicide. The refugee was to continue in exile during the life of the high priest, under whose jurisdiction the fact was committed; but, at his death, permitted to return. During the time of their exile, it was lawful for any of the kindred of the man that was slain to take revenge upon the homicide, if he should be found without the walls of the city of refuge; but it was not permitted to any other. The names of the refuge cities were, Bozor, on the borders of Arabia; Ariman, in the country of Galadene; and Gaulanan, in the land of Batanaa. Moses also ordained, that, after the conquest of Canaan, three more cities cities of the Levites should be appointed ■ places of refuge, and with the same privileges ■ the former.

About this time an eminent person of the tribe of Manasses, called Salophades, leaving only three daughters, some of the heads of the tribes applied to Moses to consult him respecting the daughter's right of inheritance. The decree was, that, if they were married within their tribe, they should inherit; but if they chose to marry into another tribe, they should lose their patrimony in their own. Upon this occasion an ordinance was passed, that every tribe should keep its own inheritance, without alienating or transferring it.

CHAP. VIII.

The policy of Moses, and his departure from mankind.

AS there now remained but thirty days to fulfil the number of forty years since the Hebrews came out of Egypt, Moses called a general assembly at a place known by the name of Abila, near the side of the river Jordan, and environed with palm-trees. When they were convened, he delivered to them a speech to the following effect:

"Hebrews, and companions in ■ long and tedious journey, with whom I have been exposed to, and delivered from, so many dangers, since it is now the will of God, in the hundred and twentieth year of ■ toilsome life, to take me out of this world, (the course of nature also requiring it), and since it seemeth not good in God's sight that I should be any farther assistant to you, either by arms or counsel, in what remains to be brought to pass beyond Jordan, I have resolved to employ that little space of life which remains, to establish your felicity so far as in me lies, by stating to you in what it consists, and pointing out the means of attaining it, so that I may be remembered by you with esteem, when you arrive at the possession of what is promised you. I make no doubt but I shall find credit with you; and I may presume to add, that I deserve it too, for the indefatigable constancy of my endeavours to serve you. Listen, therefore, and attend to my words.

"Ye sons of Israel, be sure there is but one source of happiness to all mankind; the spring and fountain from whence alone it can be derived, that is, the favour of God (a); for he alone is able to confer blessings on those who obey his commandments, and to deprive those of them who transgress. Attend seriously and constantly to your duty to God, according to the precepts and instructions which I have laid before you ■ authorized by his Divine commission, and your piety and virtue shall attract the admiration, while your prosperity shall excite the envy, of surrounding nations. You shall keep possession of your present blessings, and obtain a plentiful store of all you want. Take heed to be obedient to God's will and commandments, and you may rest assured of all good. Never prefer any other constitution of government to the laws now given you, nor disregard the modes and ceremonies of religious worship established amongst you, or change them for any other form. If you follow my advice, you shall be victorious and invincible: for if God is present with you, what power or force can oppose you? The rewards of virtue are great, glorious, and certain; nay, virtue is in itself the greatest of rewards, from the conscious bliss with which it is inseparably attended. By it all other blessings are obtained. Practise it, therefore, towards one another, and you shall be perfectly happy yourselves, and render others so, to the comfort of your present state of existence, and your immortal honour in times to come.

"These things you have a right to expect, if you neither violate yourselves, nor suffer to be violated yourselves, the written laws I delivered unto you by God's especial direction; but, on the contrary, make their wisdom and equity the subjects of your constant meditation and study. This will secure your happiness; and I shall die in peace, if I see it promoted by these means; commending to you the observance of those precepts of piety and prudence, that are laid down for your instruction and practice, and to an obedient compliance with the rules prescribed by your superiors, who are appointed to superintend your civil concerns. That God, under whose guidance you have hitherto lived, to whose goodness alone you stand indebted for all the benefits you have received by my means as an instrument, that God will continue his care over you, and vouchsafe you his constant protection, so long as you worship him in the way and manner prescribed by his Divine command. You will not want excellent monitors in Eleazar, the high priest, and Joshua, with the senate and principals of the tribes, who will go before you, and suggest the best advice; by following which you will continue to be happy. Treat it with due respect; follow their counsel without reluctance, always bearing in mind, that he who instructed to obey well, will, when he shall attain to that dignity, govern well. Do not imagine that liberty consists in opposing such directions as your superiors think it expedient to give you for your practice, as you have formerly done, by mistaking mutiny for liberty. Beware of this error, and your state will be more prosperous. I would to God that you may never discover such perverseness and contumacy towards any of my successors, as you have repeatedly done towards me; for you forget that I have been oftener in danger of death from you than from the common enemy. I speak not this to reproach you; for as I sustained the injuries with calmness and composure, when they were offered, I would not bring to your remembrance ■ circumstance that might afflict your minds, now I am about to take my last farewell. Be advised in your future conduct, lest you become haughty and refractory, when you are put in possession of the land of Canaan. Consider it as your interest, as well as duty, to behave with reverence towards those who are set in authority over you: for if, thro' wealth and luxury, you fall into contempt of religion, virtue and authority, you will forfeit the favour of God; and when you have made him your enemy, you will lose that land with infamy, which you had obtained with honour, and be scattered over the face of the earth as the most despicable of mankind. If you should ever experience such a reverse of state and condition as I have represented, you will repent, and remember the laws you have broken, when it is too late. Wherefore, to avoid this danger of apostacy from the worship of the God of your fathers, suffer not any of your enemies to live after you have conquered them; but esteem it highly conducive to your interest to destroy them all, lest, if you permit them to live, you become infected by their manners, and thereby corrupt your own institutions. I do farther exhort you to overthrow their altars, temples, groves, and, indeed, to exterminate their nations with fire and sword. By these means alone the permanency of your happy constitution can be secured to you. But lest any should plead ignorance of their duties, I have written ■ body of laws, and ■ form of administration, by the Divine command, to which if you implicitly conform, you will be of all men happy."

When Moses had thus spoken, he delivered to them the laws and constitution of government written in a book, upon which they melted into tears, and appeared sensibly affected with the loss they should sustain

(a) Josephus here, in this one sentence, displays his sentiments of Moses's long and serious exhortation in the book of Deuteronomy. And his words are so true, and of such importance, that they deserve ■ be had in constant remembrance both by Jews and Christians. "Ye sons of Israel, remember there is but one source of happiness to all mankind; the spring and fountain from whence alone it can be derived, the favour of God."

of their great leader; calling to memory the many dangers he had passed through, and the anxious solicitude he had ever manifested for their preservation. They desponded of ever having a governor of equal worth, and feared lest, on his departure, they should never meet with a mediator, who could so effectually intercede with the Almighty in their behalf. They also bitterly repented of their outrages against him in the desert; and such was their grief as to be productive of lamentations, which the most consolatory words could not suppress. Moses at length, however, diverted their thoughts from the melancholy subject that had engrossed them, by exhorting them to attend to the instruction he had given them, and then dissolved the assembly.

An abstract of the laws themselves.

Before I proceed to other matters, I shall describe these laws fully and particularly, in order to demonstrate the wisdom and virtue of the compiler, and their conformity to the usages and customs of our commonwealth from its first institution. As every thing which our lawgiver wrote is extant, I shall not add by way of ornament, nor introduce any thing by way of variation. I have, however, taken the liberty of altering the method, and digesting the several kinds of laws into a regular system, being left by him in writing, as they were accidentally scattered in the delivery, and as he, upon enquiry, received them from the Divine voice. I thought it necessary to premise this observation, to obviate any calumniating reflections of our people, that I had not faithfully handed down the writings and institutions of Moses. I shall, on the present occasion, confine myself to the public laws, which appertain peculiarly to the policy of our government. Those which Moses left concerning our common intercourse with one another, or with strangers, I have referred to a commentary, which I propose, with the Divine assistance, to write hereafter.

Rules for the government of the Hebrews in the land of Canaan.

When you have conquered the land of Canaan, and have leisure to enjoy the good things of it; when you have afterwards determined to build cities, if you do what is pleasing in the sight of God, and keep his commandments, your happiness will be complete and permanent.

One holy city.

Let there be then one holy city of the land of Canaan, and this situated in the most agreeable place, for beauty of prospect, and fertility of soil, and let it be that which God shall choose for himself by prophetic revelation. Let there be but one temple in it, and one altar, and that reared of unhewn stones out of the quarry, gathered at random, but so put together, by the skill of the artificer, as to render the work agreeable to the sight. Let not the ascent be by steps, but by a gradual rising (a) of the ground, for the decency of the approach. But in the other city, let there be neither temple nor altar; for the Hebrew nation is but one, and worship but one God.

One temple and one altar.

One God only is to be worshipped. Blasphemy made death.

Whoever shall blaspheme the holy name of God, let him be stoned to death, his body exposed on a gibbet for a day, and then buried in an ignominious manner.

The whole nation of the Hebrews to worship thrice a year at Jerusalem, Deut. xvi.

Let all the Hebrews, from their several quarters, repair to the holy city and temple thrice every year, to join in their adoration of the Supreme Being, offer up thanksgivings for benefits received, and implore future aid and protection; and let them, by this means, maintain a friendly correspondence with one another; for it is expedient that such intercourse should be held by people who are descended from the same stock, and governed by the same laws, and professedly of the same religion. If they do not hold this friendly intercourse, they will live as strangers to each other, and be deprived of the comforts and advantages of communication.

Let there be taken out of your fruits a tenth

(a) The reason why this ascent was to be made declivity, and not by steps, is obvious; for before the invention of stairs, such as are now used, decency could not otherwise be provided for in the loose garments which the priests wore as the law required.

(besides that allotted to the priests and Levites) arising from the sale in the market, but to be appropriated to the particular charge of the sacrifices and festivals in the holy city; for it is but reasonable to dedicate the fruits of the earth to the honour and service of that liberal benefactor from whom we derive their possession.

A second tenth enjoined.

You are not to offer sacrifices out of the hire (b) of an harlot; for the Deity cannot be pleased with any thing that is wicked, of which nothing can be more so than prostitution; nor can any thing be acceptable to a pure and spotless Being, that appertains to, or is procured by, that which is indecent and unclean.

Not to offer the hire of an harlot.

Let no man blaspheme the gods of other nations, or rife their temples, or take any thing out of them that is dedicated to religious uses.

The gods of other nations are not to be blasphemed. Priests only to wear a mixed garment, Deut. xxi.

Let no Hebrew wear a garment of wool and linen, as it belongeth only to the priests.

When the multitude are assembled together every seventh year, in the holy city, to celebrate the festival of the tabernacles, let the high priest ascend a raised pulpit, where he may be heard by the whole congregation, read the whole law to all the people without exception, men, women, and children, nay, the very slaves to be admitted to the hearing. For when the laws are imprinted in the mind, and thus preserved in the memory, they not only facilitate obedience, but obviate every pretended plea of ignorance. The laws will also have more weight on the consciences of offenders, when they are informed beforehand of the penalty annexed to the breaking of them. What men receive by the ear is communicated to the mind; so that being convinced of the wisdom and excellent tendency of the laws, they stand self-condemned on their violation.

The high priest to read the law publicly up on the fest of tabernacles.

Let your children, in particular, be early instructed in these laws, as the best thing they can be taught, soon as they are capable of discipline, and most conducive to their present and future happiness. Wherefore, twice a day, morning and evening, they are to be reminded of God's mercies in general, and his deliverance of their father's from Egyptian bondage in particular; it being equally reasonable to acknowledge former blessings, as to implore the bestowal of future.

Children to be early instructed in the laws. Deut. vi.

The principal of God's blessings are to be inscribed upon your doors, and the remembrance of them is to be shewn upon your arms and heads. These are to serve as memorials of the power of God, and his providential care and protection of his people.

Memorials of God's mercies. Deut. x.

Let there be chosen in every city seven magistrates, such as have been most exemplary in the practice of virtue and righteousness. Let each of these magistrates have two assistants of the tribe of Levi. Let those, who are thus chosen in every city, be held in great honour; so that no man, in their presence, may presume to utter irreverent or contumelious words; for the practice of awe and respect towards those set over us in high office by God's appointment, leads to the love of piety and virtue, and due veneration for the sacred Majesty of God himself. There must be no appeal from the sentence of the judge, whose decree must be held inviolable, unless it can be rendered apparent that they have taken bribes to the perversion of justice, or any other accusation can be alledged against them; whereby it may be proved that they have passed an unjust sentence. They must also judge and give sentence without regard to power, interest, or affection; and always prefer justice to every other consideration. It is a reproach to the Divine Power and Goodness, to fear human authority before God himself. Justice is the power of God. He, therefore, who gratifies the most dignified character to its perversion, Foundation of the Jewish magistracy.

(b) The hire of public harlots was given Venus in Syria, as Lucian informs us; and against some such vile practice of the old idolaters this law seems to have been made.

arrogantly presumes to usurp that power himself, and treats the Lord and Ruler of the Universe with manifest contempt. If these judges cannot determine on the point in question, being either misinformed, or to the particulars, or incompetent, as to the knowledge, (which sometimes happens), let the cause undetermined be sent up to the holy city, and there let the high priest, the prophet, and the senate, finally decide the controversy.

The testimony of a single witness shall not be received, but of three, or at least of two, and those whose testimony is confirmed by their probity and unspotted reputation.

The testimony of a woman cannot be admitted, on account of the levity and temerity of the sex.

Nor is it lawful for a bondman to be admitted as a witness, by reason of his degenerate and ignoble mind; for it is to be suspected that, either awed by fear, or allured by gain, he will not depose the truth.

If any witness should be convicted of perjury, let him be subject to the same penalty which he, against whom he bore false testimony, was to have suffered.

If homicide be committed in any place, and the offender cannot be found out, and it appears, moreover, that the man was not slain out of malice premeditated, let diligent enquiry be made after the man, and rewards proposed for discovering him. If, after all this search and diligence, no information can be procured, let the magistracy of the cities contiguous to the spot in which the fact was committed, assemble together, and measure the distance from the place where the dead body lies. Then let the inhabitants of the nearest city thereunto purchase and heifer, and bring it to a valley, as to a place where there is no land ploughed, or trees planted, and let them cut the sinews of the neck of the heifer. Then the priests and Levites, and senate of that city, shall take water, and wash their hands over the head of the heifer, and they shall publicly declare, that their hands are innocent of this murder, and that they have neither done it themselves, nor been aiding or assisting to any that did it. The ceremony to be finished with offering up prayers to Almighty God to preserve that place and people from the guilt of blood for the time to come.

Aristocracy appears to be the best form of government, because it vests the authority in the hands of men of noble birth and dignified character. Therefore let the Hebrews desire no other form, but always love that form; have the laws for their governors, and govern all their actions by the laws. But let them ever remember that God is their king, and their supreme governor.

But if you should desire to have a king, see that you elect one of your own nation, who will steadily maintain justice, and all the other virtues, being guided by God and the laws, as his infallible directory, and highest wisdom. Let him not undertake any thing without the authority of the high priest and the senate. Let not his mind be set upon a multitude of wives, nor the glare of treasure, nor the pomp of houses, lest thereby he become insolent, and disdain to submit to the laws. If he should affect an unwarrantable power and magnificence, let him be restrained, that he may not become more important than is consistent with the true interest of the state.

It is not lawful to remove the boundaries or landmarks either of your own land or your neighbours, for they are the best security of the common peace. They should remain firm and immovable, as a Divine limitation of rights; as a removal may afford cause for great broils and contests; for those whose avarice or ambition admit of no bounds, are easily led to violate the laws.

The first fruits of trees, that bear before the fourth year, from the time of their planting, are neither to be offered to God, nor eaten by man; because, not being produced in proper season, they are abortions, No. 5.

and contrary to nature. But all the fruit that shall grow in the fourth year, when it comes to maturity, shall be gathered, and brought into the holy city, and there expended during the feast, which the owner makes for his friends, together with widows and orphans: but in the fifth year he shall reserve the whole product for his own use.

Sow not the ground that is planted with vines, for it is sufficient it affords nourishment to that plant, nor doth it need to be nourished by the plough.

The land is to be ploughed with oxen alone, and no other kind of beasts yoked with them; for the tillage must always be performed by beasts of the same kind.

Let the seeds be sown simple and unmixed, not two or three sorts together; for nature doth not admit of a commixture of different things.

You are not to permit beasts of different kinds to gender together; for there is reason to fear that this unnatural practice may have a corrupt effect on the human species, as the foulest extravagancies have taken their rise from trivial causes. Wherefore nothing ought to be introduced in conversation, that, by a perverse application, may tend to promote a depravity of manners. Nor should the laws neglect small matters, but provide for decency of conduct and behaviour in all things.

Let not those that reap, and gather in the corn that is reaped, gather in the gleanings also; but let them rather leave some allowance for those that are in want of the necessaries of life. In like manner, when they gather them grapes at the time of vintage, let them leave some smaller bunches on the vine for the poor; and let them pass over some of the fruits of the olive-trees, when they gather them, and leave them for such as have no kind of provision. For the advantage arising from the exact collection of all, will not be so considerable to the owners, as will arise from the prayers of the poor. God will bless the land with fertility, and the proprietor with plenty, if he is not solely attentive to his own gain, but has regard to the wants of the indigent.

The ox is not to be muzzled when he treads out the corn; for it would be unreasonable to deny any thing a part in the fruit of its own labours.

The traveller, on his journey, must not be denied to gather and taste of the ripe fruits, but, on the contrary, permitted to take the same freely, whether he be of the country, or a stranger. He shall depart satisfied with what he has eat, but he is prohibited from carrying any away with him. Those likewise who gather grapes, ought not to refuse a traveller to taste of them, as they bear them to the press; for it would be very unjust, that the good things which God hath bestowed upon mankind in such abundance, should be denied the needy in a small proportion, especially as the season soon passes away. Nay, those are to be invited, that, from a scrupulous modesty, forbear touching, or even asking for the same. If they are Hebrews, they are to be esteemed friends and fellow-sharers in what you have, being of the same race. If strangers, we should exercise hospitality towards them, not thinking we sustain any loss by the small present we make them of the fruits we enjoy through God's bounty. Nor can that be ill bestowed which is thus courteously given to another, since the bountiful Father of the Universe affordeth all things in rich abundance; not that any individuals should engross them, but that they should be rendered a common benefit to mankind. Nor can men more effectually acknowledge God's munificence towards themselves, than by communicating a part of his blessings to others. Whosoever shall presume to act contrary to what is here prescribed, let him be beaten with forty stripes, save one by the public executioner. Let him undergo this punishment (which is a most ignominious one for a freeman) because he was such a slave to gain, as to sully his own dignity. It is by all means expedient (added Moses) that you, who have had the experience of such afflictions in Egypt, and in the desert, fert, should be affected with tenderness and compassion for others in like circumstances; and as you have now obtained plenty yourselves, through the mercy and providence of God, that you should distribute of that plenty, by the like sympathy, to such as stand in need of it.

The third tythe to be divided among the widows and orphans.

The first fruits to the temple.

Besides the two yearly tenths already appointed to be paid, (the one to the Levites, the other towards the charges of the holy festivals,) you are to bring every third year a third (a) tythe, to be distributed to those that want, to widows and to orphans. But to the ripe fruits, let them carry that which first ripens unto the temple, and after thanksgiving to God for the earth which brought them forth, and which he had given them for possession, and having likewise offered those sacrifices which the law commanded them to bring, let them give the first fruits to the priest. But when any one hath done this, and has brought the tythe of all that he hath, together with those first fruits that are for the Levites, and for the festivals, let him, when he is ready to return home, stand before the holy temple, give thanks to God, that he has delivered them from their grievous treatment in Egypt, given them a goodly land, and permitted them to enjoy the fruits thereof; and when he has openly testified that he has fully paid the thythes according to the law and appointment of Moses, let him intreat God that he will ever be merciful and gracious to him, and continue to be so to all the Hebrews, both by preserving the good things which he hath already given them, and by adding what it is still in his power to bestow upon them.

Laws on wedlock.

No plea for a freeman who marries a bond-woman.

No man is to marry an harlot.

When men are of years to marry, let them make choice of virgins, born of honest parents, and virtuously educated. And he that does not take a virgin to wife, let him not seduce the wife of another man, to the disquiet and affliction of her husband. Let not a freeman marry a bond-woman, though his affection should strongly incline him so to do; for it is praise-worthy and honourable to govern our passions. Furthermore, let no man marry an harlot; for God will not receive her matrimonial oblations, because she hath dishonoured herself: besides those children are more laudably and virtuously inclined, who are descended from honest parents, than those who spring from a shameful alliance contracted by impure desires.

Penalty of a woman marrying for a virgin, and not found so.

If any one has espoused a woman as a virgin, and afterwards finds that she is not so; let him accuse her, and bring his action, adducing all the proofs he can to justify his suspicion. On the other hand, let the woman's cause be defended by her father, her brother, or the next a-kin. If she be acquitted of the charge alledged against her, her accuser shall be bound to live in wedlock with her, nor shall the marriage hereafter be annulled, unless upon positive evidence. But he that shall rashly, and without cause, slander his wife, shall be punished with thirty-nine stripes, and stand condemned in a fine of fifty shekels to her father. If it be proved that the woman has been corrupted before her marriage, she shall be stoned to death for not having preserved her virginity till she was lawfully married; but if she be the daughter of a priest, she shall be burnt alive.

The right of primogeniture not to be transferred to a younger child.

If any man hath two wives, and he is particularly attached to one of them, either from affection, beauty, or any other motive, while the other is of less esteem, and the son of her that is beloved be the younger, demands the prerogative of the elder from the attachment of his father to his mother, and would thereby attain a double portion of his father's patrimony (for so much our ordinances import) let not this by any means be granted: for it is unjust that he, who is the elder by birth, should be deprived of his right on the father's disposition of his estate, because his mother possessed not an equal share in his affection.

(a) Josephus's plain and express interpretation of this law of Moses, that the Jews were bound every third year to pay three thythes, that to the Levites, that for sacrifices at Jerusa-

If any man shall have debauched a maiden contracted to another, and with her consent, they shall both be punished with death, as they are both equally guilty of sin; the man for corrupting the woman, and the woman for consenting: the one for seducing the woman into a preference of inordinate gratification, to an honourable marriage; the other for prostituting herself either from inclination or profit. If a man force a woman when she is alone, and has none to come to her assistance, let him openly be put to death. Let him that hath corrupted a virgin, not yet espoused, marry her. But if the father of the damsel approves not of her being his wife, let him pay fifty shekels as a reparation for the injury.

Law against debauching a woman contracted to another man.

The penalty for corrupting a virgin that is free.

He that desires to be separated from his wife from any cause whatever (as many causes happen amongst men) let him confirm it in writing, that he will never more entertain her again; for, by this divorce, she may be at liberty to marry another husband, and refuse the former. But if it happens that she be ill used by the second, or that, he being dead, the first would take her again in marriage, it is not lawful for the wife to return to him.

Case of a man's parting with his wife.

If a woman's husband dies, and leaves her without children, let the brother of the deceased marry the widow, and let him call the son born to him by his brother's name, and educate him as the heir to his inheritance; for this procedure will be for the benefit of the public, as names and families should be preserved, and their possessions kept entire. This will also be for the solace of wives under their affliction, that they are to be married to the next relations of their former husbands. But if the brother refuse to marry her, let the woman come before the senate and protest, that, though she offered to continue in the family, and bear him children, her husband's brother had given her repulse, and thereby cast a dishonour on his memory. The senate shall then demand of the brother the reasons of his refusal. Whatever cause he assigns, the point must come to this issue. The woman shall loose the sandals of the brother, and spit in his face, telling him, that he deserves this reproachful treatment from her, as having injured the memory of the deceased. After this he departs the court with a brand of infamy which he carries to his grave, and the widow is free to marry where she pleases.

Case when husband dies, and leaves his wife without issue.

If any man take captive a maid, wife, or widow, and is disposed to marry her, let him not be allowed to cohabit with her before she has shaved her head, put on her mourning habit, and lamented her relations and friends that were slain in the battle; that, by this means, she may give vent to her sorrow for them, and after that may betake herself to feasting and matrimony. It is reasonable for him who takes a woman to have children by her, to gratify the inclinations of his wife, and not merely pursue his own will and pleasure, regardless of what is agreeable to her. But when thirty days are past, as the time of mourning, (for so many are sufficient to prudent persons for lamenting the dearest friends), then let them proceed to the marriage. If the man be too fickle, or too proud, to retain her as his wife, let him not have it in his power to make her his slave again, but let her go whither she pleases, and have the privileges of a free woman, as by the marriage she hath purchased her liberty.

Duties of a joined or maid, wife, or widow, who is taken prisoner, and then married.

As to those young persons who despise their parents, and, instead of paying them honour, behave themselves undutifully and contemptuously, either because they are ashamed of them, or think themselves wiser than they; in the first place let their parents (whom nature has constituted their judges) admonish them to this purport: "That they cohabited together not for the sake of pleasure, or the augmentation of their wealth, by uniting their lem, and this for the indigent, the widows, and the orphans, is fully confirmed by the practice of good old Tobit, even when he was a captive in Assyria:

Of a wife's father.

stocks,

stocks, but that they might have children to comfort them in their old age. That when they were born they took them up with joy and gladness, and rendered God the most unfeigned thanks for them, brought them up with the tenderest care, and spared nothing that seemed necessary for their preservation, and instruction in whatever was most excellent. That now, since it is reasonable to pardon the errors of those who are young, it should suffice them to have given so many indications of contempt of their parents; and they should therefore reform, and act more wisely for the time to come. That they should remember God is displeased with those who are undutiful to their parents, because he is himself the Father of the whole race of mankind, and seems to bear part of that dishonour which falls upon earthly parents, when they do not meet with suitable returns from their children. And finally, that they should bear in mind the severity of the punishment which the law inflicts on the disobedient, and which the affectionate parent hopes the child will never experience."

Incorrigible obstinacy in children to be punished with death. If the obstinacy and perverseness of children are removed by such admonitions, let them be freed from the reproach which their former errors deserved, as it will redound to the honour of the lawgiver, and the happiness of parents. But if it should happen that neither authority or advice can effect a reformation of manners, and that rebellious children will still persist in incorrigible obstinacy, the law must then be put in execution. Let such, therefore, be brought by those very parents, whom they have so flagrantly offended by their disobedience, out of the city, with a multitude following, and let them be stoned to death, and there continue one whole day exposed to public view, and at night be buried with infamy. All who are sentenced to death by the laws are buried in the same manner. Public enemies are not to be denied burial, nor is any dead body to lie above ground. The law prescribes the punishment, to which justice enjoins an exact adherence.

No lending upon usury to an Hebrew brother. Let no Hebrew lend to another upon usury, nor take usury either upon meat or drink; for it is illiberal to take advantage of the misfortunes of our brethren. Count it sufficient, when you have assisted a brother in a case of extremity, that he acknowledges the kind office with gratitude. Charity brings with it its own reward, being ever attended with the consolation of an approving conscience, and an approving God.

Law relative to borrowing. Those who borrow either money, or any kind of saleable commodity, let them cheerfully restore the same as soon as Providence shall enable them so to do; laying it up, as it were, in their own treasuries, and justly expecting to receive it thence when occasion shall require.

But if the debtor has neither shame or conscience, to induce him to restore what he has borrowed, the creditor shall not enter his house and take a pledge before judgement be given concerning it: but let him demand it at the door, where the debtor himself is to deliver it, without the least opposition to him that comes upon him under the protection of the law. If he who gave the pledge be in good circumstances, let the creditor retain it till he has repaid his due; but if he be indigent, let it be returned before the going down of the sun, especially if the pledge be a garment, that the poor man may not want a covering in the night, for God himself shews mercy to the poor.

Working utensils not to be taken as pledges. It is not lawful to take a mill, or any utensil belonging thereunto, in as a pledge; lest the debtor be thereby deprived of instruments to obtain the means of a livelihood, and be exposed to extreme want.

Of theft. Let it be death to spirit away, or steal a man; and he that hath purloined gold or silver, let him pay double.

Penalty of stealing cattle. If any man slay a thief in the act of stealing, or breaking into the house, he shall be held guiltless.

Let him that hath stolen cattle pay four-fold for what is lost, unless it be an ox, in which case the thief is to pay five-fold: but if the offending party is so poor that he cannot pay the fine, let him be his servant to whom he was adjudged by the law to pay it.

If one Hebrew be sold to another, let him serve him six years, and on the seventh let him go free. But if it should so fall out that he hath children in his master's house by any female servant, and be disposed, from good will to his master, and natural affection to his wife and children, to continue in service, let him be set free only in the year of the jubilee, together with his wife and children.

Case of selling one Hebrew to another.

If any man find gold or silver upon the highway, let him enquire after him that lost it, and make proclamation of the place where he found it, in order to the restoring it, as not deeming it just to avail himself of the misfortune of another. The same rule is to be observed with respect to cattle strayed and wandering in a desert. If the owner be not presently discovered, let the finder keep them to himself, and appeal to God that he has not purloined what belongs to another.

What is found is not the immediate property of the finder.

It is not lawful to pass by any beast that is overburthened, or bemired upon the way, but to help and preserve it as if it was your own property.

Beasts in distress are to be helped.

It is also a duty to direct the ignorant traveller in his way, and give him the best direction and advice to set him forward on his journey. It is barbarous to sport with him, or cause a delay in the prosecution of his business.

The traveller is to be set right in his way.

Let no man revile his fellow who is either deaf, blind, or dumb.

If any man strikes another upon a sudden quarrel, and it be not with a weapon, let him that is smitten be avenged on the aggressor immediately, by returning the same number of blows as he had received. But if he that was struck be carried home, lie sick many days, and then dies, there shall lie no action of murder in the case; but if he that is smitten recovers, the other party shall pay the whole expence he has been subject to during the whole time of his sickness.

Law concerning assaults, &c.

If any man shall kick a woman with child, so that she miscarries, the judges shall mulct him a sum of money for the loss of a subject, besides another sum of money by way of fine to the woman's husband; but if she die of the stroke, the man must die, according to the law of life for life.

Penalty on beating a woman, and causing a miscarriage.

If there should be found in the possession of any Hebrew, the preparation of any poison that may cause death, or any other harm, he shall suffer death; or undergo the same injury that he would have brought upon them for whom the preparation was made.

Punishment of poisoners.

He that maimeth any man, let him undergo the same himself, and be deprived of the like member of which he hath deprived the other, unless he that is maimed shall think fit to compound for it with money; for the law admits of a man's being so far a judge in his own case, as to moderate the rigour of a penalty for an injury done to himself.

Law against maiming.

Let him that is owner of an ox that is mischievous, and given to goring, kill him. If an ox gores any one, let him be immediately stoned to death, and no man presume to eat of his flesh; but if his owner be convicted, as knowing the fierceness of the beast, and not keeping him up, he shall himself suffer death, as being accessory to the death of another man.

Law concerning oxen that gore.

If the ox hath killed a man or maid servant, let him be stoned, and the owner pay thirty shekels to the master of him that was slain: but if it be an ox that is thus smitten and killed, let both the oxen, that which smote the other, and that which was killed,

ed,

ed, be sold, and let the price be divided between the two owners.

No pit or well is to be left uncovered.

Let those that dig a well or pit, be careful to lay planks over them, and so keep them shut as not to hinder the drawing of water, but to give notice of danger, and thereby prevent man or beast from falling into them. In case any one's beast should fall into a well or pit thus digged, and not shut up, and perish, the owner of the ground shall make satisfaction to the value of the beast.

Whatever is deposited in trust is to be held sacred.

Whoever has received any thing in trust for the use of another man, let him preserve it as sacred, and not, on any consideration, to be touched by man or woman, though immense profit was to accrue, and there was no possibility of bringing it to light. It is fit that a man's conscience should direct him, as the only judge and evidence of what we do, and whether we do well or ill. Let this conscience bear inward testimony, and also induce him so to act, as to procure him commendation from others; but let him chiefly have regard to God, from whom no wicked man can be concealed. But if he in whom the trust was reposed, without any fraud, lose what was deposited with him, let him come before the seven judges, and there make oath, in the presence of God, that nothing has been lost willingly, or with a fraudulent design; he shall then stand acquitted, and depart blameless: but if it shall be made appear that he hath made use of the least part of what was committed to him, let him be condemned to make good the whole of the deposit.

The labourer must be paid his hire.

The same punctuality is to be observed with respect to paying the labourer his hire. Be it ever remembered, that you are not to defraud a poor man of his wages, being sensible that Providence has allotted him those wages, instead of land and other possessions. Nor is the payment to be delayed, but made to the full due upon the same day that his work is finished; for the labourer should not be deprived of the immediate use of that for which he has toiled.

Children not to be punished for the iniquity of their parents.

Children are not to be punished for the iniquity of their parents; but where they preserve a reputable character, deserve pity for the misfortune of such alliances. Nor are the sins of children to be imputed to their fathers, while young persons indulge themselves in practices different from what they had been instructed in, and this through their proud refusal of such instruction.

All castration forbidden.

Let those who have made themselves eunuchs be held in detestation, and be secluded from the converse of society, as having deprived themselves of their manhood, to the disappointment of the main end of their creation. The depravity of their minds must lead them to make so unnatural an experiment on their bodies; for it is evident, that when the soul is effeminate, that effeminacy is diffused throughout the whole frame. Wherefore let neither man, nor any living creature, be castrated, for it is a departure from the grand institution of nature.

Let this be the constitution of your political laws in times of peace, and God will preserve this excellent settlement free from disturbance. But as human affairs are precarious, and troubles and dangers will happen, either undesigned or intentional, it will be necessary to lay down some rules for obviating these contingencies; that so being apprized before-hand what ought to be done, you may have salutary counsels ready when you want them, and may not then be unprovided, and fall into disagreeable circumstances.

Keep to old laws, customs, and discipline.

May you continue in the quiet possession of the land that God hath allotted you, and reap the fruit of your industry and patience, without the hazard of open enemies from abroad, or of worse enemies amongst professed friends. A schism at home would endanger the laws, customs, discipline, and religion of your forefathers, which are the ordinances of God himself, being warranted by the authority of his Divine approbation. From these constitutions you are never to depart.

Let all military operations, whether at present, or in future, be carried on out of your own boundaries. Before you actually wage war, send ambassadors to those who are your voluntary enemies: for it is expedient to expostulate with them, before you proceed to acts of hostility, and assure them that, although you have a numerous army, provided with horses, arms, and all warlike accoutrements, and moreover, God, whose power has ever been exerted in your behalf; do you, however, desire them not to compel you to fight against them, nor to take from them what they have, which, indeed, would be your gain, though it would tend to their irreparable loss. But if your competitors should think fit to put the cause upon a trial of war, lead your army against them, committing the government of the whole to God, and next, under him, to the bravest man for arms, policy, and courage, that you can pitch upon as vicegerent. Do not have many principal officers, as, besides being an obstacle to action, thro' want of agreement, they frequently interrupt and impede execution and dispatch. Look well to the choice of your levies; let them be of chosen men, endowed with extraordinary strength of body, and hardness of mind. Dismiss the timid part, lest they desert in the hour of action, and so afford an advantage to your enemies.

Advice in case of war. Deut. xx.

You shall exempt from obligation those to serve who have lately built them houses, and have not occupied them a year, and those who have planted vineyards, and have not yet reaped the fruits, as well as those who are betrothed, or have lately taken to themselves, wives; lest having their minds set upon those objects, they fear to hazard their lives, and become dastardly and pusillanimous.

Persons exempt from military service.

When you have pitched your camp, take care to avoid whatever is cruel. If engaged in a siege, you want timber for the making of warlike implements, do not cut down fruit-trees, but spare them, considering that they were planted and reared for the benefit of man. If they could speak, they would expostulate with you on the impropriety of destroying that, which was no cause of the war, for the service of it.

Good order to be observed in the camp. No fruit-trees to be cut down.

When you have the fortune to overcome in battle, give no quarter to those of your enemies who were obstinate and stood it out, but preserve the rest, and make them your tributaries, excepting the Canaanites: those you are to extirpate, even the whole nation, root and branch.

No quarter to be given. The Canaanites to be rooted out.

Let no man assume the habit of a woman, nor woman that of a man, especially in a military action.

This was the form of political government left us by Moses. He had already delivered laws in writing, which he had compiled forty years before. Of these we shall treat on a future occasion.

The form of the Hebrew commonwealth.

After this he held assemblies for several successive days, awarding blessings to those who conformed to the laws, and denouncing curses against those who transgressed them. He then recited a kind of poetic song, composed in hexameter verse, and containing a prediction of future events, in the very order in which they occurred, without variation, as to time or matter. This song was inserted in the holy book.

A prophetic hymn and benediction.

To the priests he delivered his books, with the ark, in which were deposited the ten commandments, written on two tables. He left it in charge to the people as soon as they were in possession of the promised land, and had fixed their settlement, to avenge themselves on the Amalekites, for the injuries they had formerly done them in the desert.

He also enjoined them, on the conquest of Canaan, and extenuating the inhabitants, to erect an altar to the eastward, near the city of Shechem, between the mountains Garizim on the right hand, and Gebal on the left, and to divide the army in such a manner, that six tribes should be in each of the mountains, with the priests and Levites. They were to offer up prayers alternately, imploring divine blessings on those who kept the holy commandments, and observed the statutes of Moses, the lawgiver. At the close, the tribes upon Gebal, in acclamations, by way of response, signified an Amen, or, be it so. Curses were then denounced and ratified in the same manner as the blessings. These benedictions and imprecations were committed to writing for future reference. He also ordered them to be inscribed on each side of the altar, the people at the same time sacrificing and offering up burnt-offerings; though after that day they never offered sacrifice upon it, being deemed unlawful. These are the ordinances of Moses, which, by the Hebrew nation, are most religiously observed to this day.

The next day Moses called a general assembly of the people, men, women, and children, even slaves not excepted, and bound them, by a solemn oath, to the observance of the laws according to the will of God, from which they were not, in any point, to deviate, from motives of favour, fear, nor any other pretence whatsoever. If any individual, ever so near and dear to them, or any collective body, was to attempt an innovation, and thereby a dissolution, of the form of government established by them, the people were to take a general vengeance on him or them, and exterminate person and possessions from the face of the earth. But if, by some means that might prevent, they could not avenge themselves in this manner, they were to join in protest against such impious proceedings, as totally opposite to their consent and approbation. To these particulars the multitude bound themselves by oath.

Moses added some instructions as to the form of sacrifice, and the measures of proceeding in great enterprises, referring them, for assurance of the Divine approbation, to the stones on the breast-plate of the high-priest, as already described.

While Moses was present, Joshua, by a prophetic impulse, foretold what he was to do for the welfare of the people, either in the conduct of war abroad, or the administration of government at home, preparing them, by this introductory address, for compliance with a new mode of discipline. He said, that, by inspiration of God, he was authorized to declare, that if they violated the sacred institutions of their religion and laws, they should fall into the direst calamities; their possessions should become a prey to strangers, their cities should be ransacked, their temples laid in ashes, and themselves sold as slaves to a merciless people, till they came at last too late to repentance. He added that God would, in time, restore their cities, with their temples also; but yet they were to forfeit these blessings not once only, but often.

Moses then appointed Joshua to lead the Hebrew army against the Canaanites, assuring him of the Divine aid and protection, and presaging the choicest blessings to the people. He then took his farewell in an address to the following purport:

"Since it is the will of God that I go to my fathers, and that this be the day of my departure, it becomes me, in your presence, to acknowledge the providential care he has exercised towards you and your affairs, not only in

"your deliverance from the extremest miseries, but in concurring upon you innumerable and inestimable blessings: nor can I but acknowledge, as in duty bound, the Divine direction and assistance in all my endeavours for your advantage and prosperity, in the promotion of which I was but a mere instrument, whilst God himself was the grand author and finisher. For all his mercies I render him unfeigned praises and thanksgivings, and to his gracious protection, as a dying man, I commend you. Remember to serve and honour that Supreme Being, who alone is intitled to your adoration and worship. Esteem his laws as the most valuable of all his bounties. Call to mind that a human law-giver would think it the highest indignity to have his ordinances contemned, and his authority trampled upon; and then reflect what must be the awful consequence of being summoned to appear before the tribunal of an incensed God, for wilful contempt and breach of his commandments."

The last address and advice of Moses to the people.

This farewell address was accompanied with several blessings on the tribes, presages of their future destiny, and torrents of tears from the multitude, the women beating their breasts, and the very children expressing extreme regret, at the approaching death of their great leader. In short, the lamentation was universal. Those in advanced life grieved for the loss of so constant and vigilant a protector; those in early life, that they should be deprived of so able a guide.

Moses universally lamented.

But none were more sensibly affected upon this occasion than the grand comforter himself; for notwithstanding his professed contempt of death, and resignation to the will of God, and the law of nature, yet these testimonies of the affection of the people so overcame him, that he could not refrain from tears. As he went to the place where he was to vanish from their sight, they followed him weeping; but he beckoned with his hand, to those at a distance, to stop where they were; and desired those who were near, not to interrupt the peace of his last hours. At his importunity they stood still, but not without bewailing the calamity of so general a loss. He was accompanied only by the senate, Eleazar, the high-priest, and Joshua, his successor.

As soon as they came to Abarim (a), or Nebo, a mountain over against Jericho, which affords a prospect of the fair and fruitful land of Canaan, he dismissed the senate, and, as he was embracing Eleazar and Joshua, and discoursing with them, a cloud suddenly environed him, and he was translated into a certain valley. The sacred records say that he died, lest men should imagine, from his extraordinary virtues, that he was yet alive and with God (b).

Moses withdrawn in sight of the land of Canaan.

Disappears as covered with a cloud.

Moses lived 120 years, a third part of which, within one month, he was ruler of the Hebrews. He died on the last month of the year, and on the first day of the month, called, by the Macedonians, Distrus, but by us, Adar.

Moses was a man of singular understanding (c), which

(a) There were mountains situated in the country of the Moabites, between the two rivers Arnon and Jordan, and commanded a most extensive prospect of the land of Canaan. One part of these mountains was distinguished by the name of Nebo, as appears from Deut. xxxii. 49. but if we compare this with Deut. xxxiv. 1. we shall find that Nebo and Pisgah were one and the same mountain. If, therefore, there was any distinction between the names, it was probably this, that the top of the mountain was more peculiarly called Pisgah, which signifies to elevate or raise up, and, therefore, may very properly denote the top, or summit, of any mountain. Not far from Nebo was Beth-peor, which was probably so called from some deity of that name, worshipped by the Moabites.

(b) As the place of his interment was not known, so no public monument could be erected on the spot to his memory; but, that no particle of his greatness might be lost, his successor, Joshua, (who, no doubt, was the author of the last chapter of Deuteronomy,) has there given him an honourable epitaph, which may be thus paraphrased:—See Deut. xxxiv. 10, 11, 12.

What prophet by the sacred breath inspir'd,
What friend of God, with holy raptures fir'd,
Whose deathless name can equal glories share,
Or with God's servant Moses can compare!
With mortal eyes th' Invisible he saw;
On trembling Sinai's top receiv'd the law:
From Egypt's fetters ransom'd Israel brought,
And in their sight great signs and wonders wrought.

(c) The character of Moses has been delineated by a variety of inspired, as well as profane, writers, all of whom acknowledge him to have been the most excellent legislator and historian ever known. The instances of his conduct related through the course of his history, sufficiently convince us of the truth of this assertion, and that he was a most profound philosopher, a skillful general, an eminent prophet, and a faithful guardian of the people.

which he applied to the wisest purposes. He was a perfect orator, capable of expressing, in the most striking light, his own feelings, and working most effectually upon the passions of others. He was moreover a skilful general, an eminent prophet, and a faithful guardian of the people. The people mourned for him thirty days; nor did ever any grief so deeply affect them, upon the death of this great and holy man. He not only maintained an excellent character among his contemporaries, but his writings have transmitted his fame to immortal ages. Thus much for the end of Moses.

The commendation which the author of Ecclesiasticus gives Moses, is expressed in these words: "Moses (says he) beloved of God and men, and his memorial is blessed. The Lord made him like to the glorious saints, and magnified him so, that his enemies stood in fear of him. By his word he caused the wonders to cease, and he made him glorious in the sight of kings, gave him commandment for his people, and shewed him part of his glory. He sanctified him in his faithfulness and meekness, and chose him out of all men. He made him to hear his voice, and brought him into the dark cloud, and gave him commandments before his face, even the law of life and knowledge, that he might teach Jacob his covenant, and Israel his judgments." Chap. xlv. 1-5.

The character St. Augustin gives of Moses is short, but at the same time very expressive: "He was (says he) the most faithful servant of God; humble in wishing to decline so weighty a ministry, but dutiful in undertaking it; just in keeping, and resolute in executing it; vigilant in government; strict in justice; jealous in love; and patient in suffering."

The apostle St. Paul, in his Epistle to the Hebrews, speaks of Moses as follows: "By faith (says he) Moses, when he was to age, refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter, choosing rather to suffer adversity with the people of God, than to enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season. By faith he forsook Egypt, not fearing the king's displeasure. Through faith he instituted the passover and effusion of blood, lest he that slew the first-born should touch them. By faith he passed through the Red Sea as on dry land, which, when the Egyptians attempted to do, they were swallowed up."

St. Stephen, the Protomartyr, in speaking of Moses, says thus: "Moses was mighty in word and deed; to whom, in the wilderness of mount Sinai, an angel appeared in flame of fire in a bush. Him God sent for a prince and a deliverer of the people, by rescuing them from a servile state of bondage, which he accomplished after doing wonders and miracles in the land of Egypt. This is he that was in the congregation (the church) in the wilderness, and conversed with our fathers, who received the lively oracles to give unto us."

The character given of Moses by St. Ambrose is as follows: "Moses (says he) was the Figure of that Preceptor that was to come, who should preach the Gospel, fulfil the Old Testament, build the New, and feed the people with celestial aliment. Hence the dignity of the human condition is so highly advanced, that he is called by the name of God, I have made thee a god to Pharaoh. Exod. vii. 1. that is, I have given thee authority to speak to him in my name. And, indeed, he became his character; for he was master of his passions, not inclined to worldly desires, but, in mind and body, endeavoured to conduct himself after the likeness of that perfection of his God, as far as nature would permit. And, therefore, we read quite differently of him, what we do of others, who die through some defect of nature. With him it was otherwise; for, notwithstanding his great age, he retained the use of all his faculties to the last, his eyes failing, nor his natural force abated; but died according to the word of the Lord."

[Including a Period of about Three Hundred and Fifty-seven Years.]

C H A P. I.

Joshua succeeds Moses. Sends spies into Canaan. They are protected by a woman called Rahab. Jericho besieged, and laid waste by the Hebrews. Joshua forms a league with the Gibeonites. Obtains a complete conquest over the Canaanites. Divides their lands among the different tribes. Lot of each tribe. Death and character of Joshua.

AFTER the accustomed ceremonies were over, and the last duty paid to the memory of Moses, Joshua ordered the people to get themselves in readiness for marching, and, in the mean time, dispatched certain persons to Jericho, in order to learn the strength of the place, and the disposition of the inhabitants. On this occasion he convened the leaders of the tribes of Reuben and Gad, and the half tribe of Manasse: the latter of whom had been promised to settle in the country of the Amorites, which includes a seventh part of the land of Canaan.

When these leaders were assembled together, Joshua reminded them of the promises they had made to Moses, and earnestly intreated them, not only for his sake, but also for their own, to fulfill their engagement. They cheerfully complied with Joshua's request, and immediately joined his army with a body of 50,000 men.

Joshua having received this assistance, marched with his whole army about sixty furlongs towards the banks of the river Jordan. They had scarce pitched their tents, before the spies, who had been sent to Jericho, arrived, and gave the following account of what had happened to them during their stay in that city.

That the inhabitants, considering them as strangers come to gratify their curiosity, permitted them to perambulate the city without interruption; in consequence of which they had the opportunity of viewing the walls, ramparts, and other fortifications raised for the defence of the city. That, towards the close of the day, they retired to a house, situated near the wall of the city, where they refreshed themselves, and intended leaving the place early the next morning. While they were at this house, information had been given the king, that there were spies in the city from the Hebrew camp, and that they were concealed in the house of a woman named Rahab, in consequence of which an order was issued for apprehending them; and that, if they did not confess who they were, and on what business they came, they should be put to the torture. As soon as Rahab was informed of this, she communicated the intelligence to the spies, and taking them to a retired part of the house, concealed them, by covering them over with a large quantity of flax. That when the officers of justice came in search of them, Rahab told them, there had, indeed, been strangers there, but that, after supper, they departed; and as the time was but short since they went, if they were the dangerous people suspected, she did not doubt but, by immediate endeavours, they might be easily taken. The honesty of the woman's countenance, and the simple manner in which she expressed herself, satisfied the officers, and they immediately left the house to go in quest of the spies; but after travelling some way, and finding no likelihood of succeeding, they desisted from their pursuit, supposing they had effectually made their escape. That when the confusion which the alarm occasioned, had in some degree subsided, Rahab uncovered them, related what had passed, and pointed out the great danger to which she had exposed herself and family for their protection; as a return for which she exacted from them an oath, that when the city should be invested, and rendered desolate by the Hebrews, (for she told them it had been revealed to her by the Almighty that it should), they should preserve her and her relations from the general destruction. That they had faithfully promised the protection she required, to effect which they had told her, that, when she found the city attacked, to shut herself up, together with her relations, in her house; and that, in order to distinguish it from the rest, she must affix red strings to the door, which signal should be communicated to the general, who would, no doubt, give such directions, as to secure her from all danger. That after this agreement was made between them, they departed, being assisted by Rahab, who, for that purpose, had got a rope, and fastened it to the top of one part of the house, by means of which they made their escape unperceived.

Rahab conveys the spies away in safety.

When the spies had given the relation to Joshua, and the principal officers of the army, a consultation was held with Eleazar, the high-priest, and the elders, whether the promise made by the spies to Rahab ought to be strictly observed; which was agreed to by those sages, and the obligation ratified.

The Hebrew army pitch their tents on the borders of the river Jordan.

The Hebrews were on the opposite side of the river to that of Jericho, and the great difficulty was to pass the river, the current being exceeding rapid, and no method to be projected that could facilitate their design. These reflections gave great uneasiness to Joshua; but his troubles were soon removed by a Divine revelation from the Almighty, who assured him, that those obstacles should be removed, and that the river should be rendered so fordable, that the army might pass it with the greatest safety.

A miraculous passage opened for Hebrews over the river. Order in which they passed.

This Divine promise was fulfilled two days after it was made, and the whole army passed the river in the following order: first, the priests bearing the ark, who were followed by the Levites, carrying the tabernacle, and the holy vessels. After these marched the whole army, divided into ranks, according to the order of their respective tribes. The women and children were placed in the center of the army, that they might be the better secured from the violence of the current. When the priests entered the river, the rapidity of the stream abated, and the water gradually sunk, till the bottom became quite dry; so that the whole multitude passed over without the least apprehension of danger. The priests were the last who quitted the bed of the river, which they had no sooner done, than the waters returned, and resumed their natural course; and thus was the promise made by the Almighty amply fulfilled.

Joshua erects an altar of twelve stones, and consecrates by sacrifices.

After passing the river, the whole army proceeded immediately on the march, and encamped within ten furlongs of the city of Jericho. On this spot Joshua erected an altar, consisting of twelve stones, which, by his order, had been brought by twelve princes of the several tribes, from the bottom of the river. This altar was raised by Joshua, to perpetuate the remembrance of the miraculous separation of waters; and on it he offered sacrifices, and celebrated the feast of the passover (a).

Hebrews labour under a dearth of manna.

While the Israelites were on the other side the river Jordan, they had, for some time, laboured under great difficulties from the manna, which had been their principal subsistence during forty years in the wilderness, having failed them; but when they came on that side of the river next Jericho, these inconveniencies were removed. It happened to be at the time when the harvest of the Canaanites was ripe, and the country well stocked with cattle and other kinds of provision; all which they had the power of enjoying without interruption.

From the apparent pusillanimity of the Canaanites, in suffering the Israelites to ravage their country at discretion, and at the same time keeping themselves secured within the walls of the city, Joshua was convinced he should not be able to bring them to action, and therefore determined to lay siege to the place, and put all the inhabitants to the sword.

Joshua resolves on the siege of Jericho.

Having formed this resolution, on the first day of the Feast of the Passover he ordered a procession to be made round the walls of the city, the manner of which was this: first, a certain number of priests, carrying the ark, surrounded by a considerable body of the troops; these were followed by seven other priests, each blowing a horn, or trumpet, to animate the soldiers; and the whole was closed by the elders. In this manner they marched round the walls of the city, and then returned to their camp.

Order of the priests procession with the ark.

This ceremony was repeated for six successive days; during which time not a single person of the Canaanites was seen without the walls of the city. On the seventh day Joshua, addressing himself not only to the army, but the people in general, told them, that, on that day the city of Jericho should be delivered into their hands, and that without any efforts being made on their parts to effect it; for that the very walls would fall of themselves, and the city would be rendered totally defenceless. He strictly charged them to confine attention to the destruction of the inhabitants, all of whom they should put to the sword, except Rahab and her family, that the oath might be strictly performed which had been given by the spies, when they were on the other side the river Jordan. He likewise told them, that whatever gold or silver they should find, to lay it in a heap on the spot, for it should be dedicated to God as the first fruits of a victory obtained over the Canaanites.

Joshua, after delivering these instructions to the army and people, marched towards the city, and proceeded round the walls of it in the same manner, and with the same ceremonies, as before mentioned in the Feast of the Passover; but, as they were passing the seventh time, they made a halt, when the wall suddenly gave way, and the whole fell to the ground.

The walls of Jericho give way, and fall to the ground.

This surprising and unexpected event threw the Canaanites into the utmost consternation, inasmuch that they had not power to attempt the least resistance. In consequence of this the Israelites immediately entered the city, and, to obey the instructions previously given them by Joshua, put all to the sword (b), except Rahab and her family; the former of whom being brought before Joshua, he rewarded her in the most ample manner for the services she had done him.

Jericho is taken, and all the inhabitants put to the sword, except Rahab and her friends.

To make a final destruction of the city of Jericho, the Israelites, after murdering the inhabitants, set it on fire, and the whole was reduced to an heap of ashes. A prophetic curse (c) was likewise denounced against any person who should ever after attempt to rebuild it; that whoever should take upon him to lay the first stone might be punished by the loss of his eldest son; and whoever should finish the work, his youngest. In the city were found great quantities of gold, silver, and brass, the whole of which was of immense value, and being gathered together, as Joshua had ordered, he presented it to the priests to be deposited in the sacred treasury.

Great spoil found in the city.

Notwithstanding the caution Joshua had taken to prevent private plunder, yet one Achar, the son of Zebedee, and of the tribe of Judah, made a breach on the injunction, by concealing the cloak of the king of the Canaanites, which was not only rich in itself, but had about it as much gold as weighed two hundred shekels. He argued with himself, that as he had hazarded his life to obtain it, he thought he had a right to enjoy it, and that it would be ridiculous to offer that to God which Achar is found guilty of theft.

(a) This was the third time of their celebrating that festival. The first was at their departure out of Egypt, and the second at their erecting the tabernacle at the foot of Mount Sinai.

(b) Here we may observe, that whenever any of the public enemies of the Jews had been, for their wickedness, solemnly devoted to destruction according to the Divine command, as were generally the seven wicked nations of Canaan, and those sinners the Amalekites, it was utterly unlawful to permit those enemies to be redeemed; but they were to be all utterly destroyed. See Numb. xxi. 2, &c.

(c) The words of Joshua's execration in the text are as follow: "Curse be the man before the Lord that raiseth up and buildeth this city Jericho; he shall lay the foundation thereof in his first-born, and in his youngest son shall he set up the gates of it." Josh. vi. 26.

was only designed for the use of man. He therefore dug a pit in his tent, and there hid the cloak; supposing that it would be equally hidden from God, as it was from his companions.

The army of the Israelites was at this time encamped at a place called by them Gilgal, which signifies liberty; intimating, that they now thought themselves secure from any future danger, and that they should never again be sensible of the like misfortunes they had experienced during their residence in the wilderness.

A short time after the destruction of Jericho, Joshua sent out a detachment of 2000 men to invest Ain, another city, situated at a small distance from the former. In this attack the Israelites met with a warm repulse: thirty-six of them were slain, among whom were several persons the relations of distinguished characters, and the rest were obliged to seek their safety by flight. The news of this defeat greatly dispirited the whole army of the Israelites, who, from the promises made them by Divine revelation, had set it down for granted, that whatever project they engaged in, it would infallibly prove successful. From this disappointment, and the reflection of its consequences, they clothed themselves with sackcloth, and spent the day in fasting and prayer. The mind of Joshua was likewise particularly impressed with despair; and prostrating himself on the ground, in the most fervent manner addressed the Almighty in words to the following effect:

“ Lord (said he) we came not hither rashly, or unadvisedly, to reduce this country under our power and dominion, but from a pure deference and respect to the persuasion of thy servant Moses, to whom thou didst promise the possession of this country, and that we should be victorious over all our enemies. The sudden change which has taken place, in the disappointment of our hopes, and loss of our friends, greatly alarms us, and the more so, lest we should prove equally unsuccessful in any future attempts. Do thou, therefore, O Lord, who alone art able to give us relief, help and preserve us. Vouchsafe unto us comfort and victory; and be graciously pleased to give us future hopes, by removing the despair under which we at present labour.”

When Joshua had finished his prayer, God commanded him to rise, and to purge the army from a pollution it had acquired by a sacrilegious theft, and which was the real cause of the mischief that had befallen them. That there should be lots cast to find out the criminal, who should be made an example of for his perfidiousness; and that afterwards, whatever they undertook should be attended with success.

Joshua immediately communicated these instructions and assurances to the people; and calling to him Eleazar, the high-priest, and the princes of the tribes, he ordered that lots should be first cast to discover the tribe to which the thief belonged. This was accordingly done, when it fell upon the tribe of Judah; in consequence of which lots were again cast among the several families of that tribe. On examination it appeared that the lot fell on Achar, who belonged to the family of Zaccharis. He was accordingly taken into custody; and being conscious of his iniquity, confessed the fact, and delivered up the plunder in presence of the multitude. Upon this he was immediately put to an ignominious death, and his body denied the accustomed ceremonies of interment.

When Joshua had purged his army, agreeable to the Divine command, he marched towards the city of Ain; and planting a body of men in ambuscade the preceding evening, he the next morning presented himself in sight of the enemy with his main body. The Ainites were so elated with their former success, that, as soon as they saw the Israelites, they immediately advanced in the most furious manner to give them battle. On this Joshua feigned a retreat, till, having drawn the Ainites a considerable distance from the city, he made a stop, and gave a signal (which had been previously agreed on) to the troops in ambush. Agreeable to this signal they immediately entered the city, where they met with little opposition; the greater part of the inhabitants having planted themselves on the walls to see the action, in full confidence, from the success they had met with before, that the Israelites would be totally overthrown. These detached troops made themselves masters of the city, and put the inhabitants to the sword; while the grand army engaged that of the Ainites, and totally defeated them. The greater part were killed in the action; and the remainder fled for protection to the city, not suspecting that it was already in the hands of their enemies; but when they discovered its situation, and the great danger they were in; they had immediate recourse to flight, and concealed themselves in wilds and deserts. The booty taken on this occasion was of immense value, consisting of great quantities of plate, costly furniture, gold, silver, coined money, and other articles, all which were divided among the soldiers, as a reward for their past, and an encouragement for their future, conduct.

The great success of Joshua against the cities of Jericho and Ain, and the slaughter made among the inhabitants, had struck such a panic in the kings of the respective provinces on that side the river Jordan, that they confederated together, and entered into a league for their mutual defence. But the Gibeonites, foreseeing the destruction that awaited them, and being apprehensive that all resistance would be in vain, consulted with their neighbours, the inhabitants of Cephirah and Kerithyearim, among whom it was agreed, that endeavours should be used to obtain a peace with the Israelites: but as they knew that could not be effected should it be known they were Canaanites, they had recourse to the following stratagem. They selected a certain number of artful men, who were instructed to feign themselves ambassadors come from a very distant country, in order to obtain a league with the people of Israel. To make this story appear plausible, they were dressed in tattered garments, with worn-out shoes on their feet; and the bread they took with them in their bags was so musty as to be entirely useless. In this situation they arrived at Gilgal (a), the place where Joshua was encamped, to whom being introduced, they told him, that, from the many miracles which God had wrought for them in the land of Egypt, and the wonderful successes wherewith he had blessed their arms against every power that had opposed them in their coming to that place, their states and rulers had sent them from a very remote country, to form a league of friendship with them, and that on such conditions were customary with their forefathers. They then pointed to their garments, which they solemnly assured Joshua were quite new when they set out on their journey; but that the great length of it had reduced them to the state in which they then appeared.

This plausible tale gained such credit with the Israelites, that they entered into an amicable alliance with them; and Eleazar, the high-priest, with the princes of the respective tribes, solemnly ratified the treaty, the whole multitude assenting to the oaths made by their leaders. When the business was over, the ambassadors took their leave, and hastened to the Gibeonites with the glad tidings of their distinguished success.

A few days after the departure of the ambassadors the whole was discovered; when it appeared that the Gibeonites were inhabitants of Canaan, and that they resided at a small distance from Jerusalem. This discovery greatly alarmed Joshua, who sent for the governors, and reproached them for having practised such a deception; to which they replied, that they were compelled to do it in their own defence, as they had reason to think they should otherwise share a similar fate with the inhabitants of Jericho and Ain. Joshua was desirous of having the league cancelled; but it was confirmed by a solemn oath, this could not be done without incurring the Divine displeasure. It was therefore resolved, in order to appease the people, that, as a punishment for the imposition, the Gibeonites should ever after be kept in a state of bondage.

The Gibeonites subjected to public drudgery.

The king of Jerusalem enters into a league with four neighbouring kings, and makes war with the Gibeonites.

The Gibeonites apply to Joshua for aid against the confederates.

Joshua hastens with his army to their relief, and puts the enemy to flight.

A dreadful tempest.

The sun stands still.

The confederate kings are taken, and put to death by order of Joshua.

When the confederate princes (who were five in number, the principal of whom was the king of Jerusalem) heard of the separate treaty made by the Gibeonites, and the artful manner in which it was obtained, they resolved to be revenged on them for desertion of the common cause. Accordingly they joined all their forces, and marched towards their city, with a determined resolution of laying siege to it. When they came within a small distance of the place they pitched their tents, intending to begin the attack early the next morning. In the mean time the Gibeonites dispatched a messenger to Joshua, imploring his immediate assistance, as they must otherwise inevitably fall into the hands of the Canaanites. Joshua lost no time in complying with the request of the Gibeonites, and marching his army the whole night, he, the next morning, arrived at the spot where the enemy were encamped. He immediately led on his troops to action; and the Canaanites, finding all resistance was likely to prove ineffectual, fled, but were pursued by the Israelites to a place called Beth-hora. In this expedition God had all along encouraged Joshua, by promising him success; and therefore, as the confederate forces were endeavouring to escape, and save themselves by flight, he suffered a violent storm of hail (a) to fall, the stones of which were so large that more people were destroyed by them than what fell by the sword. As a farther proof of Divine interposition, a circumstance occurred on that day, the like of which never happened either before or since; namely, the sun itself stood still (b) in the firmament, that the Israelites might not want day-light to compleat the victory. This last circumstance is most expressly attested in the Holy Scriptures, according to the copies preserved in the temple.

The confederate kings, finding themselves so closely pursued, and likely to be either slain or made captives, concealed themselves in a cave at a place called Makkedah; intelligence of which being given to Joshua, he ordered the cave to be blocked up, and a guard placed over it. After he returned from pursuing the enemy, he ordered the cave to be opened, and the kings being brought forth, they were hung upon trees till the evening, when their bodies were taken down, and thrown into the cave; so that the place they had pitched on for a sanctuary became their sepulchre.

After this defeat, Joshua proceeded to the southern parts of Canaan; where, having destroyed the inhabitants, and seized their most valuable possessions, he returned with his army to the camp at Gilgal.

(a) The propriety and intent of the miracles performed this day are thus explained by a learned Divine: "All nations had at that time their several tutelary deities, to whose protection they committed themselves and their country, and of whose power they judged by their successes in war. Now the three principal deities whom the inhabitants of Canaan adored were the sun, the moon, and heavens or air. To convince them, therefore, in their own way, that the gods in whom they trusted were subject to the God of Israel, and to punish them, at the same time, for the worship they paid them, the Lord showered down great hail-stones from the heavens or air, which slew vast numbers of their powerful army, and then stopped the two great luminaries in their course, which gave the Israelites time and opportunity to complete their victory over the remainder."

(b) The deists have greatly cavilled at this miracle, on account of its not being recorded by heathen writers. But that it should not be mentioned by them is not in the least to be

Though the great destruction made by the army of the Israelites had struck a terror in most parts of Canaan, yet it had not that effect on the princes of the north, who, instead of being intimidated, formed the resolution of boldly attacking Joshua. They accordingly drew their forces together, and pitched their camp at Berothæ, a city of the Upper Galilee, not far from the waters of Merom (c). Their army consisted of 300,000 foot, 10,000 horse, and 2000 chariots.

A powerful confederacy formed by the Canaanite kings against Joshua.

When the Israelites understood what a formidable army was raised against them by the Canaanites, they became greatly dispirited; and even Joshua himself was almost sunk into despair. But they were dispelled, on Joshua's receiving assurances from God that they should overcome their enemies; and, to make their conquest compleat, he was commanded to kill their horses, and burn their chariots.

Joshua and his army at first intimidated, but afterwards encouraged by assurances of the Divine aid.

Encouraged by this Divine protection, Joshua immediately marched his army against that of the Canaanites. On the fifth day he came within sight of their camp, and ordering his troops to advance with all possible dispatch, they fell so suddenly on the enemy, that they were immediately thrown into disorder. Those who attempted resistance were all slain on the spot: and such as fled, being pursued, were overtaken and slain. Their horses were also all killed, and their chariots committed to the flames.

A desperate action ensued, in which the Canaanites are totally routed, and their kings slain.

The success of this day made Joshua absolute master of the country. He pursued his rout to a considerable distance, plundering every town he came to, and putting all the inhabitants to the sword. In short, the whole country was one continued scene of desolation, and the inhabitants of it totally extirpated, except a small number who had accidentally escaped, and secured themselves in places of great strength. Such was the desolation made in the land of Canaan during a war of only five years.

The whole country is laid waste, and the inhabitants exterminated, by the army of Joshua, in the course of a war of five years.

Joshua, having thus reduced the Canaanites, returned with his army to Gilgal; from whence, after a short time, he removed to the mountainous part of the country, and fixed the holy tabernacle in the city of Shiloh. The situation of this place was exceeding delightful; and here it was that Joshua intended, when circumstances would permit, to build a temple.

Joshua proceeds from Gilgal to Shiloh, to plant the tabernacle there.

From Shiloh Joshua removed, with all his people, to Shechem, where he erected an altar, as had been some years before appointed by Moses. He then divided his army, one half of which was placed on Mount Garizim, and the other half on Mount Gebal. At the latter place he erected another altar, on which the priests offered sacrifices; and when they had denounced the malediction before recited, and engraved them upon the altar, they returned to Shiloh.

At this place, a short time after, Joshua convened a general assembly of the people; and, after reminding them of the great success they had met with through the assistance of the Divine protection, he observed, that the Canaanites had still many cities in their possession, which were rendered so strong by nature and art together, as to be almost wondered at, when we consider that Homer, who wrote above a thousand years after Joshua, is their oldest writer now extant. Letters were not then known among the heathens, and therefore it is no wonder that such a circumstance should have been forgotten.

(c) Some of the learned are of opinion, that by the Waters of Merom are meant the lake Semechon, which lies between the head of the river Jordan and the lake Genesareth. But others imagine that these waters were somewhere about the brook Kishon, there being a place of that name mentioned in the account of the battle against Sisera, Judges v. 21. It is, however, more reasonable to think, that the confederate kings advanced as far as the brook Kishon, and to a pass which led into the country, to hinder Joshua from penetrating it, than to imagine they waited for him in the midst of their own country, leaving all Galilee at his mercy, and the whole track from the brook Kishon to the lake Semechon. See Wells's Geography of the Old Testament.

impregnable. That as it must consequently be a work of time to subdue them, he thought it advisable, in the first place, that those tribes who came with them from the other side of Jordan, and had assisted them with such fidelity in destroying their enemies, should be dismissed, with suitable acknowledgements for their services. And, secondly, that a proper person should be chosen out for every tribe, who should act as commissioners for taking an exact survey of the captured land, a proper state of which should be laid before another assembly convened for the purpose.

These propositions being universally approved of by the people, commissioners (one out of each of the tribes, who were to partake of the division of the country) were accordingly chosen; and a certain number of men, distinguished for their superior knowledge in surveying, were appointed to assist them. As some parts of the country were remarkable for the richness and fertility of the soil, while others were almost barren, they had instructions to take the admeasurement agreeable to the quality; so that though one part might be much more extensive than another, yet the whole divisions might be, on an average, of equal value.

These commissioners, with their assistants, having executed the business on which they were sent, returned, at the expiration of seven months, to Shiloh, which was at that time the seat of the tabernacle. On their arrival, Joshua convened another assembly, consisting of Eleazar, the high-priest, together with the elders, and the princes of the respective tribes. When the state of the admeasurement was laid before them, Joshua divided the whole country (a) between the nine tribes and the half tribe of Menasses, proportioning the shares to the number of families in each tribe. The different allotments were as follow:

To the tribe of Judah was assigned all the Upper Judea, extending, in length, to the city of Jerusalem, and, in breadth, to the lake of Sodom; in which compass were included the cities of Ascalon and Gaza.

The tribe of Simeon had that part of Idumæa which borders on Egypt and Arabia.

To the tribe of Benjamin was allotted all that part of the country, which extends, in length, from the river Jordan to the sea, and, in breadth, from Jerusalem to Bethel. This district is exceeding small in proportion to the rest; but the quality makes amends for the quantity, more especially as it contains the two cities of Jericho and Jerusalem.

The tribe of Ephraim had, for their lot, that part of the country which reaches, in length, from Jordan to Gadara, and, in breadth, from Bethel to the Great Plain.

To the half tribe of Menasses was allotted that track of land which reaches, in length, from the river Jordan to the city of Dor, and, in breadth, to the city of Bethsana, since known by the name of Scythopolis.

The tribe of Issachar had, for their lot, all that part of the country which reaches, in length, from the river Jordan to Mount Carmel, and, in breadth, to Mount Itabyr.

To the tribe of Zebulon was assigned all that track of land which borders on Mount Carmel and the sea, and stands as far as the lake Genesareth.

The tribe of Aser had, for their lot, all the country behind Mount Carmel, opposite Sidon; in which district was included the city of Arie, otherwise called Aetipus.

To the tribe of Naphthali was allotted the Upper Galilee, and the eastern parts of the country, including the city of Damascus, Mount Libanus, and the head of the river Jordan, which takes its rise from that side of the mount belonging to the city of Arce.

The tribe of Dan had, for their own share, all the vallies lying to the west between Azotus and Doran, together with the cities of Jamnia and Githa, with the whole country from Acheron, where the portion allotted to the tribes of Judah commences.

Thus did Joshua divide, among the nine tribes and a half, the six provinces of the Canaanites, which received their names from so many of the sons of Canaan. The seventh province (named Amorrhoæa, from another of the sons of Canaan) was not at his disposal, it having been long before granted by Moses to the other half tribe of Menasses, and the two tribes of Reuben and Gad. Those parts of the country which belonged to the Sidonians, Arucæans, Ainathæans, and Arithæans, being, at the time the above division was made, uninhabited, were totally excluded.

Joshua, being now far advanced in years, and fearful, from the natural infirmities of age, he should not be able, much longer, to hold the reins of government, called together the heads of the different tribes, to whom he gave a strict charge, that they would be particularly diligent in using their utmost endeavours to destroy the Canaanites, and not suffer any to reside in the land they possessed, and which had been divided amongst them by lots. He told them that a strict attention to this request would be in conformity to the will of their late legislator Moses, and that it was fully consistent both with their laws and religion. He likewise strictly charged them to deliver up to the Levites the remaining thirty-eight, out of the forty-eight, cities assigned them by Moses; they being already in possession of the other ten, situated in Amorrhoæa, on the other side the river Jordan. Three of these cities he assigned as places of refuge, being earnestly solicitous that nothing should be neglected which Moses had ordained. The first of these cities was Hebron, belonging to the tribe of Judah; the second Shechem, belonging to the tribe of Ephraim; and the third, Ceden, in Upper Galilee, belonging to the tribe of Naphthali. These regulations were received by the people with universal applause, they being very willing to pay a strict attention and reverence to the ordinances of Moses.

After Joshua had laid these injunctions on the people, he proceeded to divide the plunder, which had been taken from the Canaanites, among his soldiers. It consisted of cattle and flocks innumerable, together with great quantities of money, plate, furniture, and other articles; so that though the number of people was great, each person had a very considerable booty.

A few days after Joshua had made these regulations, he assembled together the auxiliaries (namely, the tribes of Reuben and Gad, with the half tribe of Menasses, consisting of 50,000 men) who had come with him from the other side the river Jordan, and had assisted him with fidelity during the whole course of the war against the Canaanites. When these people were assembled together, Joshua addressed them in words to the following effect:

“ Friends and Brethren,
“ Seeing it hath pleased God not only to establish us in this country, but to promise a perpetual possession of it to our posterity; and since God has been likewise pleased to accept your proffered service in assisting us to subdue our enemies, it is but reasonable, that you, who have shared so great a part in the dangers and difficulties of the war, should now share a part also in the comforts and blessings of a common peace.

(a) The measures Joshua took, on this occasion, were exactly conformable to the orders which God had given to Moses. Unto these shall the land be divided for inheritance, according to the number of names. To many thou shalt give the more inheritance, and to few thou shalt give the less inheritance. Notwithstanding the land shall be divided by lot: according to lot shall the possession thereof be divided between many and few. See Numb. xxvi. 53, &c.

Joshua xvi. Joshua dismisses the auxiliaries in an eloquent speech.

“ To this end we think it but justice to discharge you from any farther attendance at present; not doubting but, if occasion should require it, you will readily contribute your assistance at any future period. For the services you have already done us, accept our most grateful acknowledgments; and we hope that the sense of good offices gone and past, may be improved into a mutual and inviolable league of friendship for the time to come, remembering that we stand indebted for the advantages already received, next under God, to the force of this reciprocal alliance. Your services have not gone unrewarded, so far, at least, as an inestimable booty may be considered as a recompence. Be assured you will ever find in me a most sincere friend, being sufficiently satisfied that you have paid a strict attention to the last will of Moses, and that you have done every thing in your power that was consistent with his ordinances. I now give you full liberty to depart to your respective homes, and most sincerely wish you to enjoy the advantages you have received from our great success in war. Let no distance of place, no interposition of rivers, set limits to our friendship, or divide our affections; for, however separated, we are all Hebrews still. It was from one and the same God that Abraham, and all our forefathers, received their being; and it is that God we are all to worship, according to the ordinances and institutions left us by Moses. So long we stand firm to our religion, we may be assured of the favour and protection of that God for our comfort: but should you deviate from your religious principles, and embrace idolatry, depend upon it the God of your fathers will desert and forsake you.”

Joshua's final orders.

The people weep at the departure of their brethren.

When Joshua had finished his speech, he took a solemn and distinct leave, first of the princes, and then of the people; and they immediately departed for their own country. The other tribes accompanied them a considerable way; and when they parted, the latter testified their affection by tears and lamentation.

An altar erected near the place of passage over the river Jordan, a memorial of the league between the tribes on each side the river.

As soon as the disbanded tribes arrived on the other side the river Jordan, they erected an altar near the place where they and their brethren miraculously passed over; not for any religious use, but as a memorial to succeeding generations, that, though they were parted by the river, they were of the same descent and religion, and held an equal right to the tabernacle at Shiloh, and to the worship of God performed there, as their brethren on the other side the river. The latter, either from being misinformed, or misapprehending the intent of this altar being erected, fell into a violent rage against them, as apostates from the true religion; and immediately took up arms in vindication of the worship and religion of their forefathers, and to avenge the cause of God upon the heads and chief authors of this defection. But, before they proceeded to these extremities, their rulers advised them to suspend the execution of their wrath till they had sent a deputation, in order to know their reason for building such an altar. This being agreed to by the people, they made choice of Phineas, the son of Eleazar, with ten other persons of eminent distinction, to go on the embassy. As soon as these commissioners arrived on the other side the river Jordan, they convened an assembly of the people, when Phineas addressed them as follows:

The erecting of the altar causes jealousy and suspicion.

Phineas, and ten respectable men, sent to expostulate with the discontented tribes.

An assembly called.

Address of Phineas.

“ We are very sensible that the crime charged on you at present is of too heinous a nature to be punished by words only; but we have not rashly taken up arms to execute vengeance in proportion to the degree of iniquity committed. We have considered that you are in alliance with us, and hope that, in serious reflection, and a proper admonition from us, you will be made sensible of your error, and brought to a proper sense of your duty. We desire that you will frankly and honestly inform us, upon what motives, and with what design, you erected this altar. If it was from motives consistent with the religion of

“ Moses, we are not angry with you; but if you are gone over to a false worship, we must draw our swords in defence of that religion you have so sacrilegiously violated. We most sincerely hope the latter is not the case; for we cannot think it possible that a people so well acquainted with the laws of God, our friends and allies, from whom we have so lately parted, can be so insensible and ungrateful, as to abandon the holy tabernacle, the ark and the altar, and the worship of your forefathers, to join with our enemies, the Canaanites, in the worship of false gods. Should this unfortunately be the case, we intreat you to repent, and return to that reverence you owe to the laws of God and your country, and you shall be again received: but if you obstinately persist in your error, we must compel you to obedience by force of arms. Do not imagine that, because you are separated from us by a river, you are therefore out of the reach of God's power; for you are under his jurisdiction wherever you exist. If the temptations of the place in which you live are too powerful for you to withstand, remove to a distant country; for depend on it, if you continue here, and persevere in your error, destruction will be the consequence. Take advice in time, relinquish you apostacy, and adore the true God, who will ever protect you, as he has hitherto done your forefathers. Consider well what is now said to you; and do not put us to the necessity of commencing a war that will be exceeding disagreeable to us, and infallibly destructive to you. You have still your choice left, either to continue friends, by returning to your duty, or otherwise to become enemies; in the latter of which cases no distinction will be made between apostate Israelites, and professed Canaanites.”

When Phineas had finished his speech, one of the rulers of the assembly, in the name of the whole multitude, addressing himself to the deputies, returned the following answer:

“ The accusation you have laid against us is ill-founded. We have not made the least breach in the alliance so happily formed with our brethren on the other side Jordan; nor have we been guilty of any affectation or novelty in erecting this altar. We know but one God, who is the God of all the Hebrews; and but one altar, which is the brazen altar before the tabernacle. With respect to the altar in question, it was never intended for any religious use, but only as a memorial to posterity of our mutual friendship and alliance; and rather to keep us steady in our antient religion, than to be any ways instrumental to the violation of it. God is our witness that this, and this only, was the occasion of the altar being erected; whence we intreat you to lay aside those suspicions you have entertained, and not impute to us what would render any part of the posterity of Abraham, who should be guilty of such conduct, deserving of immediate death.

The reply of the eldest tribes.

This answer gave great satisfaction to the deputies, who immediately returned to Joshua, and an assembly being called, related to them the particulars of all that had passed. Not only Joshua, but the princes of the tribes, and, in short, all the people, rejoiced at the result of this embassy; for which they offered sacrifices of thanksgiving to God. When this was done, Joshua dismissed the people, and retired to Shechem.

The deputies are perfectly satisfied with the reply.

As are Joshua and the people in general. Joshua dismisses them, and retires to Shechem.

No particular occurrence took place from this period till the death of Joshua, which happened about twenty years after. He was at this time far advanced in years, and finding his dissolution near at hand, he convened a assembly of the leaders of the tribes, the elders, magistrates, and as many of the common people as could be gathered together. When the whole appeared before him, he harangued them in a pertinent discourse, on the great benefits and protection they had received from the hand of Providence. He pointed out to them in what manner he had preserved them even in the midst of dangers; and and that he had not only relieved them in all their wants and distresses, but had raised them from the most abject to the most prosperous situation in life. For these great and distinguished benefits he strictly enjoined them to be always diligent and attentive to their religious duties; and, if they would wish to preserve the favour of their great benefactor, to live in the fear and love of him, and in the observance of his commandments. He told them, that this would, in all probability, be the last time he should have the opportunity of addressing himself to them, he hoped what he had said would remain impressed on their minds, and that in remembrance of him, and their great legislator Moses, they would conduct themselves in such a manner, as to obtain happiness in this world, and everlasting felicity in the next.

When Joshua had finished his address, he dismissed the assembly, a short time after which he paid the debt of nature. At the time of his death he was in the 110th year of his age, 40 of which were spent under the direction of Moses, whom he succeeded in the administration, and in which office he continued 26 years.

He was a man who possessed great prudence, and had a manner of expressing his thoughts that gave pleasure to all who heard him. He was brave and indefatigable in war; and in times of peace he conducted himself in such a manner as to acquire the universal good-will and affection of the people. His remains were deposited at Thamna, a city belonging to the tribe of Ephraim.

About the same time that Joshua died, Eleazar, the high-priest, also paid the debt of nature, and was succeeded in the priest-hood by his son Phineas. His remains were deposited in the city of Gabatha.

CHAP. II.

The government of the Israelites, vested in the tribe of Judah. Their success against the Canaanites. Jerusalem besieged. The people become disobedient. The Benjamites maltreat the wife of a Levite. A civil war between them and the other tribes. The Benjamites defeated, after which a peace is made, and they are restored to their former privileges.

AFTER the death of Joshua the people had a consultation with Phineas, relative to the farther prosecution of the war against the Canaanites; when it was resolved that it should be carried on with the greatest vigour, and that the chief command and direction of it should be committed to the tribe of Judah, who should be assisted by the tribe of Simeon.

The Canaanites were at this time exceeding strong, and receiving intimation of the intentions of the Israelites, they gathered together a great army under the command of Adonibezec, and encamped themselves near the city of Bezek. Their principal expectations of success were built on the loss of Joshua; but they soon found themselves deceived; for when the two tribes of Israelites attacked them, they fell on with such resolution, that the Canaanites immediately gave way, and upwards of 10,000 were killed on the spot. Great numbers took to flight, but being close pursued by the Israelites, few of them escaped. Adonibezec, their leader, was taken prisoner, and being brought before the leaders of the two tribes, they ordered his thumbs and great toes to be cut off, in like manner as he had done to no less than seventy little kings or princes; so that the similitude of punishment made the tyrant reflect on his own cruel disposition, and acknowledge the justice of God in what he had brought upon him.

The two united tribes, after the conquest of Bezek, pursued their route farther into the country, No. 6.

plundered the respective towns through which they passed, and put the inhabitants to the sword. They at length laid siege to Jerusalem, and soon made themselves masters of the suburbs; but finding the city itself too strongly fortified both by nature and art, they gave up all thoughts of attempting to reduce it.

From Jerusalem the Israelites proceeded to Hebron, which they entered by assault, and after plundering the inhabitants, put them all to the sword. This place was given to the Levites, with a part of the land round it to the amount of 2000 cubits. The other part which belonged to it was given to Caleb, who was one of the spies employed by Moses to make discoveries in the land of Canaan. A dividend was also given to the posterity of Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, because they had left their native country, and bore a part with the Hebrews in the war.

After the reduction of Hebron the two tribes marched in search of farther conquests; and took many cities, both on the mountains and on the plains, near the sea. They had some thoughts of laying siege to the two cities of Gaza and Ascalon, but as they were strongly fortified, and the inhabitants had great numbers of chariots, they thought proper to relinquish the design.

Having now amassed considerable wealth by the conquests already made, the two enterprising tribes of Judah and Simeon resolved, for the present, to lay aside all farther prosecution of the war against the Canaanites. They therefore broke up their camps, and retired to their respective habitations.

The tribe of Benjamin, to whose lot the city of Jerusalem fell, compounded with the inhabitants, and suffered them to live in peace, in consideration of their paying an annual tribute for the indulgence. The like measures were also taken by several of the other tribes.

While the united tribes of Judah and Simeon were at war with the Canaanites, the tribe of Ephraim undertook the conquest of Bethel. They laid before the place a considerable time without being able to make an attack, from the great strength of the walls and the different fortifications. But at length, they effected by treachery, what they could not obtain by force. Meeting with a native of the town, who had been to get provisions for his family, they seized him, and made an agreement with him, that if he would contrive to let them secretly into the city, both he and all his relations should be secured from any danger. The man strictly fulfilled the engagement, and the Ephraimites entering the city put all the inhabitants to the sword, except the man and his family, whose lives they had promised to preserve.

The advantages obtained by the different tribes, from their great success against the Canaanites, threw them into a state of dissipation, and, instead of prosecuting the war, as they had been commanded, they indulged themselves in luxury. For this neglect they were chastised by the Almighty, who gave them to understand, that, for their disobedience, they should be persecuted by the very people they had been commanded to extirpate. They were, at first, greatly startled at this revelation; but they had become so depraved from the possessions they had already got, and even so elated at the annual tributes paid by the Canaanites, that they suffered the enjoyment of the luxuries of life to take the pre-eminence of their duty to their Maker. In short, the whole system of government was overturned, and both civil and religious authority totally annihilated. During this course of dissipation, a circumstance occurred of a very singular nature, and which occasioned the breaking out of a civil war; the particulars of which were as follows.

In the tribe of Ephraim was a certain Levite, of mean extraction, who had married a woman of the

the city of Bethlem, belonging to the tribe of Judah (a). The woman was exceeding handsome, and her husband passionately fond of her; but, from some unknown cause, she slighted his affection, and, within four months after their marriage, left him, and returned to her parents. The husband no sooner missed his wife than he hastened to her father, by whom he was received with great tenderness; and the umbrage which the daughter had taken against her husband, was adjusted to the satisfaction of all parties. After staying five days, the man and his wife departed for their own home, attended by one servant, and taking with them an ass for the better convenience of the woman. When the servant advised them not to proceed any further till the next morning, it would be dangerous travelling in the night through an enemy's country; and that, even among friends, those who travelled after day-light were considered suspicious persons. The man refused to take this salutary advice from his servant, and prosecuting his journey, it was so late when they came to the city of Gibeah, belonging to the tribe of Benjamin, that they could not obtain lodging (b), or find any place to get refreshment. While they were in this dilemma, they met with an ancient man belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, who asked them from whence they came, and what occasioned them to be out at so unseasonable an hour? The man replied, He was a Levite, that he belonged to the tribe of Ephraim, and that he was going home with his wife. As the old man belonged to the same tribe, and was naturally of an hospitable disposition, he took them with him to his house, and gave them every refreshment that laid in his power. It happened that in their way to the old man's house they had been observed by some young men belonging to the town, who, being captivated with the appearance of the woman, repaired to the house, knocked at the door, and demanded the woman to be delivered up to them. Both the old man and the husband expostulated with them on the impropriety of their conduct; but all the answer they received was, "Deliver up the woman, and no farther trouble shall ensue." Finding that all remonstrances were ineffectual, the old man, as the last effort, offered to deliver up his own daughter instead of the stranger; but this was of no avail, for they threatened, that if he did not immediately deliver up the very woman they requested, death should be his portion. The old man, being impelled to give her up, they took her away to their own quarters, and after having, for the whole night, treated her with every degree of indecency, they dismissed her. The woman immediately returned to the old man's house, loaded with such confusion, between shame and indignation, that, when she saw her husband, she had not power to speak, but immediately fell on the ground, and died. The husband preserved great presence of mind on this alarming occasion. When his surprise had a little subsided, he placed the body of his dead wife on the ass, and, after thanking the old man for the civility with which he had treated him, he departed. As soon as he arrived at his own house, he divided the body into twelve parts, and sent one to each of the twelve tribes, with a proper relation, by the respective bearers, of every particular that had attended this cruel and unprecedented transaction.

The Gibeonites shame-ful treatment of the Levite's wife affects the woman to such a degree as cause her fall on the ground, and die.

The Levite cuts the body into twelve parts, which he sends to the twelve tribes, to excite their detestation of the fact. Judges xx.

(a) Josephus's early date of this history before the beginning of the Judges, or when there was no king in Israel, (Judges xix. 1.) is strongly confirmed by the large number of Benjamites, both in the days of Aza and Jehosaphat; Chron. xiv. 8. and xvii. 17. Commentators on sacred writ besides are generally of opinion, that this transaction happened between the death of Joshua and the appointment of the first Judge. Some observe, that the reason why Samuel, or whoever was the author of the Book of Judges, places it at the close of it, is, because he was unwilling to interrupt the thread of his story by intermixing these matters with it, but reserved them to be related apart by themselves.

(b) The laws of hospitality were, in ancient times, held exceeding sacred; but the men of Gibeah, as they were grossly abandoned in vice, so were they wholly defective in this

When the several tribes had investigated the heinousness of this action among themselves, they were fired with indignation, and the principals of each tribe immediately assembled together at Shiloh, with a determined resolution of laying siege to Gibeah. They would immediately have put their design into execution, but were restrained from their purpose by the interposition of one of the elders, who told them, that it would be very indiscreet to wage war with their allies, without first making a strict enquiry into the merits of the case. He therefore proposed that proper persons should be appointed to go to the principal people of Gibeah, and demand the criminals who had been guilty of such violence. If they readily delivered them up, they might punish them at discretion; but if they refused, he thought they had a right to do themselves justice by force of arms.

This advice being cordially received by the people, the messengers appointed went to Gibeah, and demanded the persons who had committed so flagrant a violence on the Levite's wife. The inhabitants of Gibeah absolutely refused to give them up, saying, they did not think it honourable to be directed by other people; that they wanted neither courage, skill, or numbers; and that they were determined to stand by each other in the cause of a common defence.

When the messengers returned with the answer, the Israelites were so enraged, that they all took an oath not to intermarry with any of the tribe of Benjamin; and it was resolved that a war should be carried on against them with the like vigour as had been done by their forefathers against the Canaanites. In consequence of this the Israelites took the field with an army of 400,000 men. The army of the Benjamites consisted only of 25,600, among whom was 500 slingers, particularly distinguished for their abilities as marksmen. The two armies met near Gibeah, when a dreadful encounter immediately took place: the Israelites were routed with the loss of 22,000 on the spot; and the slaughter would have been much more considerable, had not night parted them. The next morning each party resumed the action with equal violence, when the Israelites again proved unsuccessful; their loss, on the spot, amounting to at least 18,000 men. These two disasters so intimidated them, that they broke up their camp, and retired to Bethel, a city near Gibeah, where they spent the day in fasting and prayer, beseeching the Almighty that he would interpose in their behalf, and once more take them under his Divine protection.

Having received assurance by the mouth of Phineas (c) that their prayers were heard, and that their future attempts would be attended with success, they determined to make another attempt on the city of Gibeah. They accordingly divided their army into two bodies, one half of which was planted in ambuscade, near the city, late in the evening; and early the next morning the other part marched to attack the army of the Benjamites. On the first charge the Israelites gave way, and retreated a considerable distance, which step being considered by the Benjamites as a mark of timidity, not only the army, but the greater part of the inhabitants, closely followed them, not doubting but virtue, suffering these travellers to remain in the streets, without any invitation; which, at length, they received from a poor man, who was himself only a sojourner amongst them. It must be remembered that then, as well as now, there was no such things as inns in these countries; so that travellers usually took with them (especially on long journeys) not only provisions and other necessaries for themselves, but likewise their beasts.

(c) This was the same Phineas who had signalized his zeal for the glory of God on a former occasion. Had this war been after the death of Samson (as placed in the Book of Judges) Phineas must have been upwards of 300 years old; but, as we have before remarked, its epocha was certainly between the death of Joshua and the appointment of the first Judge.

The Israelites send messengers to the Gibeonites, to demand the persons of the offenders. They are peremptorily and insultingly refused.

they should have equal success as before. When the army of the Israelites had got that of the Benjamites at such a distance from the city as to be within reach of those in ambuscade, they made a sudden stop, and fell on the front of the Benjamites with great impetuosity, while the ambuscades, by a proper signal given, fell on those in the rear. The Benjamites were so surprized at this unexpected manœuvre, that they were immediately thrown into confusion. A select body of 600, who were distinguished for their great courage and strength, broke their way through the enemy's troops, and escaped to a lofty mountain, while the rest fled with great precipitation to a deep valley, where, being closely surrounded by the Israelites, they all perished, the whole number amounting to 25,000 men. After this the Israelites burnt the city, and put all the inhabitants to the sword. They likewise destroyed several other cities belonging to the Benjamites, and particularly wreaked their vengeance on the inhabitants of Jabes, a city of Gilead, for having refused to assist them against the Benjamites. They first burnt the city to the ground, and then put every creature to the sword, except four hundred virgins, whom they brought away with them. Such were the dreadful consequences that took place from the ridiculous obstinacy of the Benjamites, in not delivering up the people who had committed so flagrant a violation on the person of the Levite's wife.

Jabes burnt to the ground, and all the inhabitants put to the sword except four hundred virgins.

When the Israelites began to reflect on the severity with which they had treated the Benjamites, and that the whole tribe were, in a manner, cut off from the main body, they repented of what they had done, and heartily wished for a reconciliation. To effect this they sent commissioners to invite back the six hundred men that had fled to the mountains, where they found them on the rock called Rhoa, or Rimmon. These commissioners, after condoling with them on the misfortunes that had befallen them, not only in the loss of their relations and friends, but that of almost the whole tribe, advised them to return, and not suffer themselves to be totally extirpated by withdrawing from the fellowship. They likewise told them that all their lands, cattle, and every thing else that belonged to them, should be restored, and that they should be placed in the same situation as before the rupture broke out. The Benjamites confessed they had acted very wrong, and acknowledged the righteous judgement of God in what they had suffered. They thanked the commissioners for their advice, accepted the invitation, and immediately returned to their own tribe.

The Israelites relent, and recall the 600 fugitive Benjamites from the mountains.

When the commissioners informed the Israelites of the issue of their embassy, they were greatly pleased; and, in order to restore the tribe of Benjamin, they sent the four hundred virgins, brought from the city of Jabes, as wives for that number out of the six hundred. They then deliberated in what manner to provide for the remaining two hundred, the Israelites having bound themselves by oath, before the war, not to intermarry with the tribe of Benjamin. It was the opinion of some that the oath might be rendered void, from its having been taken in the heat of passion; and that as it was to restore an almost lost tribe, it would not be displeasing to the Almighty. This proposition was entirely objected to by the elders, who would not, upon any consideration whatever, listen to a matter that had in it the least appearance of perjury. At length one of the senators stated a proposition in words to the following effect: "We have (says he) a public festival held three times a year in Shiloh, at which it is customary for our wives and daughters to be present. On this occasion let us permit the Benjamites to seize as many of the virgins as are wanted for the two hundred men. If the parents should appeal for justice, they must be told, it was their own faults, in not taking more care of their daughters; and that it would be indiscreet to force them from the Benjamites, as dissensions with those people had already produced the most dreadful consequences."

Permit the 200 Benjamites to seize on so many virgins by surprise.

This proposition was highly approved of by the people, in consequence of which the plan was communicated to the Benjamites. Accordingly, on the morning of the festival, the two hundred men, who wanted wives, concealed themselves in the most private places near the city, and, as the unsuspecting virgins passed by, each seized his mate, and fled with her to his home. This, for some time, occasioned great confusion; but when the elders told the parents the impropriety of attempting to regain their daughters by force, they were appeased.

The six hundred Benjamites, being thus provided with wives, applied themselves diligently to their respective callings, and, by their industry and prudence, from the most wretched and forlorn condition, the tribe soon became again considerable, both in number, wealth and power. Such was the conclusion of this war.

The war with the Benjamites concluded.

CHAP. III.

The Danites persecuted by the Canaanites. The Israelites, being totally addicted to luxury and dissipation, incur the displeasure, and provoke the just vengeance, of the Almighty. Are reduced to slavery, and kept in a state of subjection by Chusarib, king of the Assyrians.

THE Israelites having for some time laid aside martial discipline, and, instead thereof, directed their attention only to husbandry, and other domestic occupations, the Canaanites took advantage of it, and entered into a conspiracy against them. They accordingly raised a considerable army, built a great number of chariots, and trained up all the young people to martial discipline. They were farther animated to prosecute their intentions, by having brought over to them Ascalon and Accaron, from the tribe of Judah, as also the inhabitants of several cities in the plains.

The first attack they made was on the tribe of Dan; whom they forced to leave their possessions, and retire into the mountainous parts of the country. The Danites were so circumstanced that they could not think of revenging themselves by war, and, in their then situation, there was not a sufficiency of land for them to subsist on in a state of peace. They therefore sent five people into the inland part of the country, in order to find out a proper spot where they might fix their residence. After travelling one day, these commissioners arrived at the wide and open country about Sidon, not far from Mount Libanus (a), and the springs

The Danites are forced to take refuge in the mountains.

(a) Mount Libanus separates Syria from Palestine. It forms a kind of horse-shoe in its length, beginning at three or four leagues distance from the Mediterranean above Smyrna, and going from north to south towards Sidon, from thence bending from west to east, from Sidon towards Damascus; and at last returning from the south northward, from the straits of Damascus, as far as Laodicea Scabiosa. The western part of this chain of mountains is what we properly call Libanus. The other part, which is opposite to it eastward, and extends from south to north, is called, by the Greeks, Anti-Libanus. Between these two mountains is a long valley, called Cœle-Syria, or Hollow Syria; in Joshua (xi. 17) the Valley of Lebanon. Mount Libanus is about an hundred leagues in circumference, having Mesopotamia to the east, Armenia to the north, the Holy Land to the south, and the Mediterranean to the west. It is composed of four enclosures of mountains, which rise upon the other: the first of which is very fertile in grain and fruit; but the second is barren: the third, though higher than this, enjoys almost perpetual spring; there the trees always look green, and the orchards are filled with fruit; but the fourth is so high that it is almost always covered with snow, and consequently uninhabitable by reason of the excessive cold.

of the Lesser Jordan. Finding it rich, fruitful soil, and in every respect formed for the intended purpose, they returned, and gave a particular description of it to their countrymen. In consequence of this the whole tribe marched to the spot, and, being perfectly satisfied with it, they built a city, and called it Dan, from one of the sons of Jacob of that name, and from whom the whole tribe received their appellation.

The Danites build the city Dan.

A total degeneracy prevails among the Israelites.

The Israelites were at this time in a very depraved state. They had given a loose to all the vices of the Canaanites; had neglected every religious duty, and pursued a life of debauchery and dissipation. This conduct greatly displeased the Almighty, who, as a punishment, took from them, for a time, his divine protection, and left them exposed to the power of their enemies.

The first stroke they received was from Chusarath, king of the Assyrians, who marched against them with a considerable army. This monarch was so powerful that he drove all before him. Great numbers of the Israelites fell by the sword; and many of their towns and cities were seized by the conqueror. The captured Israelites were now subject to a most tyrannical monarch, who oppressed them by heavy taxes, and treated them with the most contemptible indignities.

CHAP. IV.

The Israelites are delivered from their subjection to the Assyrians by Othniel, the son of Kenaz.

IN this deplorable situation did the Israelites remain for eight years, when they were delivered out of the hands of their oppressors in the following manner. A person, named Othniel, the son of Kenaz, of the tribe of Judah, a man of great courage and discernment, having received a secret impulse from heaven to interpose in behalf of the wretched Israelites, he communicated the matter to some of his particular friends, whom he knew to be men of courage and integrity, and who were greatly dissatisfied with the state of public affairs. After considering what measures were most proper to take, it was at length resolved to make a sudden attack on the king's guards, and to put every man to the sword. This scheme being attended with success, it brought over great numbers to the interest of Othniel, who, in a short time, marched at the head of them to give the Assyrians battle. The encounter was at first doubtful, but the Israelites soon became conquerors: great numbers of the Assyrians were slain, and the rest saved themselves by passing the Euphrates. Thus, at the instigation of the brave and intrepid Othniel, were the Israelites again restored to their liberty; in acknowledgment for which they presented him with the government; and in this situation he continued during the remainder of his life, which was a course of forty years.

CHAP. V.

The Israelites are subject to the Moabites during the term of eighteen years, and then delivered by one Ehud, who retained the government eighty years.

ON the death of Othniel, the Israelites, being without a leader, returned again to a dissolute way of living, neither paying respect to the laws of their country, or their duty to God. This consequently produced confusion in their public affairs, which being taken notice of by Eglon, king of the Moabites, he marched against them with a considerable army. Several battles took place, in all which the Israelites were worsted; and their army being at length totally subdued, they became tributary to their conqueror, who erected a palace at Jericho, and kept them in the most abject state upwards of eighteen years.

At the expiration of this time the the Israelites were rescued from the hands of their oppressors by the following singular occurrences: In Jericho lived a young man named Ehud, the son of Geron, of the tribe of Benjamin. He was of an enterprising disposition, remarkably handsome in his person, and had great bodily strength. He had not only ingratiated himself into the favour of the king, by making him repeated presents, but had also many friends at court, so that he had free access at discretion, and this gave him the opportunity of executing the project he had laid for relieving the distressed Israelites. Being one day to make a present to the king, he went in his usual dress, attended by two servants, taking with him a dagger, which he secreted on his right side, having the greatest strength in his left arm. On his arrival at the palace, he was admitted, as usual, to the presence of the king; and after complimenting him with the present, told him he had a matter to relate to him, that demanded privacy. On this the king ordered his attendants to withdraw, and seating himself on his throne, waited for the expected intelligence. Ehud told him he had a dream to impart to him by command of the Almighty, at the sound of which the king, impatient to hear, suddenly arose from his seat, when Ehud drew the dagger from his side, and plunged it into his heart. In this situation he left the king, immediately quitted the palace, and hastened with all expedition to Jerusalem. The attendants of the palace supposing the king to have composed himself to sleep, did not presume to enter the room for a considerable time after the departure of Ehud, till at length, fearing something particular was the occasion of not seeing or hearing him, they ventured to open the door of his apartment, where they found him laying in his gore. In the mean time Ehud having related to his countrymen what had happened, and advised them to take advantage of it, they immediately dispatched proper persons to different parts of the country with horns (as was the custom on such occasions) to call together the people. They accordingly assembled in great bodies, and proceeding with the greatest expedition to the palace, fell on the guards, all of whom they killed on the spot: the rest of the army, amounting to about 10,000 men, made for the river towards the country of Moab; but the Israelites, having previously secured all the passes, intercepted their flight, and the whole body were cut to pieces. Thus was the Israelites extricated out of the hands of the Moabites; and as Ehud was the principal instigator of their deliverance, they bestowed on him the government, which he enjoyed upwards of eighty years. He was a person of the most distinguished merit, and conducted himself in such a manner as to deserve what was universally bestowed on him, namely, the good-will and affection of the people he governed. He was succeeded by Shamgar, the son of Anath, who died in the first year of his government.

CHAP. VI.

The Israelites are enslaved under different tyrannies by the Canaanites, and at length delivered by Barak and Deborah.

THE Israelites not in the least amending their lives, or taking warning from the calamities they had experienced, but still continuing not to worship God, or obey his laws, were again brought to subjection by another monarch, namely, Jabin, king of the Canaanites. This prince originally came from the city of Azor, situated near the lake Samachonitis. He kept an army consisting of 300,000 foot, 10,000 horse, and 3000 chariots, the grand command of which was given to Sisera, who was next in dignity to the king. This general soon reduced reduced the Israelites, brought them to subjection, and made them pay tribute to his master.

In this state of servitude did the Israelites continue for twenty years, when they began to reflect that there miseries were certainly inflicted on them by God, as a just punishment for their contempt of the laws of their forefathers. In this state of contrition they went to a famous prophetess (a), named Deborah, (which, in the Hebrew tongue, signifies a bee), and implored her to intercede in their behalf, that God would be pleased to forgive them their past faults, and rescue them out of the hands of their cruel persecutors. Deborah complied with their request; and the Almighty being pleased to promise them a deliverance, he made choice of Barak, of the tribe of Naphtali, to effect it. Accordingly Deborah sent for Barak, (which, in the Hebrew language, signifies lightning), and ordered him immediately to raise an army of 10,000 men, and march with all expedition against the Canaanites. Barak, at first, objected to take the command of so small a number against so large a body as that of the enemy; but Deborah informed him, that God had said the number was sufficient. Notwithstanding this, he still refused the command, unless she would go with him and take a part; at which Deborah replied with indignation, "Would you give to a woman part of that honour, which God hath assigned for thee alone? However, I will not refuse it." They accordingly drew out their

The Israelites are conquered by the Midianites, in conjunction with the Amalekites and Arabians, and held in vassalage.

ON the death of Barak, which happened about the same time with that of Deborah, the Midianites, Amalekites, and Arabians, entered into an alliance against the Israelites, and so powerful were their arms, that they conquered wherever they went, destroying the fruits of the ground, and carrying with them every thing that was valuable. They continued these hostilities with such violence, that the wretched Israelites were obliged to fly to the mountains for refuge, where they dug caverns, in which they hid themselves, and the little property they could save, from their merciless enemies. They remained in this state seven years, during which time their enemies permitted them to cultivate their land in the winter; but it was only to serve their own purposes, for they made themselves matters of the greater part of the produce when it was fit for removal. The small quantity, therefore, the Israelites could obtain for themselves, was scarce sufficient to enable them to preserve their existence; besides which, they were in the most extreme distress, so that finding themselves likely to perish from want, they made their supplications to God, in the most fervent manner, desiring him that he would be pleased to deliver them from the wretched state into which they had fallen.

Gideon musters the tribes to advance against the Midianites. Receives an omen of success. Chooses a select few for the expedition. Obtains a complete victory. Rules the people, with integrity and justice, for forty years.

WHILE they were in this deplorable situation, as one Gideon, the son of Joas, a leading man of the tribe of Manasseh, was thrashing a little corn at a wine press, not daring to do it on the floor, for fear of being discovered by the enemy, an angel appeared to him in the likeness of a young man, who told him, "He was a happy man, and beloved of God." To which Gideon answered, "It is no great sign of favour, since I am obliged to use my wine-press instead of a threshing-floor." The angel bade him be of good courage, and direct his attention to arms, whereby himself and his countrymen might be restored to their liberty. "Alas! (says Gideon) it is impossible for me to undertake so great a thing: we have not a sufficiency of men in our tribe to make such an attempt; neither am I a proper person to conduct so important a design." The angel answered, that all his deficiencies would be supplied by the Almighty; and that if he would but take upon him the command of a body of men, the Israelites should obtain a complete victory over their enemies.

A vision appears to Gideon.

Gideon is assured that, through the Divine aid, he should be the deliverer of his country.

Gideon requested of the angel that he would not depart till he had prepared a sacrifice on the occasion; which being complied with, he made ready a kid, with unleavened cakes, and having brought them before the angel, he ordered Gideon to lay them on a rock. This was immediately complied with, when the angel touching it with his staff, fire issued out of the rock, and the whole was consumed; after which the angel disappeared.

Judges vi.

(a) The words prophet and prophetess, in the Old Testament, sometimes denote persons endued with special, though not miraculous, gifts or graces, for the better understanding and explaining the word of God; and of this sort were the sons of the prophets, or such as were brought up in the schools of the prophets. As, therefore, we read of no miraculous action that Deborah did, she was, perhaps, only a woman of eminent holiness, prudence, and knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, by which she was singularly qualified to judge the people; that is, to determine causes and controversies among them, according to the word of God.

(b) These Kenites, though they were proselytes, and worshipped the true God, according to the Mosaic law, yet, being strangers by birth, and therefore having no right or title to the land of Canaan, they held it best policy, in these troublesome times, to observe a neutrality, and maintain peace, as well as they could, both with the Israelites and Canaanites. It was upon this footing that there was a peace between king Jabin and the family of Heber, the Kenite; and that gave confidence to Sisera, in his distress, to fly to Heber's tent for protection.

Musters an army of 10,000 men.

An extraordinary revelation.

A dream of one of the Midianite soldiers, portending victory to Gideon, is over heard by him, and told to his fellow soldiers. Judges vii.

Gideon is encouraged by the interpretation of the dream.

Gideon uses an excellent stratagem in attacking the enemy.

When Gideon had a little recovered himself from the surprize into which he was thrown from this singular occurrence, he related the particulars to some of the most considerable of the Israelites, who had such faith in the revelation, that they immediately raised an army of 10,000 men, fully resolved to hazard a battle with the tyrannical Midianites. But, before they took the field, the Divine agent again appeared to Gideon, and spoke to him to this effect: "It is too common for mankind to claim that merit to themselves which belongs to God alone; and such is the disposition of the people you have gathered together, and are about to lead against the Midianites: but to shew you that victory is influenced from above, and not to be obtained by the strength of man without Divine assistance, take your army to the river Jordan in the heat of the day, and observe the manner in which the soldiers drink the water. Those who take it up with their hands, and lap it, you may depend on being men of courage; but such as lie down, and drink at leisure, are not to be trusted." Gideon obeyed the Divine command, and found only three hundred men that lapped the water from their hands, which he immediately detached from the rest. With this small number God commanded him to march against the enemy, and to attack them in the night. He accordingly advanced at the head of his chosen men, and encamped near the river Jordan, resolving to pass it the following day. But Gideon was still doubtful of success, and the more so, from being commanded to attack the enemy in the night. However, these fears were removed by the interposition of the Almighty, who, the preceding evening, told Gideon to take with him one of his soldiers, and go privately to the camp of the Midianites, from whom he should hear something that would animate and give him courage. In obedience to this injunction he went, taking with him a servant, named Phuran. They arrived at the camp unperceived, and, approaching one of the tents, heard a soldier relating the following dream to his comrades: "Me thought (said he) I saw a barley loaf (the coarsest of all grains, and not fit for man to eat) come rolling into the camp, and having passed through the king's tent, and thrown it down, it afterwards entered all the other tents, and did the like." This dream was interpreted by one of the soldier's comrades, who said, it denoted the total destruction of the army. "The barley (says he) is, as you say, the coarsest of grains; and the Israelites are the vilest and most abject of all the people in Asia. Gideon is now at the head of an army against us; and, I am afraid, the barley loaf overthrowing our tents implies, that we shall be totally destroyed by the Israelites.

When Gideon had heard this dream, and its interpretation, he was inspired with new courage, and immediately returning to his people, and acquainting them with it, he ordered them to prepare themselves, with all expedition, to march against the enemy. Accordingly, about the fourth watch (a), Gideon drew out his men, and divided them into three companies, of an hundred each. Every man had a burning torch secreted in a long pitcher, and, in his right hand, a ram's horn, by way of trumpet. The enemy's camp took up a large space of ground, having in it a great number of camels; and the people were more dispersed than usual, on account of their belonging to different nations. The Israelites had received instructions, that, as soon as they came near the camp of the Midianites, on a signal given, they should break their pitchers, display their torches, sound their horns, and immediately begin the attack. These orders they strictly obeyed, when the Midianites were immediately thrown into the utmost consternation. A great slaughter ensued: but more were destroyed by the hands of their own

(a) Though the Romans, in after-ages, divided the night into four watches (Math. xiv. 25.) yet, in the eastern parts, and, in more ancient times, it consisted but of three, whereof the first began at six, and continued four hours. The second was therefore called the middle watch, and began at ten; so that we may suppose it was some time after this that Gideon alarmed people, than by the Israelites; for it being dark, and they of different nations, they could not understand each other, so that every man took the person next him for an enemy. In short the whole was one scene of confusion, of which the Israelites took proper advantages. A great number of the Midianites were slain on the spot; and the remainder for the present saved themselves by flight. The troops which Gideon had left behind, hearing of his success, immediately marched to all the difficult passes, in order to cut off the retreat of the enemy. They came up with a great body of them in a flat part of the country, when immediately surrounding them, they put every man to the sword, and, among them, two of their kings, named Oreb and Zeb. In the mean time Gideon marched with his three hundred men against the remainder of the enemy, amounting to about 10,000, who had fixed themselves on a spot at a considerable distance, under the command of their proper officers. When Gideon came near them he was joined by the rest of his troops, and a general engagement ensued, in which the whole army of the Midianites were cut to pieces, and two of their princes, named Zebin and Hezarbon, taken prisoners. The number of the enemy killed in these encounters amounted to 120,000. Thus did the Israelites gain a complete victory over their enemies; besides which, they greatly enriched themselves with plunder, consisting of gold, silver, rich stuffs, camels, asses, &c.

Gideon, having executed the business on which he was sent, by destroying the Midianites, returned to Ephraim, where he put to death the two captive kings. The tribe to which he belonged (through envy to his great success, and glorious achievements) appeared displeased with him for engaging in a public act of hostility without their approbation; and their anger arose to such a pitch, that they were just on the point of making war with him. But this was prevented by the prudence of Gideon, who told them it was not his war but God's, by whom he was commanded to act as he had done, and that therefore he did not claim any merit to himself.

This answer perfectly satisfied the people, and they joined with the rest in desiring Gideon, as he had redeemed his countrymen from slavery, that he would accept the government. Gideon, at first, begged to be excused; but finding the people determined, he at length complied, and ruled them forty years, during the whole of which time his conduct was such as merited universal approbation. He lived to a very great age; and, when he died, his remains were deposited at Ophrah, the place of his nativity.

CHAP. IX.

Abimelech obtains the government wickedly, and rules tyrannically, and is at length slain in an extraordinary manner. The Israelites apostatizing again, are oppressed and enslaved by the Philistines and the Ammonites. Jephthah vested with the government of Israel. Makes a peculiar vow. Defeats the Ammonites. Suppresses an insurrection among the Ephraimites. His death.

GIDEON, at the time of his death, had no less than seventy sons, all born in wedlock, besides one by Druma, his concubine, named Abimelech. This last, immediately after his father's decease, made use of the most horrid means to obtain the government. He went to the relations of his mother at Shechem, and told them that, as his father was dead, it would certainly be better for the people to be governed by one person than seventy, the Midianitish camp; and the reasons why he chose this part of the night to do it in are obvious, because the trumpets would then seem to sound louder, and the lights to shine brighter, and thereby both increase the consternation of the enemy, and conceal the smallness of his own army.

meaning his legitimate brothers. This was approved of by his relations, who furnishing him with a considerable sum of money, he returned to his father's house, bringing with him a set of men, whom he knew to be infamous in disposition, and willing to engage in any enterprize, however inconsistent with laws, either human or divine.

Abimelech obtains the government by means of his kindred, and by the slaughter of all his brethren, except Jotham.
The first step Abimelech took, after returning to his father's house, was, to murder all his brothers, except Jotham, who happily saved himself by flight; and, notwithstanding the cruelty of the action, it answered the wishes of Abimelech, no one objecting to his taking upon himself the government. The people, however, had soon reason to wish they had not been so pliant, for he ruled them with such tyranny, that they were little better situated than when in the hands of their enemies. He followed no other law than that of his own will, and even professed himself an enemy to common justice.

Some time after Abimelech had thus usurped the government, a day of solemnity was kept at Shechem, on which occasion a prodigious concourse of people were assembled. Before the festival began, Jotham, the brother of Abimelech, who had till now concealed himself, appeared on the top of Gerizim, which overlooks Shechem, and calling aloud to the people, he addressed them in words to the following effect:

Jotham harangues the multitude, and relates a remarkable fable.
“There was a time, says he, when the trees (a) had meetings together in order to regulate the government of the vegetable part of the creation, and to appoint one to rule the whole. In a council held on this occasion, the major part of the plants were for having the fig-tree to govern; but the fig-tree declined the honour, being sufficiently satisfied with the esteem bore for its fruit. On this the trees applied to the olive and the vine, both of which likewise refused, for the same reason as had been given by the fig-tree. At length they applied to the bramble, who said, If you are in earnest, I'll willingly take upon me the government; but remember, you must rest quietly under my shadow. If you prove refractory, there shall come a fire out of me that shall destroy you. This, said Jotham, is not a tale to divert you, but to make you reflect on your absurd conduct, in violating your sacred obligations to Gideon, by suffering Abimelech, the murderer of the children of your deliverer, to usurp and tyrannize over you. This Abimelech is the very fire I have told you in the fable (b).”

After Jotham had thus delivered himself to the people, he retired, and fled to the mountains, where he concealed himself till the death of his cruel brother Abimelech.

Abimelech is disgraced and expelled the city of Shechem.
The speech made by Jotham opened the eyes of the Shechemites, who not only dethroned Abimelech, but forced him out of the city; upon which Abimelech, and those who accompanied him, vowed revenge on the inhabitants.

It happened at this time to be the season for gathering in the grapes, but the people had such terrible apprehensions of the cruelty of Abimelech, that they durst not go into the fields to reap their vintage. In this distressed situation they applied to one Gaal, (a prince of the country, who had lately come to Shechem with a band of armed men), to protect them, who readily complying with their request, they strengthened his force by adding to them a troop of their own soldiers. Thus secured, they reaped their fruits, and carried them home in safety; and when elated with liquor, they took the freedom of aspersing the characters of Abimelech and his relations. They placed ambuscades in different parts round the city, and taking many of the guards belonging to Abimelech, put them all to the sword.

The Shechemites apply for protection to Gaal.
Many of Abimelech's soldiers taken, and cut off, by stratagem.

While matters were in this situation, one Zebul, a principal man among the Shechemites, and a great friend to Abimelech, sent him the particulars of Gaal's conduct, and the disposition of the people. He advised Abimelech to plant soldiers in ambush near the city; and told him, that he would persuade Gaal to come out and engage him, whereby he would have the opportunity of getting his enemy into his own power; and that he did not doubt but he should soon be able to reinstate him in his regal dignity.

In consequence of this information, Abimelech, after the day was closed, placed a number of men in different parts at some distance from the city. Gaal and Zebul were parading the suburbs during the night as usual; but when the morning opened, and Gaal saw men in armour approaching, he called aloud to Zebul, telling him, that an army in battle array was marching towards the city. Zebul said he was mistaken, for that what he saw was nothing more than the shadow of the mountains. But Gaal, on their nearer approach, insisted they were no shadows, but a real company of armed men. To which Zebul answered, “Diddst thou not say that Abimelech was a slothful and cowardly prince? Now shew thyself what a man thou art in engaging with him.” Gaal accordingly marched against the enemy, and received the first shock; but finding himself too weak, and having lost several of his men, he retreated, and fled into the city.

Zebul betrays the Shechemites.

Zebul took advantage of this, by prejudicing the minds of the people against Gaal, whom he represented as a coward; and, in consequence of Zebul's influence, Gaal was expelled the city.

Zebul calumniates Gaal as a coward, and causes the people to drive him out of Shechem.

In the mean time Abimelech, being informed by Zebul, that the citizens intended to prosecute the gathering of the vintage, placed several ambuscades near the city in order to surprise them. Accordingly, on their first coming out, he detached a third part of his army to take possession of the gates of the city, and by that means to cut off the retreat of those who had left it. When the ambuscaders thought it a proper time they made their appearance, which so terrified the defenceless Shechemites, that they attempted to save themselves by flight, but being closely pursued, the greater part fell by the sword. In the mean time the rest of Abimelech's army laid siege to the city, which they took on the first assault, the inhabitants immediately consulting their own safety by flight, though, in the attempt, many were slain. After Abimelech had thus routed the Shechemites, and made himself master of the city, he ordered it to be levelled with the ground; and, as the last insult of triumph, had salt (c) sown on those parts where the walls had stood.

Abimelech levels the city, and destroys the inhabitants with fire and sword.

(a) The Greeks pretend to have been the inventors of the use of fables; but there is nothing more absurd than their vanity in this respect. A long time before Æsop, and every other author known to their nation, the Orientals, and particularly the Hebrews, made use of this ingenious manner; for the doing of which two reasons may be assigned. 1. Because men would suffer themselves to be reprehended under this guise, when they would not digest plain words. And 2dly, Because they heard them with delight and pleasure, and remembered them better than any grave or common discourse.

(b) The words of this fable carry a lively image of Abimelech's ostentatious spirit, and menaces to take severe vengeance on the nobles of Shechem, who had been chiefly instrumental in his promotion, in case they should desert him.

The whole intent and meaning of it was to convince the Shechemites of their folly in chusing a man for their king, who was no more able to protect them, than a bramble was to cover other trees that should resort to it under the shadow of its branches.

(c) The strewing of salt was an old custom used on those cities whose inhabitants had been guilty of treachery. Not that the strewing of salt could be supposed to have been done to dry up or render the soil barren, there being no occasion for that in an inhabited town, but to shew the detestation in which the inhabitants were held for their conduct; and that the place, on that account, should never after be rebuilt, but remain unpeopled and desolate.

The wretched Shechemites, who had escaped the rage of Abimelech by flight, gathered themselves into a body, and finding a place on a rock which was rendered strong by nature, they formed the resolution of fixing themselves on this spot, as a place of refuge; and, to increase its natural strength, they fortified it in the best manner they could. Intimation of this being given to Abimelech, he marched against them with his army, and getting within the wall, he ordered his men to raise a pile of wood and faggots round the buildings, which was no sooner done, than fire was immediately set to it, and every soul perished in the flames. Such was the fate of the wretched Shechemites, who suffered, unlamented, for their ungrateful treatment of the posterity of Gideon. It was a lesson to the Israelites to beware of falling into the same hands, lest they should share the same fate.

Those of the Shechemites, that escaped from the city, take shelter on a rock, where, by order of Abimelech, they are destroyed by fire.

Abimelech surprises the city of Thebes; attacks the garrison.

Is smitten by a piece of a mill-stone, thrown upon him by a woman.

Slain by his armour-bearer at his own request.

Abimelech, not yet satiated with revenge, marched with his army against Thebes, and took the outer town by assault. The garrison retreated into a strong castle; and Abimelech, pushing the attack up to the very gates, resolved either to take the city, or destroy it by fire. But his cruel intentions were happily frustrated by means of a woman, who, while he was standing near the wall giving directions to his men, threw down a large piece of a mill-stone (a), which falling on Abimelech's head, struck him to the ground. When he came a little to himself, and found the wound was mortal, he called for his armour-bearer, whom he desired immediately to dispatch him, that it might not be said he fell by the hands of a woman. The officer performed his commands; and thus was Abimelech punished for his cruelty to his brethren, and his inhumanity to the Shechemites. When the soldiers found their leader was no more, they dispersed, every man retiring to his own habitation.

After the death of Abimelech, and the re-establishment of the Shechemites, one Tolah, the son of Puah, an eminent man of the tribe of Issachar, was appointed leader of the people, in which office he continued for twenty-three years. He dwelt, during the whole time of his government, on mount Ephraim, near the centre of the country; that the people might, with the greater convenience, resort to him for judgement (b).

The government devolves to Jair, a Gileadite.

On the death of Tolah the government fell into the hands of one Jair, a Gileadite, of the tribe of Manasseh. He was a man not only happy in his worldly acquisitions, but also in his family. He had no less than thirty sons, all of whom were men of courage, and, with their father, universally esteemed by the people. Jair held the government twenty-two years, when he died at an advanced age, and was buried at Camon, a city of Gilead.

The Israelites, given up to vice and immorality of every degree, fall a prey to the Philistines and Ammonites.

During the life of Jair, the Israelites paid a proper attention both to the civil and ecclesiastical laws of their country; but after his death they degenerated in their manners, giving themselves up to every kind of vice, and disregarding every religious duty.

The Ammonites and Philistines, understanding the manner in which the Israelites lived, determined to take advantage of their negligence. They accordingly raised a powerful army, with which they marched into their country, laying every thing waste wherever they came; and, not satisfied with this, they resolved to prosecute their ravages, till they should make a thorough conquest of the countries on both sides the river Jordan.

Distresses occasion them to repent, and solicit the Divine interposition in their behalf.

The Israelites began now to reflect on their past conduct, and to consider that the distressed situation in which they were again involved, arose from their disobedience to the laws of their great legislator Moses. They therefore offered up prayers and sacrifices to God, beseeching him to interpose in their behalf, and to remove from them their present troubles. Their prayers were not offered in vain, the Almighty being pleased to promise them his Divine assistance.

The Ammonites having entered the country of Gilead with a large army, the inhabitants took up arms in order to oppose them; but they were at a loss how to act for want of a leader. At length they bethought themselves of one Jephtha, a man of singular courage and conduct, who resided at a place called Tob, and maintained an army under him at his own expence. To this person the Gileadites sent messengers, with a promise that, if he would assist them against the Ammonites, they would confer the government on him during his life. Jephtha, at first, refused to comply with their request; but the Gileadites continuing to press him with repeated importunities, he at length complied; but not before he had made them take oaths of fidelity to him as their general.

This matter being adjusted, Jephtha joined his army with that of the Gileadites, and, after giving some necessary orders, marched with the whole body to Mispah. From hence he sent ambassadors to the king of the Ammonites, to demand the reason of his invading the country of the Gileadites. His answer was, that the land was his; that the Israelites, in their passage from Egypt, had taken it from his ancestors; and that he was now determined to recover it. In consequence of this Jephtha sent other ambassadors to tell the king of Ammon, that, if either conquest or prescription conferred a title, they had a just right to the country they possessed, since they took it not from them, but the Ammonites; that they had quietly enjoyed it upwards of three hundred years; and that they were determined to oppose any monarch, however powerful, that should attempt to infringe on their property.

This peremptory declaration put an end to their treaty; and immediate preparations were made on both sides, to determine the contest by the sword. But before Jephtha took the field, he prayed to God, in the most fervent manner, to grant him success; and made a solemn vow, that, if he proved victorious, he would offer up to him, in sacrifice, the first living creature he should meet on his return to his family.

With this resolution Jephtha attacked the enemy, and, in a short time, obtained a complete victory; great numbers being slain, and the rest put to flight. He pursued and killed the fugitives as far as the city of Maniah; from whence he proceeded to the country of Ammon, where he destroyed many cities, and divided the spoil among his army. Thus did Jephtha totally subdue his enemies, and redeem the Israelites from a state of slavery, under which they had laboured upwards of eighteen years.

The war being over, Jephtha returned to his family, when, lo! instead of receiving that satisfaction he expected after so long an absence, a circumstance occurred that pierced him to the heart. On approaching his house, the first object that presented itself was his only daughter, who was flying with eager joy to receive and bid him welcome. When Jephtha saw his daughter, his soul almost sunk within him, and, for some time, he was unable to speak. Having a little recovered himself, he looked at her with tears trickling from his cheeks; and, after blaming her for her officiousness in coming to meet him, told her the vow he had made, by which he had obliged himself to offer her to God as a sacrifice. The innocent devotee did not appear the least alarmed at this melancholy intelligence; but, with it may be reasonably supposed he was a prudent and peaceable man; that he removed abuses from among the people, endeavoured to suppress idolatry, appeased tumults, and healed those wounds which had been given to the state during the usurpation of Abimelech.

great coolness, replied, that, if the loss of her life would secure his honour, and the liberty of her country, she would willingly part with it. She only requested he would indulge her with two months, that she might have an opportunity of taking a proper farewell of all her acquaintance; and that, after that time was expired, he might fulfil his vow. Her father granted her request; and, at the expiration of the two months, she was made a sacrifice, which was the consequence of the rash vow made by Jephtha, the fulfilment of which was neither conformable either to law or justice.

The success of Jephtha against the Ammonites gave great umbrage to the Ephraimites, who told him he had engaged in the late expedition, without consulting them, from ambitious motives, and that he might reserve not only the booty, but the glory of the action to himself. Jephtha told them, they were not insensible of the oppression under which their allies laboured, and that they had been applied to for their assistance, but refused to give it. That they had acted with great injustice, and that if they did not content themselves and be quiet, he would compel them to it by force.

Jephtha finding the Ephraimites paid no attention to his remonstrance, but, on the contrary, had raised an army to oppose him, he immediately marched against them, when a dreadful battle ensued, in which the Ephraimites were totally defeated, and 22,000 were killed on the spot.

Having thus reduced the refractory Ephraimites, Jephtha returned to Tob, where he died, and was buried at Sebeth, in Gilead, the place of his nativity.

After the death of Jephtha, the government was vested in the hands of Absan, a citizen of Bethlehem, and of the tribe of Judah. He ruled only seven years, when he died at an advanced age, and was buried at Bethlehem.

Absan was succeeded by Elon, of the tribe of Zebulun, who governed ten years, during which time nothing material occurred.

Elon was succeeded by Abdon, the son of Helel, of the tribe of Ephraim. He was universally beloved by the people, and died at a very advanced age, leaving behind him a numerous progeny. He was buried with great funeral pomp in the city of Pharathon, the place of his nativity.

CHAP. X.

The birth, life, exploits, and death of Samson.

AFTER the death of Abdon, the Israelites, not having a proper leader, were greatly persecuted by the Philistines, who subdued them in most parts of the country, and kept them in a very servile state upwards of forty years, when they were happily relieved by the following means.

There was a certain man, named Manoah, of the family of the Danites, who, without exception, was esteemed the best and principal person of his tribe. He had a most beautiful woman to his wife, and was exceeding fond of her; but his happiness was greatly curtailed by her not bearing children. In consequence of his uneasiness on this account, he frequently walked with his wife to a retired spot near the suburbs of the city, when he offered up supplications to God, that he would grant him a lawful heir to succeed him. On one of the days Manoah went on this errand, he left his wife for a short time alone, when an angel appeared to her in the likeness of a tall, handsome man, telling her, "He brought her glad tidings; for that, by the favour of God, she should bring forth a son, who should prove remarkable for his strength, and humble the pride of the Philistines; charging her not to cut his hair, nor suffer him to taste any drink stronger than water; for so God had enjoined." After saying this, the angel disappeared.

No. 7.

When Manoah returned to his wife, she related to him the particulars of all that had passed, and described the person of the messenger with such an apparent secret satisfaction, that Manoah was touched with jealousy, and intimated his suspicion that an illegal intercourse had taken place between them. The woman, seeing the uneasiness of her husband, and desirous of removing his suspicions, fell on her knees, and earnestly prayed to God, "That he would again vouchsafe to send his angel, that her husband might also behold him." Her prayers were heard and granted; the angel appeared a second time to her alone; whereupon she prevailed on him to stay till she should fetch her husband. When Manoah came, he asked the angel to repeat what he had before said to his wife in private. The angel replied, "It was sufficient that his wife had been made acquainted with the things he had told her." Manoah then asked the angel to tell him who he was, that he and his wife might make some return for the news he had brought them when the child should be born. The angel replied, "He did not stand in need of any reward, nor was it from any lucrative motive he had brought him the intelligence." Manoah then entreated the angel to stay and take some refreshment, which he at first refused, but at length agreed to. Manoah then slew a kid, and ordered his wife to dress it with all expedition. When it was ready, the angel told the woman to put the flesh, together with the bread, on a rock. This being done, the angel touched the meat with a rod he had in his hand, when immediately a flame of fire burst from the rock, and consumed both meat and bread; and the angel, in the sight of Manoah and his wife, ascended in the smoke.

When Manoah beheld this, he was struck with fear, thinking it portended some great evil to come: but his wife endeavoured to remove his apprehensions, by saying, "If God had been displeased with them, he would neither have accepted their sacrifice, nor imparted to them the knowledge of such good tidings."

A short time after this the woman became pregnant; and when the child was born, it proved to be a son, whom they named Samson, which signifies robust, or strong. The woman strictly observed the orders she had received from the angel; and as the child grew up, he discovered the most manifest signs of his becoming what had been foretold previous to his birth.

When Samson was arrived to the age of maturity, he fell in love with the daughter of a Philistine, who lived at Timnath; and though his parents did not approve of the match, because she was sprung from an idolatrous family, yet such was their affection for their son, that they indulged his passion, and went with him to Timnath to treat about the marriage. As they were on their journey, and Samson was straggling a small distance from the company, all on a sudden he discovered a young lion running towards him with open mouth. Samson was not in the least intimidated at this sight: and, when the lion approached, he seized him by the throat, and strangled him with as much ease as if it had been a kid; after which he threw the body into a thicket. A short time after, as he was travelling on the very same road, he went out of his way to look at the carcase of the lion; when, to his great surprize, he found a swarm of bees working in the breast of the beast. He took out three of the honey-combs, which he presented to his bride; but did not tell her in what manner he had obtained them.

The nuptials being now to be solemnized, (the ceremony and entertainments of which lasted seven days), the relations of the bride brought with them thirty of the stoutest and handsomest young men they could select, not out of compliment and respect to Samson, as they pretended, but as a guard over him, lest, from his great strength, he should, when in his cups, do some particular mischief. In the course of the first day, when harmony universally appeared among the company, Samson addressed himself to the thirty young men, telling them them he had a (a) riddle to propound to them, and if they would explain it before the expiration of the seven days, he would give to each man a shirt and a coat. The Philistines accepted the proposal, and desired Samson to state the question; which he did as follows: "Out of the eater came forth meat, and out of the strong came forth sweetness." The Philistines laid their heads together to expound this riddle; but, after three days, finding their endeavours fruitless, and despairing to accomplish it before the expiration of the time, they went to the new bride, and threatened her, if she did not get the secret from her husband, and reveal it to them, they would burn her to death. Intimidated at these threats, the woman sat about the business, and, after great difficulty, obtained from Samson the particulars of his killing the lion, and of the honeycombs he had found in the carcase, and brought to her; all which she privately communicated to the Philistines. Towards the close of the seventh day, which was the time appointed for solving the riddle, the Philistines assembled, one of whom, addressing himself to Samson, said, "Nothing is stronger than a lion, or sweeter than honey." "No," (replied Samson), nor falser than the woman "who has enabled you to expound the riddle." Samson was greatly irritated at this imposition, but determined to fulfill his engagement with the thirty men. To do this, he went, in the heat of his passion, to the city of Ascalon (b), belonging to the Philistines, where having slain thirty men, he brought away their shirts and coats, and delivered them to those who expounded the riddle. Fired with resentment at the treachery of his wife, Samson left her; and she, in revenge, married a young man who had been one of Samson's principal companions during the wedding week.

Samson was so enraged at the treatment he had received from his wife, that he determined not only to wreak his vengeance on her, but the whole country of the Philistines; and an opportunity soon offered, which enabled him to put his design into execution. It happened to be near the time of harvest, and the corn being ripe on the ground, Samson hit upon a project for destroying it, and thereby distressing the Philistines by famine. He got together three hundred foxes (c), and tying them two and two by their tails, with a lighted torch between each pair, he turned them loose, when running into the fields, they not only destroyed all the corn, but likewise the vines and olive-trees, so that the whole country, for a time, appeared in one continued blaze.

When the Philistines understood that Samson was the author of this destruction, and that he had been induced to take such a step in revenge for the treatment he had received from his wife's family, they sent a number of people, with proper officers, to Timnath, who seizing Samson's wife, with her father and relations, burnt them all alive, as being the special cause of so great a calamity.

Samson continued to commit various depredations in different parts of the country belonging to the Philistines; till at length, being apprehensive of danger, he retired, for security, to a rock (d) near Etam, belonging to the tribe of Judah.

When the Philistines knew where Samson had secreted himself, they sent ambassadors to the inhabitants of Etam, with orders that they should deliver him into their hands. In consequence of this they went with an armed force to Samson's retreat, and, after expostulating with him on the danger to which they were exposed on his account, begged he would give himself quietly up to the Philistines.

Samson not only complied with their request, but submitted himself to be bound with cords, on condition that they would do him no farther hurt than delivering him into the hands of the enemy. Accordingly he came from the rock, and being brought to the ambassadors, they conducted him to the camp of the Philistines, who no sooner saw him at a distance, than they ran in considerable bodies to meet him, exulting at their conquest over so daring an invader. But Samson soon convinced them of the impropriety of their imaginations. As soon as they came near him, he suddenly snapped the cords with which he was bound, and seeing the jaw-bone (e) of an ass lying on the ground, he took it up, and falling on the Philistines, he slew one thousand on the spot, which so intimidated the rest, that, instead of making any resistance, they betook themselves to flight. Samson exulted beyond bounds at this victory, instead of ascribing it, as he ought, to the assistance of the Divine Power.

Fatigued with this encounter, and being excessive thirsty, he sought for water, but found himself in a place where no such refreshment was to be had. In this distressed situation he made his application to God, who immediately caused a stream of delicious water to flow from an hollow rock adjoining to the spot where Samson had slain the Philistines; from which circumstance the place was ever after known by the name of the Jaw.

After this singular conquest Samson looked upon the Philistines with contempt; and not fearing any hurt they could do him, he went openly into one of the cities, called Gaza, where he took up his residence in a house of public entertainment. The governor of the town being informed of Samson's situation, placed guards without the gates of the city, during the day, to prevent his leaving the place. But Samson, having received intelligence of this, totally baffled the governor's intention. He rose about midnight, and taking the two gates (f), to-

(a) It was a very ancient custom for the masters of feasts to propose enigmas to their guests, in order to exercise their wit, and enliven conversation, instead of passing their whole time in downright eating and drinking. The Greeks derived this custom from the Orientals, and they generally proposed a reward to those who expounded the riddle.

(b) This city was situated between Azoth and Gaza, on the coast of the Mediterranean Sea, about 520 furlongs distant from Jerusalem. It is said to have been of great note among the Gentiles, in ancient times, for a temple, dedicated to Dicroto, the mother of Semiramis, here worshipped in the form of a mermaid; and for another temple of Apollo, where Herod, the father of Antipater, and grandfather of Herod the Great, served as priest. It had, in the first times of Christianity, an episcopal see; and, in the course of the holy war, it was beautified with a new wall, and many fair buildings, by Richard I. king of England.

(c) Foxes, it is well known, are very apt to do a great deal of mischief wherever they abound; and therefore Samson might have this farther design in collecting so many, viz. that thereby he might clear his own country of such noxious animals; and, at the same time, he very well knew, no creature could be more convenient for his purpose of annoying and detriming his enemies: for, as these creatures are very swift of foot, and have a natural dread of fire, they could not well fail, when once they were turned into it, of setting the standing corn in a blaze; and then, as they were tied in couples, tail to tail, this would make them draw one against the other; and being thereby retarded in their flight, and staying longer in a place, they would give the fire more time to spread itself, and at length occasion an universal conflagration.

(d) This rock was so formed by nature as to be accessible only by one path, and that so narrow as not to admit two people to walk abreast; by which it was, perhaps, one of the most defensible places that could be met with.

(e) It may appear strange to some that a single person, with no other instrument than the jaw-bone of an ass, should be able to lay so many people dead at his feet; but all wonder will cease, when we properly attend to the words of the sacred text, that, at the time, "the Spirit of the Lord came mightily upon him." The Philistines, no doubt, were astonished to see the cords fall so suddenly from his hands, and he advancing with the greatest fury against them: but the whole must be ascribed to the power of God, who can increase our strength in all respects, to what degree he pleases; and at the same time enfeeble the spirits of those who oppose his designs in such a manner; that they should not have power to help themselves.

From this singular achievement the place was afterwards called Ramath-Lehi, which, in the Hebrew language, signifies the lifting up of the jaw-bone.

(f) He did not stay to break open the gates, but plucked the posts out of the ground, with the doors hanging upon them fast barred; which extraordinary action so astonished the guards, that they had not power to follow him.

himself, and seeing Ruth, enquired of his servant who she was, and from whence she came. The servant, who had learned from her the particulars of her life and present situation, related the whole to Boaz, who was so pleased with her for the respect she shewed her mother-in-law, that he ordered his servant to tell her, she was not only at liberty to glean in his fields, but to gather what she thought proper, and that she should be allowed both food and drink in common with the reapers. Ruth reserved a part of her allowance for her mother-in-law, and, in the evening, carried it home with her corn, when she related to Naomi the occurrences of the day.

When Naomi understood who was the person that had been so great a benefactor to Ruth, she told her he was a near kinsman, and being a man of a pious and liberal disposition, he might probably extend his benevolence to their mutual advantage. She therefore advised Ruth to prosecute her labours, and to attend in the fields with the servants of Boaz, during the remainder of the harvest.

The harvest being over, Boaz was very diligent in threshing his corn; and being one day greatly fatigued, he laid himself on the floor and fell asleep, in which situation he was left by the people who had attended him. Information of this being given to Naomi, she advised Ruth to go to the barn, and lay herself gently at his feet, imagining that when Boaz should wake and discover her, it might produce something to her advantage.

Naomi considers how she may prevail with Boaz to marry Ruth.

Ruth, thinking it her duty to comply with the orders of her mother-in-law, immediately went, and getting into the barn, laid herself at the feet of Boaz. About the middle of the night Boaz awoke, and perceiving a woman lying by him, asked who she was. Ruth immediately discovered herself, and begged he would permit her to lie by him as one of his handmaids, which Boaz granted, and again fell asleep. Early in the morning, before the servants were come to their work, Boaz desired Ruth to get up, and, after taking as much corn as she could carry, go immediately to her mother-in-law, that she might not be seen by any of the servants; for though nothing had taken place between them of a criminal nature, yet it was prudent to avoid calumny, which would certainly arise should she be found with him. "But (says Boaz) before you go, I have this to say to you. There is a person of much nearer kin to you than I am. I will ask him if he chuses to marry you: if he consents you must go with him; but if he refuses, I will marry you myself." Ruth then departed; and when she got home, related all that had passed to her mother-in-law, who was highly pleased with her success, and the expectations of so profitable an alliance.

Boaz treats with Ruth's kinsman.

About the middle of the day Boaz went into the city, and convened an assembly of the elders. As soon as they were met, he sent for Ruth and the kinsman nearest allied to her, both of whom appearing, Boaz addressed himself to the man as follows: "If I am not mistaken, you are at present in possession of the inheritance of Abimelech and his sons." To which he replied, "I am, and the law has put me in possession of it, as being nearest of blood." Boaz answered, "The same law that gives you one part obliges you to take the other. Before you stands the widow of Mahlon,

"and you are bound by the law (a) either to marry her, or quit the inheritance." The man said he could not marry her, having already a wife and children. He therefore resigned the woman and estate to Boaz, who was the next in kindred to the deceased. In consequence of this declaration, Ruth was commanded to unloose the shoe (b) of the man, and spit in his face, agreeable to the custom used on such occasions.

A few days after Boaz took Ruth to wife, and at the expiration of a year she was delivered of a son. The boy was placed under the care of Naomi, who called him by the name of Obed, signifying, in the Hebrew language, service, or assistance; which she expected from him in her more advanced years. From Obed came Jesse, the father of David, in whose family the government continued one and twenty generations. I have been thus particular in my accounts of Ruth, to shew the power and wise dispensations of Providence, who can raise characters to the most elevated dignity on earth, however insignificant the objects from whom they are descended.

On the fulfilment of Naomi's wish, Boaz marries Ruth.

The genealogy of David.

The Israelites grew exceeding indolent under the government of Eli, which being observed by the Philistines, they determined to take advantage of it. The general dissipation of the people arose from the precedent set them by the two sons of Eli, named Hophni and Phineas, who was mere libertines. They domineered over the men, and violated the women at their devotions; and so far were they from being content with the portions which God had allotted them as priests, that they forced from the people (even before they had made their oblations) what part of the sacrifice they pleased; which gave so general a disgust, that religion grew into contempt, and the worship of God was almost totally disused.

Notorious profligacy of the sons of Eli.

The Almighty was pleased to chastise them for their remissness, and to forewarn them of the event by the prophet Samuel; of whose birth the following are the particulars:

In the city of Ramah, belonging to the tribe of Ephraim, lived a man named Elkanah, who had two wives, Hannah and Peninnah. He went three times a year to Shiloh, to offer up his usual sacrifice, and, as he was a pious and religious man, he generally took his two wives with him, that they, in like manner, might make their oblations. Hannah had not any children, notwithstanding which she was Elkanah's favourite; and at every feast, on the peace-offering, he usually sent her a separate mess, and of this choicest meat. Peninnah, being highly offended at the particular attention being paid to Hannah, vented her resentment by upbraiding her with sterility, or want of children. This greatly affected Hannah, insomuch that all her husband said could not assuage her grief. As soon as she arose from table, she hastened to the tabernacle, and there prayed to God, in the most fervent manner, that he would be pleased to bless her with a son, for which favour she promised to make him a Nazarite, and solely to devote him to his service. Her prayers were heard, and, in a proper time, she conceived, and brought forth a son, whom she called Samuel, that is to say, Asked of God. Hannah, as she had promised, went to the tabernacle at Shiloh, and after offering a sacrifice of thanksgiving for the birth of her son, and paying the tenths according Hannah, one of the wives of Elkanah, makes a vow to God, in order to obtain a son.

Samuel is born, and dedicated to the service of God.

(a) The reason of this seems to be grounded upon the law, by which the first-born of such marriage was to bear the name of the woman's former husband, in order to keep up his name in Israel; so that if this kinsman had married Ruth, and should have had but one son by her, that son being not to bear his name, but the name of her former husband, he himself would have no son to keep up his name in Israel: so that not being willing to run this hazard, he declined the purchase.

(b) There was a manner of confirming bargains, sales, exchanges, and alienations, among the Israelites. It consisted of two sorts: the first of which was penal, as when a man refused to marry the wife of his brother, who died without issue:

in this case the law commanded that the woman should take off his shoe, and spit in his face, at the same time using these words: "Thus shall it be done to the man that refuseth to raise up issue to his brother's family." The second was cessenary, or in token of resignation, and did not extend to the compelling of the kinsman in the second, third, or fourth degree, to marry the widow, but he might transfer his right to any other of the kindred; and as a sign of his cession or translation of his right, he took off his shoe, and delivered it to that kinsman who would marry the widow in the presence of the elders.

to custom, she delivered him to Eli, who clothed him with a proper habit, that he might attend on the service of the tabernacle. After this Hannah had several other sons, and three daughters, by her husband, Elkanah.

Samuel endowed with the spirit of prophecy at thirteen years of age.

When Samuel had attained to his thirteenth year, God was pleased to make him his agent, by inspiring him with the power of prophecy. As Samuel was one night asleep, God called him by his name, which he taking for the voice of Eli, immediately ran to him to know his pleasure, when he told him that he was mistaken, for that he had not mentioned his name. On this Samuel retired, and went again to rest, when he was repeatedly disturbed by the same voice; upon which he again went to Eli, and told him how distinctly he had been several times called, and that he thought it to be his voice. Eli said it was not him, but the voice of God. He then told Samuel to retire again to rest, and when he heard the voice again, to say, "Here I am, Lord; speak; for thy servant heareth, and is ready to obey thee." Samuel did as Eli had ordered; and, when he again heard the voice, answered, "Here I am, Lord, ready to do whatsoever thou shalt command." The voice replied, "Know, then, that calamities hang over Israel, greater than have been hitherto known. The two sons of Eli shall be cut off in one day, and the priesthood shall be taken from him, and given to the family of Eleazar: for Eli hath preferred his children to my honour and worship."

The Almighty, by means of Samuel, denounces his wrath against Eli, for that he had preferred his children to his.

Sam. iii.

Samuel was unwilling to relate these melancholy tidings to Eli; but being at length urged to it, he gave a particular account of the whole revelation, which Eli received with a mind apparently resigned to the Divine will.

The Philistines conquer the Hebrews. Sam. iv.

The time was now come when Samuel's prophecy was to be fulfilled, and the displeasure of the Almighty manifested to the disobedient Israelites. The Philistines had raised a powerful army, with which they marched against the Israelites, and encamped at Aphek, a city of Judah. Finding no opposition, they advanced farther, and, at length, meeting the army of the Israelites, a desperate battle ensued, in which 4000 of the latter were slain, and the remainder put to flight.

This defeat greatly alarmed the Israelites, some of whom imputed it to arise from the want of the ark in the army, which, as the symbol of God's presence, they said would be a sure means of success. Accordingly a messenger was dispatched to Hophni and Phineas, to bring the ark, which no sooner arrived in the camp, than the people testified their joy by the loudest acclamations. When the Philistines first heard that the ark was brought to the camp of the Israelites, they were greatly dispirited; but at length taking courage, and exhorting each other to perseverance, they prepared themselves to oppose the enemy. The Israelites, not doubting of success, attacked the Philistines with great fury; but they were soon repulsed, with the loss of 30,000 men, among whom were Hophni and Phineas. The rest of the army were glad to save themselves by flight, so that the ark of the Lord fell into the hands of the Philistines.

The Hebrews are again overthrown by the Philistines, the sons of Eli are slain, and the ark comes into the possession of the enemy.

CHAP. XII.

The Israelites lament the loss of the ark. Death of Eli, the high priest.

THE melancholy news of this defeat was carried to Shiloh on the same day it happened, by a soldier of the tribe of Benjamin, who had made his escape from the field of battle. As soon as it was known, an universal outcry and lamentation prevailed throughout the city; and when Eli came to understand what was the cause of it, he sent for the man to know the particulars. The soldier told him, the Israelites were routed, his two sons slain, and the ark of the Lord taken by the enemy. Eli heard the defeat of the army, and the death of his sons, without appearing in the least agitated; but when he was told the ark of the Lord had fallen into the enemy's hands, his spirits forsook him, he fell from his chair, and instantly expired, in the 98th year of his age, and 40th of his government.

Eli expires on hearing of the loss of the ark.

When the wife of Phineas (who was at this time with child, and near her time) heard of the deaths of her husband and father, and (what was worst of all) of the captivity of the ark, she immediately fell in labour, and being shortly delivered of a son, she had just strength enough to name him Ichabod, which signifies shame and ignominy, before she died; because the ark, which was the glory of Israel, was departed from them.

Eli was the first of the family of Ithamar (another of the sons of Aaron) that exercised the function of high priest; for the family of Eleazar officiated in that capacity first, the son still receiving that honour from the father. Eleazar bequeathed it to his son Phineas, he to his son Abiezer, from whom it went to his son Boeas, and thence to his son Ozis. After, when Eli, of whom we have been speaking, had the priesthood, which was returned in his line until the reign of king Solomon, when it reverted to the posterity of Eleazar.

CHAP. I.

Divers plagues and calamities befall the Philistines for detaining the ark. Resolved in council to restore it. Manner in which it was brought back to the Israelites.

2 Sam. v.

Dagon, the idol god of Ashdod, falls down before the ark.

AFTER the Philistines had defeated the Israelites, and made themselves masters of the ark, they carried it in great triumph to one of their principal cities, called Ashdod, or Azotus, and there placed it in the temple of their god Dagon (a), near his image. The next morning, when the people went to the temple to pay their devotions, they found Dagon fallen down upon his face before the ark; but supposing it to be ■ accident, they set him up again. When they went the following morning to the temple, they found him not only on the ground, but in an imperfect state, his head and hands being broke off in the fall. They again repeatedly set him up, but as repeatedly found him the next day lying prostrate before the ark.

The inhabitants of Ashdod were greatly alarmed at this circumstance, and began to think that their Dagon was far inferior to the God of Israel. They

(a) Dagon was represented ■ ■ monster, being half a man, and half ■ fish; whence the learned derive his name from the Hebrew word Dag, which signifies ■ fish. Milton enumerates this deity among the fallen angels; and thus describes him:

Next came one
Who mourn'd in earnest, when the captive ark
Maim'd his brute image, head and hands lop'd off,
In his own temple, on the groundsel edge,
Where he fell flat, and sham'd his worshippers:
Dagon his name; sea-monster! upward man,
And downward fish; yet had his temple high Rear'd in Azotus, dreaded through the coast
Of Palestine, in Gath, and Ascalon,
And Accaron, and Gaza's frontier bounds.

had farther reason to imagine this, when they found that a most dreadful epidemical distemper prevailed throughout the city, which carried off great numbers in a very short time; and, to add to this calamity, their fields were over-run with mice, which, destroying all the fruits of the earth, divested them of the common necessities of life. Thinking these calamities arose from their having in possession the ark of the Israelites, they sent ■ messenger to the people of Ascalon, desiring them to admit it into their city. This offer was readily accepted, and the ark immediately removed to Ascalon; but when the people found that the same calamities, which had befallen the inhabitants of Ashdod, attended them, they removed the ark to another city. The same calamities attended the people of that place, as also the other cities to which the ark was removed.

The Philistines are smitten with plagues.

The ark is removed from place to place; but the same calamities befall those who receive it.

The Philistines began now seriously to think that all their troubles arose from having the ark in their possession. They therefore determined to part with it, and for that purpose called together the priests of the different cities in which it had been placed, to consult with them in what manner it should be removed from their country. After different propositions, it was at length resolved, that there should be made five golden images (b), one for each of the cities

A consultation held to determine on the manner of disposing of the ark. 2 Sam. vi.

(b) "It was an ancient custom (says Mr. Locke) in case a city or country was infested with any plague of diseases, or noxious creatures, to consult the talisman, who ordered an image to be erected of the plague, under a certain influence of celestial configuration; and this was the cause why the Philistine priests gave counsel that golden images should be made to represent the disease with which they had been afflicted, as also of those vermin which had destroyed the fruits of the earth." Tavernier tells us, that something similar to this is still practised among the Indians; for when a pilgrim there goes to a pagod for the cure of any disease, he brings the figure of the member affected, made either of gold, silver, or copper, according to his quality, which he offers to the idol, and then sings and dances for joy, in expectation of his malady being removed. It was also a custom among the ancient heathens cities in which the ark had stood, to be dedicated to God; as also five golden mice (alluding to the vermin that had destroyed the fruits of the earth.) That these should be enclosed in a box, and, with the ark, put into a cart made for the purpose, to be drawn by two milch cows, who had never been yoked before, and their calves to be closely confined (a). That the waggon, with the ark, should be conducted to a spot where three roads met, and the cattle there left at liberty to go whither they pleased. If they took the Hebrew road, and went on, they might impute their calamities to the ark; but if they took another course, they might consider them only as common accidents.

All things being adjusted, the kine were led to the spot fixed on, attended by a great number of the Philistines, where they were no sooner left to themselves, than they immediately took the Hebrew road, and went lowing along till they came to Bethshemeth, a village belonging to the tribe of Judah, where they stood still by a great stone. As soon as the ark was seen, and the news of its arrival spread about, the people flocked to it in great multitudes; and, after taking out the ark and the box, they burnt the cart, and sacrificed the two kine as a burnt-offering to God; at the close of which ceremony the Philistines, who had attended the ark to this place, returned to their own country.

CHAP. III.

Judgement inflicted for prophanation. Reformation amongst the Hebrews, who are assembled by Samuel, and admonished to recover their liberty. Expedition against the Philistines under the conduct of Samuel. The Hebrews are victorious.

SOME of the Bethshemites (either from joy or curiosity) venturing to look into the ark (which was expressly against the Divine command) were immediately slain, to the number of seventy; which so terrified the rest, that they sent to the people of Kirjath-jearim, acquainting them that the Philistines had brought back the ark, and desiring them to come and fetch it, as they were not worthy to have it in their possession. The inhabitants of Kirjath-jearim accordingly came, and taking with them the ark, it was placed in the house of one Abinadab, a Levite, a man distinguished for his integrity, and religion; in whose charge, and that of his sons, it remained twenty years.

When the ark was removed to Kirjath-jearim, the people applied themselves, with great diligence, to the performance of religious duties, and gave ample testimony of their strict observance to the laws. The prophet Samuel (who succeeded to the government after the death of Eli) seeing this, and thinking it a proper opportunity, harrangued the multitude as follows:

"O ye men of Israel, (said he), ye have fatally experienced the implacable hatred and malice of your enemies; but ye have reason to be once more happy, seeing that your earnest supplications to God have not been in vain. Let me therefore recommend it to you to inure yourselves to the love and practice of justice; purge your minds of all improper affections: turn to God, adore him, and honour him in your lives and conversation, as well as with your lips. If you do good to consecrate to their idols the monuments of their deliverances.

(a) The learned Dr. Stackhouse, in speaking of this passage, says, "It was no bad policy in the Philistines to take milch kine, that had never been yoked before, to draw the cart, in order to know whether or not there was the hand of God in what had befallen them. As those creatures were unacquainted with the yoke, it would be a wonder if they should go jointly together, and not thwart, or draw counter to each other: it would be a wonder if their natural affection would "things, good will come of it; that is to say, you will be possessed of liberty and conquest. But these are blessings not to be obtained by force of men, strength of body, or bands of soldiers. It is God alone who can bestow these privileges, which he has promised to do if you adhere strictly to his ordinances; and you may depend upon it he will not disappoint you."

This speech was universally approved of by the people, who promised Samuel they would strictly observe all he had said, and inviolably obey the Divine commands.

A short time after this Samuel summoned an assembly of the people at Mizpeh, (that is to say, conspicuous), where they held a fast and humiliation to God. The Philistines, being informed of this meeting, marched with a great army towards Mizpeh, intending to attack the Israelites by surprize. As soon as the Philistines were seen, the whole multitude were struck with terror, and told Samuel, there was no possibility of elcaping the fury of so inveterate an enemy, unless he could prevail with God to grant them his Divine assistance. Samuel told them not to fear, for God had promised them his protection, and would most certainly fulfil his word. Samuel then sacrificed a sucking lamb to God, in the name of the people, imploring his aid against the power of the Philistines. The Almighty was pleased to accept the sacrifice, and to promise Samuel, that the Israelites should obtain a complete victory over their enemies.

While the sacrifice was yet on the altar, the Philistines drew out in order of battle; but they had no sooner begun the attack, than the earth shook under their feet with such violence as to prevent their standing; and, in some places, it opened, and swallowed them up. This was attended with a dreadful storm of thunder and lightning, which so affected them, that they were totally unable to use their arms; and, from the whole, were so frightened, that they betook themselves to flight. The Israelites, seeing this, immediately pursued them as far as Bethshear, (killing great numbers in their way), where Samuel set up a stone in memory of the victory. He called it the stone of assistance, intimating, that it was by the help of God they had conquered their enemies.

This defeat struck such a panic into the Philistines, that they did not presume to make any farther attempt on the Israelites. On the contrary, Samuel, with his army, pursued them from one city to another, and at length retook the whole country that lies betwixt Gath and Ekron, which had formerly belonged to the Israelites, but was taken from them by the Philistines.

CHAP. III.

Samuel being advanced in years, transfers the government to his two sons, who degenerate from the conduct and character of their father.

AFTER Samuel had thus reduced the Philistines, and reinstated the people in the possession of their lands and cities, he appointed public meetings to be held at certain times, for the administration of justice; and took a circuit twice every year, to see that it was properly executed, making it his principal care to prevent any violation of the laws of his country.

not incline them to return to their calves, which were left behind: and it would be still a greater wonder, if, when there were so many different ways to take, they should go directly forward towards Judea, without any manner of deviation. It was therefore a matter of no small sagacity for them to make this experiment: To say nothing, that, it was a received opinion among the heathens, that in the motions of an heifer, or cow, that was never yoked there was something ominous, and declarative of the Divine will.

The kine immediately proceeded to the land of the Hebrews.

1 Sam. viii. Samuel adopts an excellent plan of government.

Samuel appoints his sons judges.

The sons of Samuel become dilute to the highest degree. Sam. viii.

Being now grown in years, and unable, from natural infirmities, to discharge the duties of his office, Samuel relinquished the government, and put it into the hands of his two sons, Joel and Abiah. He appointed one of them to reside at Bethel, and the other at Beersheba; and ordered them to go different circuits to administer justice to the people.

The two sons of Samuel acted diametrically opposite to the maxims of their father, and to the injunctions he had laid on them for the government of the people. They prostituted justice for gain, and decided controversies by the value of the bribe. They gave themselves up to every kind of vice, and seemed to bid defiance not only to the injunctions of their father, but the commands of their Maker.

CHAP. IV.

The people, disgusted at the government of Samuel's sons, require a king to rule over them. A king is promised them by Samuel.

THE elders of the people, incensed at the mal-administration of the sons of Samuel, went in a body to their father, who then resided at Ramah, and, after representing the grievances they lay under, from his infirmities, and the mal-administration of his sons, demanded to have the form of their government changed, and that a king might be appointed over them as in other nations.

Samuel is much grieved by the application of the people for a change in the form of government.

This demand gave great uneasiness to Samuel; and, for some time, he knew not how to act. At length he applied to God, who told him to comply with the request of the people, notwithstanding the affront was not so much on Samuel as on himself. But, before they proceeded to the choice of a king, God ordered Samuel to acquaint them with what his prerogatives were, and what they might expect he would demand from them; and withal, to inform them, that slavery to them and their children, subjection to the meanest offices, loss of liberty, heavy taxes, constant war, and other inconveniencies, would be the consequence of a kingly power.

Convenes the people, and dissuades them from espousing a kingly government.

Samuel, having received this intelligence from the Almighty, assembled the people together, and told them the various consequences that would follow should they persist in subjecting themselves to the kingly power. But all his remonstrances were of no effect: the people were absolute in their demand; upon which Samuel broke up the assembly, telling the people, he would call them again together as soon as he should receive directions from God who was to be their king.

CHAP. V.

Saul, by the appointment of God, anointed king. Heads an army against the Ammonites, and defeats them.

NEVER was the interposition of Providence manifested in a greater degree, than in the election of Saul as king over the Israelites; the circumstances attending which cannot be read without distinguished admiration.

Saul was the son of Kish, of the tribe of Benjamin. He was remarkably handsome in his person, and had a mind answerable to the graces of his body. It happened at this time that some of his father's asses had gone astray, and he and a servant were sent to look for them (a). They wandered a great way without gaining any intelligence, till coming to Ramah (b), the place of Samuel's residence, Saul, at the instigation of the servant, went to consult with the prophet concerning his asses.

Samuel had been all the preceeding day employed in supplicating God to tell him what person to appoint king; and the Almighty was pleased to answer, that the next day he should receive his order, for there should come to him a young man of the tribe of Benjamin at that same hour.

The prophet staid at home the whole day, and, when the precise period arrived, as he was going down to supper, he met Saul, whom he knew, by an immediate inspiration, to be the person designed for the government. Saul, not knowing him, asked for the prophet, when Samuel answered, he had found him already. He then told Saul, that not only the asses he sought for were safe, but that himself was on the point of being advanced to the highest pitch of sovereign power. When supper was ready, Samuel placed Saul above the rest of the guests, (who were seventy in number), and his servant next him; and ordered the attendants to bring Saul a royal meal. The time being come for the company to break up, they departed to their respective homes, except Saul and his servant, whom the prophet desired to remain with him for that night.

Samuel's certain Saul and servant.

Early in the morning Samuel called up his guests, and having accompanied them some way from the city, he desired Saul to order his servant to go forward, as he had something to say to him in private. This being done, Samuel took out of his pocket a phial of oil, which having poured on Saul's head, he kissed him, and then spoke to the following effect: "Be thou king; for such thou art appointed to be by God, in order to revenge the injuries committed by the Philistines on the Israelites. In token of this, observe what I am now going to relate. When thou art departed from me, thou shalt find, in thy journey, three men going to Bethel to worship God; the first carrying three loaves, the second a kid, and the third a bottle of wine. They will all shew you great respect, and offer you two of the loaves, which you are to receive. When you have advanced as far as the place called Rachel's Sepulchre, you will meet a man, who will give you tidings of your asses. After this, on your arrival at Gath, you will join with a company of prophets, and, by the assistance of the spirit of God, will prophecy with them to the great admiration of the multitude, who will exclaim, How comes the son of Kish to be found among the prophets? When this shall come to pass, you may be assured that God is with you. Go then to your father and kindred; and when I send for you, come to me at Gilgal, that we may conjunctively offer up our prayers to God, with sacrifices and thanksgiving." Having said this, Samuel parted with Saul, who found every thing to happen as had been told him by the prophet.

Anointing Saul. Sam. x.

When Saul arrived at his father's house, his uncle Abner (for whom he had a particular esteem) asked him to relate the occurrences that had happened in the course of his journey. Saul told him of his going to the prophet; but did not chuse to mention a syllable of his elevation to the throne, lest, if believed, it should produce the envy, if not the censure, of the people.

Thus was Saul appointed king; but then it was only between Samuel and himself. To make, therefore, his appointment and inauguration more xxxvi. 24. Asses were a considerable part of the people's possessions in Judea, and persons of the first distinction there commonly rode on them.

public,

1 Sam. ix. Saul, who was designed for the king of Israel, is seen in quest of his father's asses.

(a) By this it appears that Saul's employment, according to the manners of the present age, was but of a mean nature; but it is to be observed that, in ancient times, every thing which pertained to rural life was deemed honourable. Even heroes and princes kept flocks; and such, indeed, was the occupations of the patriarchs. The Scripture speaks of a prince descended from Esau, who kept the asses of his father, Gen.

CHAP. VI.

public, Samuel convened an assembly of the people at Mizpeh; and when they were gathered together, he addressed them in words to the following effect: "I am commanded, by God himself, to inform you, that it was he who not only delivered you out of Egyptian bondage, but also repeatedly rescued you from the hands of your enemies. In return for which you have been so ungrateful as to shake off his authority, by insinuating to have a king of your own choice; a king who will rule over you with a tyrannical sway, and treat you with such indignation and cruelty, as if himself did not belong to the same species. But since ye are resolved to have a king, divide yourselves by your tribes and families, and then cast lots who shall be the man." The Israelites did as Samuel directed, and the lot of the tribe fell upon Benjamin; that of the families upon Matri; and when they came to try it personally, the lot fell upon Saul, the son of Kish.

Saul, knowing what business was in hand, had concealed himself from a sense of modesty; but being at length found, he was brought before the people, who were highly pleased with his majestic deportment, and the graces of his person. Samuel, addressing himself to the multitude, said, "This is he whom God hath appointed to be your king: look at him, and behold in his person how well he is qualified for such an honour." On this the people universally shouted, "God save the king." Samuel hereupon (having previously written down every thing that was to happen) related the same to the people before Saul; after which he placed the book in the tabernacle of God, there to remain as an undeniable evidence for ever of what he had prophesied.

This business being over, Samuel went to Ramah, and Saul to Gibeah, (a) the place of his nativity. He was accompanied by the principal people of the different tribes, who congratulated him on his accession to the throne with the loudest acclamations. Indeed, he had the good wishes of all the people, except some few disorderly persons, who disapproved of the choice, and, in pure contempt, refused to make him the usual presents; which Saul could not but perceive, though, in point of prudence, he thought proper, for that time, not to notice the circumstance.

Saul had not been many days on the throne, when an opportunity offered for him to shew his regal authority. Nahash, king of the Ammonites, heading a powerful army, had committed various outrages, in different parts, on the other side the river Jordan. He not only destroyed those cities and towns of the Israelites, but exercised the most cruel barbarities on the poor captives, ordering them to be punished with the loss of their right eye (b). At length he laid siege to Jabesh, the capital city of the Gileadites; and sent a summons to the inhabitants, that if they did not deliver up the place, and submit to the loss of their right eyes, he would immediately reduce the whole to ashes. After some consultation the inhabitants returned for answer, that they desired only seven days to send to their friends for relief, and if they did not receive any in that time, they would either surrender themselves up, or stand a contest. Nahash looked on the Israelites in so contemptible a light, and thought himself so secure of reducing them at discretion, that he granted their request.

In consequence of this the Gileadites dispatched messengers to Gibeah, requesting of Saul to send them immediate succour, that they might be enabled to defend themselves against the power of their enemies.

Saul musters a powerful army. Advances and obtains a complete victory over the Ammonites. Acquires glory by his prowess. Is a second time proclaimed king. Samuel vindicates his conduct in a general appeal. Delivers a charge to the people.

WHILE the affairs of the Israelites were in this critical situation, Saul was seized with a prophetic spirit, and sent back the messengers to Jabesh with a promise of assistance in three days, when they should overcome their enemies before the rising of the sun. Being desirous of inclining the minds of the people towards this war, (through fear of the losses they should otherwise sustain), he cut the sinews of his own oxen, and threatened to do the same to all such as did not the next day appear in arms at the river Jordan, and then follow him and Samuel wherever they should lead them. By these means he raised an army of 700,000 men, besides 70,000 more of the tribe of Judah. With this army he marched against the Ammonites, and dividing the whole into three companies, they fell on the besiegers before day-light. After a short contest the Ammonites were totally routed, and the greater part slain, among whom was Nahash, their leader.

This victory, and the deliverance it procured from a barbarous and insulting enemy, raised the reputation of Saul to so great a degree, that some of the people (recollecting the indignities put on him at his coronation) were, in the height of their zeal, for having them immediately punished with death; but Saul very prudently opposed the motion, and expressed his aversion at having the glories of that day sullied with the blood of any of his subjects.

From this victory, however, Samuel took occasion to give those, who had hitherto refused their allegiance, an opportunity of coming in, and recognizing the king. For this purpose he convened a general assembly of the people at Gilgal, when Saul was again anointed king, and his right to the throne fully established. Thus was the government of the Israelites changed to a monarchy, which, for a considerable time before, was lodged in magistrates under the name of judges.

Samuel was at this time to resign the government entirely into the hands of Saul. He therefore made a speech to the people on the occasion, in which, after vindicating himself from any misconduct during his administration, he thus reminded them of their transgressions and disobedience to God: "What (says he) should you choose another king for, after the experience of so many signal mercies, and miraculous deliverances, while you were under God's protection, and owned him for your governor? You have forgot the circumstance of Jacob's coming into Egypt with only seventy men in his train, and purely for want of bread; how God provided for them, and in what manner, by his blessing, they were relieved. You have forgot the slavery to which they were subjected, till, from their cries and supplications, God rescued them by the hands of Moses and Aaron, and brought them into the land you now possess. How can you be so ungrateful now, after so many distinguished benefits received, as to depart from your allegiance to your Divine protector? How often have you fallen into the hands of your enemies for your apostacy and disobedience, and as often restored to God's favour and your liberty, by humiliation and repentance! Who was it that gave you victory over all your enemies but God? It was not by the power of kings, with bows and arrows, sword and shield, the loss of the right eye would have disabled them from doing either. It is probable, such was the natural cruelty of his disposition, that he would have demanded the loss of both their eyes, had it not been for this political reason, namely, that, in such case, they would have been utterly incapable of rendering him any service, or paying any tribute.

(a) Gibeah was a city in the tribe of Benjamin, lying north of Jerusalem about twenty or thirty furlongs, and built upon a hill, as its name imports. This city is celebrated upon several occasions. It gave birth to Saul, the first king of Israel; for which reason it is frequently called Gibeah of Saul, or Gibeah the native country of Saul.

(b) As the manner of fighting, in those days, was chiefly but under the conduct of Jephtha and Gideon. What madness, then, has possessed you, to give up an heavenly governor for an earthly one. However, you have asked for a king, and a king you have got: but to convince you how the Almighty is offended at your conduct, I do now beg from heaven, as a testimony of the truth of what I say, that such a tempest may this instant fall as was never before seen by man."

The truth of what Samuel delivered, is attested by wonderful prodigies.

No sooner had Samuel uttered these last words, than there fell such a violent storm of thunder, lightning, and hail, as almost to pronounce a general dissolution of nature. An universal terror took place among the people: they directly acknowledged their transgressions, and intreated Samuel to intercede with the Almighty to pardon their sins. Samuel not only promised to comply with their request, but to assist them with his best instructions, so long as they adhered to the observation of God's laws; but at the same time told them, if they despised his instructions, not only they, but also their king, would be infallibly destroyed. Having said this, Samuel dismissed the assembly, and immediately retired.

CHAP. VII.

Jonathan, the son of Saul, signalizes himself by obtaining a conquest over the Philistines. Saul, by precipitate conduct, incurs the Divine displeasure. His exploits and progeny.

1 Sam. xiii.

AFTER Saul had defeated the Ammonites, he disbanded his army, retaining only three thousand, two of which he kept for his body guard, and the other thousand he appointed to attend on his son Jonathan, who was a prince of great bravery, and had cut off a garrison of the Philistines at Gibeah. Whenever the Philistines gained an advantage over the Jews, they not only disarmed them, but forbade them the use of iron in any case whatever; so that they were under a necessity of applying to the Philistine artificers for all necessities in that branch.

The Philistines deprive the Hebrews of the use of iron.

Raise a powerful army.

The Philistines, resolving to oppose the Israelites, raised a powerful army, consisting of 3000 chariots, with which they marched against them, and encamped near a place called Michmash. The Hebrew army, which was appointed to rendezvous at Gilgal, came in but very slowly; and of those that did, many were so faint-hearted as to secrete themselves in rocks and caves; while others, from the mere apprehension of danger, retired beyond the river Jordan. In short, not only the people, but even Saul himself was greatly intimidated, and the more so on the account of Samuel, whom they expected, not being yet come. Saul, therefore, fearing the enemy should fall on him before he had addressed himself to God for success, ordered sacrifices to be made; and the burnt-offering was but just finished when Samuel arrived.

The Israelites are intimidated.

Saul offers sacrifices without Divine permission.

Is reprehended by Samuel.

When Samuel found what Saul had done, he reprehended him for his conduct, in having offered a sacrifice to God in his absence. Saul endeavoured to excuse himself, by saying, his people were so intimidated, on hearing the enemy had marched towards Gilgal, that he found it necessary to be expeditious in his motions, lest they should entirely desert him. To this the prophet replied, "It would have been better for you to have followed my advice, and not have acted derogatory to the will of the Divine Being, who otherwise would have established the government in you and your posterity." After this Samuel departed, highly offended at what Saul had done.

Threatened with the loss of his kingdom.

(a) How Jonathan and his armour-bearer only could put the whole army of the Philistines into so universal a consternation, appears, at first sight, very extraordinary; but when we consider, that they climbed up a way never attempted before; that they surprised the enemy unawares, and perhaps when the greatest part of them were asleep; that this army, being composed of different nations, might entertain jealousies and suspicions of each other; and that the darkness of the night

The only alternative Saul now had, was, either to attempt defending himself against the Philistines, or quietly submit to their superior power. After some deliberation, he determined on the former, and, for that purpose, (taking with him his son Jonathan), marched with his army, consisting only of 600 men, towards the enemy. It is to be observed, that Saul's troops were badly armed; for the Philistines, having made themselves masters of various parts of the country, had prohibited the people from making any use of iron, as before observed.

When Saul's army came near that of the Philistines, he, together with his son Jonathan, and Ahiah, the high priest, ascended a steep rock, where they had a full view of the enemy unperceived. On this Jonathan, taking aside his armour-bearer, asked him how far he would assist him in a bold enterprise for the redemption of his country? To which the armour-bearer answered, with an oath, that he would, however dangerous the situation, stand by him to the last extremity. Jonathan then made a proposition, which was immediately agreed to, that he, and his armour-bearer, should endeavour secretly to get into the enemy's camp, and, if they succeeded, fall violently on the Philistines, and thereby throw them into immediate confusion. This design was, with great difficulty, carried into execution. They got into the camp of the Philistines at a time when they were all at rest, and no ways apprehensive of danger. Jonathan, and his armour-bearer, took proper advantage of this favourable opportunity, and immediately falling on the Philistines, put upwards of twenty to the sword, which occasioned such an universal confusion, that the Philistines, mistaking friends for foes, destroyed each other (a). Intimation of this being given to Saul, and the news circulated among the general body of the Israelites, those who had secreted themselves through fear, immediately came from their hiding-places; and Saul, having soon mustered together his army, marched against the Philistines, and fell on them with such fury, that they were totally defeated.

1 Sam. xiii. Jonathan undertakes a bold enterprise, attacks the Philistines, and kills 20 of them. Saul and his army follow, and are defeated.

Saul was so elated at this success, and so fully determined, if possible, to extirpate the Philistines, that he denounced a heavy curse on every Hebrew who should lose time from pursuing the enemy, even to eat or drink, till night should put a period to the slaughter. It happened that Jonathan, who was a stranger to the malediction, in passing through a wood, found a honey-comb, and being greatly fatigued, he took a piece, and sucked it. He soon after repeated this refreshment in the presence of several people, who reprehended him for his conduct, in violating his father's orders, upon which Jonathan immediately desisted; but said, that Saul had committed a great indiscretion in prohibiting such a thing; for had the men been refreshed by eating, they would have pursued the enemy with more vigour, and took captive, or put to the sword, a much greater number.

Denounces a curse.

His father's curse is repeated.

After the Israelites had pursued the Philistines till night, and slain many thousands, they returned to seize their camp, in which they found abundance of spoil, and withal many sheep, which the soldiers slew and eat, together with the blood. This being an offence against their laws, the Levites complained of it to the king, who ordered a large stone to be placed in the middle of the camp; the beasts to be killed on that stone, and the flesh not to be eaten till the blood had been properly drained from it, being a thing contradictory to the express command of God. This decree was readily obeyed; and Saul erected an altar, on which he offered sacrifices to God for his late success.

The Hebrews devour the blood.

Violate their laws.

Saul erects an altar.

Saul, being desirous of improving this victory, might make them apprehend the whole body of the Israelites was come upon them at once, the fright of the Philistines is not so very surprising; and when we add to all this, what is not improbable, that God might, at this instant, inspire a panic fear into the whole host, our wonder will be turned into praise and adoration of that powerful Being, who, when he sees fit, can make the greatest heroes tremble, and put to flight the most formidable armies.

thought it advisable to follow the blow by pursuing those who had escaped, and falling on them before they could have time to grow formidable by numbers. But previous to his making this attempt, he desired the high-priest to consult the will of God on his intentions. This was accordingly done, when the high-priest returned for answer, "That God was unwilling to satisfy his desire at this time." Saul then said, "There is some cause why God doth not reveal his oracle to us when we ask it, seeing that he has heretofore been so gracious as to prevent our requests by granting them beforehand. There has been certainly some secret sin committed against him that occasions this silence, and I am determined, if possible, to find it out. Now I swear, by the Supreme Majesty of heaven, that whoever shall be found to be the transgressor, my son Jonathan not excepted, his life shall answer for it."

When the multitude heard this they unanimously agreed to undergo the examination, and, for that purpose, immediately assembled at one spot, Saul and Jonathan standing near each other. In order to discover the offender, lots were drawn, when, behold, it fell upon Jonathan, who was accordingly declared the guilty person. On this Saul asked him, in the hearing of the people, what sin he had committed, and in what part of his life he had been guilty of any wickedness or impiety? To this Jonathan replied, "I have been guilty of no other crime than only tasting yesterday, as I pursued the enemy, a little honey; and this I did, not knowing your decree to the contrary." Saul answered, "Though my kindred and relations are dear to me, yet they are but trifling to the obligation I lay under to fulfil the vow I have made. As you, therefore, are the transgressor, you must make atonement by the forfeiture of your life." Jonathan, instead of being in the least dismayed at the apprehensions of death, told his father, with a brave and generous resolution, that he desired not to be forgiven. "That death (says he) shall be welcome to me that acquits my father of the obligation of a religious vow. I have lived long enough, since I have lived to see the pride and insolence of the Philistines brought down by the Hebrews; and this reflection will carry me in peace to my grave."

When the people heard Jonathan say this, they were greatly affected, and swore they would not suffer him to die, who was the principal cause of their late glorious victory. In consequence of this oath Jonathan's life was preserved; and the people unanimously supplicated God, in the most fervent manner, that he would be pleased to pardon the offence he had unintentionally committed.

After this victory Saul returned to Gilgal, and reigned very happily, acquitting himself with great reputation in all his military exploits against the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Philistines, and the Edomites. He had, indeed, a very large and flourishing family. Abinoam, the daughter of Ahiahaz, was his wife; Jonathan, Joshua, and Melchishui, were his sons; Michal and Merab his daughters; and Abner, his cousin-german, was general of his forces. He kept a great number of chariots and horsemen; and whatever enemy he attacked, his endeavours were crowned with success. His body guards, of which he had great numbers, were the tallest and handsomest men that could be selected; and he kept his court in the most splendid manner. In short, he advanced the Israelites to the highest pitch of glory for their martial exploits, and made them so formidable as to be a perpetual dread to their enemies.

C H A P. VIII.

Saul is commanded by the prophet to extirpate the Amalekites. Disobeys by saving Agag, their king. Is punished for his disobedience.

WHILE the Israelites were thus situated, Samuel went to Saul at Gilgal, and told him he had a message to deliver to him by the special direction of God; and that as the Almighty had been pleased to make him king, in preference to all others, it was his duty to obey his Divine commands, which were as follow: "That whereas the Amalekites had treated the Hebrews with great cruelty when they were come out of Egypt into the land they then possessed, it was the will of God that he should immediately declare war against them; and that, upon subduing them, he should not only put to the sword every man, woman, and child, but that he should also destroy their cattle and sheep. That they should not take to themselves any part of the spoil, but that the whole should be dedicated to God as one common sacrifice. That the very name of Amalek should be razed from mankind, according to the command of Moses; and all this as a just vengeance for the repeated calamities they had brought on the Israelites."

Samuel enjoins Saul to destroy the Amalekites.

Saul promised Samuel that these injunctions should be strictly obeyed, and that he would immediately set about carrying them into execution. He accordingly drew together his forces, which he reviewed at Gilgal, and found them to consist of 40,000, besides 30,000 belonging to the tribe of Judah.

With this army Saul marched into the country of the Amalekites, and placing several of his companies in ambuscade, they suddenly fell on the inhabitants, and put every one to the sword. After this he marched against the main body of the enemy, when a desperate battle ensued, in which Saul was victorious; and such of the Amalekites as did not fall in the battle, were pursued and killed; so that not a single person was left to convey the intelligence of the defeat.

The Amalekites are totally defeated.

Saul, having thus far succeeded in executing his commission, proceeded to invest the cities of the Amalekites, some of which he took by storm, some by mining, and others by stratagem. At length he reduced the whole of their towns, and put all the inhabitants to the sword, except Agag, their king, whom he was induced to preserve on account of the comeliness of his person. In this Saul disobeyed the Divine commands; for the Amalekites had made themselves so abominable in the sight of heaven, that God had ordered him to destroy all, and not suffer a single person to exist. The soldiers likewise made a breach on the Divine commands, by driving away many of the cattle and sheep, and preserving, for their own use, the most valuable articles.

Saul disobeys the Divine command.

In this expedition Saul laid waste the whole country of the Amalekites, from Pelusium, on the borders of Egypt, to the Red Sea, leaving only the Shechemites in the land of Midian. Previous to the commencement of the war, he had sent orders to those people not to join with the Amalekites, but rather to retire, lest they should fall in the general destruction that was to take place. The indulgence shewn these people was out of respect to Moses, whose father-in-law, Jethro, was a Shechemite.

The Shechemites spared.

Saul, having ravaged the whole country of the Amalekites, returned with his army to Gilgal, highly pleased with what he had done, not reflecting that he was deficient in the injunctions laid on him before he went on the expedition. His sparing the life of Agag, and the people converting the spoil to their own use, being two articles expressly forbidden in his commission, gave great offence to the Almighty, who was pleased to declare to Samuel, that he lamented having made Saul king, seeing, that, instead of doing what he had been commanded, he was determined to take the power out of his hands, by doing as he pleased.

Samuel was so afflicted in his mind at this intelligence, that he spent the whole night in fervent prayers and intercessions to God, that he would pardon the offence Saul had committed. But the Almighty, instead of granting his request, gave him an answer to this effect: "That it would be a mistaken lenity to pass over faults of such a nature, Samuel intercedes in behalf of Saul, but without effect.

"nature, as the pardoning of one offence would be only an encouragement for the commission of another."

When Samuel found his prayers ineffectual, and that God was so displeased as not to be moved in favour of Saul, he was greatly grieved, and went the next morning to Gilgal, to communicate the melancholy intelligence to the king. As soon as Saul saw Samuel, he ran to meet him, and embracing him in his arms, said, "I return thanks to God for having given me the victory. Moreover, I have performed all that he enjoined me to do." To this Samuel replied, "How comes it then, that I hear the bleating of sheep, and the lowing of oxen?" Saul answered, "Those were only some beasts the people had reserved for sacrifices; and that he had destroyed all the Amalekites, except Agag, their king, whom he kept prisoner till he might have advice what should be done with him." "God (says Samuel) delights not in sacrifices, but in the righteousness of good and just men, that is to say, such as observe his holy will, and keep his commandments. He does not consider the sacrifice, but the obedience; without which all oblations are of none effect. Know then, Saul, that thou art fallen under God's heavy displeasure, for the neglect and contempt of his commandments. What can you say for yourself when he calls you to account for receiving those things for sacrifices which he expressly ordered should be totally destroyed? For this disobedience you are condemned to lose your kingdom, and to be divested of that power which was providentially bestowed upon you in preference to the rest of mankind."

Samuel convicts Saul of rebellion against God.

Saul acknowledges the charge.

When Saul heard this he made a frank confession of his guilt; but apologized for the conduct of his followers, by saying, "That he was fearful, had he prohibited them from taking some of the spoil, they might have revolted, and himself been exposed to an enraged people. But (says Saul to Samuel) let me prevail on you to endeavour to obtain a pardon for me from God; and if you should succeed, and he will be pleased to grant your request, the future part of my life shall be spent in a strict observance of every religious duty, and in an inviolable attention to his most holy will." After saying this, Saul begged of Samuel, that, before he left him, he would sacrifice to God in his behalf. But Samuel, knowing it would be ineffectual, was going to retire, when Saul caught hold of his garment to detain him, and in the scuffle it was rent asunder. This circumstance was interpreted by Samuel as an omen, that Saul would lose his kingdom, and that it would be given to a man of piety and justice. "The sentence (says Samuel) is passed, and it is not with God as with men; for his decrees are unchangeable." Saul acknowledged his iniquity, and the justice of the punishment inflicted by Providence. He said, what he had committed could not be undone; and therefore begged Samuel to honour him before the elders of the people, and accompany him to worship God. The prophet yielded to this importunate request of Saul, and went with him to sacrifice; after which Samuel ordered Agag, the king of the Ammonites, to be brought before him. As soon as Agag appeared, he said, "Surely the bitterness of death is past." To which Samuel replied, "As thy sword has made women childless, so shall thy mother be childless among women." He then slew Agag with his own hands, and leaving Gilgal, went immediately to Ramah, the place of his residence.

Samuel interprets the rending of his garment.

Samuel says Agag to fulfil the Divine command.

This was the last interview between Samuel and Saul; the latter of whom, being sensible of his calamities, retired to his palace at Gibeah, and there spent his time in penitence and prayer.

(a) That is, God was no longer with him to prosper and guide him; but left him, as a punishment for his disobedience, to that evil, melancholy, jealous spirit, which afterwards seems never entirely to have left him: and this evil spirit of jealousy, hatred, and cruelty, will, in the nature of

CHAP. IX.

Saul having transgressed the Divine command, the kingdom is transferred, and David anointed and proclaimed privately.

SAMUEL was greatly afflicted for the fate of Saul: upon which God told him to grieve no longer, but to take an horn of oil, and go to Bethlehem, to Jesse, the son of Obed, and anoint one of his sons, whom he had appointed, and would discover to him, to be king over the Israelites. Samuel expressed his fears that, on executing this commission, Saul would seek his life; but the Almighty promising him security from all danger, he went to Bethlehem, where he was received by the people with the most expressive joy; and on being asked what was the cause of his coming thither, he answered, "To perform sacrifice."

Samuel God calls him to the feast.

The ceremony of the sacrifice being over, Samuel invited Jesse and his sons to partake of the feast; and as soon as he saw the eldest, who was remarkably handsome, he said within himself, "This is to be our king." But Samuel was mistaken; for on asking God whether he should anoint him, he received an answer to this effect: "God seeth not as man sees. Thou supposest him to be worthy of a kingdom from his outward appearance only; but such honours are not to be bestowed as due to the merit of a person's figure; they are to be given as a reward for the virtuous qualifications of the mind: wherefore look unto that man who is perfect in piety and justice, courage and meekness, virtues which truly constitute the beauties of the mind." On this Samuel ordered the other sons, who were six in number, to pass him, one by one: and consulting God, which was to be the person anointed, he was answered, neither. Samuel then asked Jesse if he had any more sons. He answered, he had one more, whose name was David, and that he was then looking after his sheep. Samuel ordered Jesse immediately to send for him, as they could not sit down to the feast unless he was present. David was accordingly sent for, and immediately obeyed the summons. As he had a majestic countenance, on the first sight of him Samuel argued with himself, this is the person God has appointed to be king. He then placed David next to himself, and Jesse, with the rest of his sons, in regular order after them. This being done, he took out the oil, and pouring it on David's head, said, "By this thou art informed, that God has been pleased to appoint thee king over the Israelites. I therefore strictly charge thee to do justice to the people, and be particularly careful to observe God's commandments. In doing this, thou shalt reign long and happy: thou shalt triumph over the Philistines, and be victorious in all encounters. You shall live great, and die memorable." Having said this Samuel departed, and the spirit of God passing from Saul to David (a), the latter was immediately possessed of the power of prophecy.

Samuel calls Jesse to the feast, and bids him bring his son before him.

The request for an excellent king.

The sons of Jesse pass in order of seniority before the prophet.

David, the request of the prophet is fulfilled, and anointed king.

David is inspired.

In the mean time Saul declined more and more in God's favour; and as he was naturally of a timorous and suspicious temper, an unhappy turn of mind grew upon him, which at length settled into a confirmed melancholy, of such a nature as to be frequently attended with violent perturbations, and sometimes with a phrenzy. To relieve him in this melancholy state, some of his courtiers advised music, as it would most likely lull his disturbed mind to rest. They recommended David, the son of Jesse, not only as a proper master of music, but likewise as a man possessed of the most distinguished accomplishments.

Saul is greatly affected.

things, banish every princely virtue, and introduce into the mind an almost perpetual gloom, and dispose those who are under the unhappy influence of it to the most unwarrantable and criminal excesses.

In consequence of this recommendation David was sent for to court; and as soon as Saul saw him he was greatly pleased with the beauty of his person. When he heard him exercise his skill on the harp, he was perfectly transported, insomuch, that it banished from him all uneasy and melancholy thoughts. In short, Saul conceived such a kindness for David for having cured him of his malady, that he made him one of his armour-bearers. When the king was better David returned to his brother, and attended his flocks.

CHAP. X.

The Philistines make another expedition against the Hebrews, in the reign of Saul. A single combat between Goliath and David, in consequence of a challenge from the former.

THE Philistines, having gathered together a considerable army, marched against the Israelites, and pitched their tents between Shechoth and Azekah. In consequence of this Saul drew out his men, and placing them on a mountain, obliged the Philistines to remove, and encamp themselves on another mountain opposite the Israelites, the valley between dividing the two armies.

While they were in this situation there came from the Philistines one Goliath, a citizen of Gath, a man remarkable for his prodigious stature, being no less than six cubits and a span high. He was dressed in armour, and his coat of mail weighed 5000 shekels. The head of his spear was iron, weighing 600 shekels; and he carried it on his shoulder. Thus accoutred did this mighty man march down the hill, attended by a troop of armed men; and placing himself in the middle of the valley, between the two armies, he thus addressed himself to the Israelites: Ye men of Israel, I am come hither to do "an office of humanity, by preventing the loss of many lives. Why should thousands perish, when the dispute may be determined between only two people? I offer myself as a champion for the Philistines: do you choose another for my opponent; and whoever conquers, the people belonging to him vanquished shall be subject to those of the conqueror." It is better to expose one than so many thousands." Having said this Goliath retired, but returned the next day, and repeated his challenge, which he continued to do forty days successively, the Israelites not knowing whom to choose for his antagonist.

In Saul's army were three of the sons of Jesse, to whom their father sent David their brother with necessities, and to bring him intelligence of the situation of the Hebrews. Soon after David arrived at the camp Goliath again appeared, and reproached the Hebrews with cowardice, saying, they had not a man in their army that dare look him in the face. David was so irritated at this, that he told his brother he would accept the challenge himself. But Eliab, the eldest, chastised him for his ridiculous presumption, and told him to go again to his father, and attend his sheep. Though David paid great respect to his brother, yet he could not help repeating what he had before said in the hearing of the soldiers; which being reported to the king, he sent for him, and asked him what he had to say relative to Goliath? David replied, "Great Prince, fear not: I am he who will take down the pride of this mighty boaster, and make your terrible enemy appear ridiculous when they shall behold him fall by the hand of an inexperienced boy." Saul stood amazed at the intrepidity of the youth, but did not think it prudent to try the issue on so unequal a match. David, finding Saul's diffidence, told him, the combat was not to be considered as a trial of skill between Goliath and him, but Goliath and God. "It is not (says he) my arm that will fight the battle, but the power of a gracious God, who frequently makes the weakest objects to be instruments of his Divine purposes. In that God I put my trust, and doubt not but he will protect me, however difficult the task in which I engage, having already experienced, in two instances, his

"Divine assistance. On a time, while I was attending my father's sheep, a lion suddenly came among the flock, and ran away with a lamb. I pursued the robber, and having come up with him, rescued the lamb, and put a period to the lion's existence. I had an encounter of the like nature with a bear, which proved equally successful. Now I doubt not but I shall do with this Philistine as I did with the lion and bear; that he shall no more bid defiance to the army of the Israelites, or reproach the living God, but that he shall fall a victim, by my means, through the Divine assistance, to his daring presumption."

From the manner in which this speech was delivered, Saul thought David's resolution arose not from presumptive courage, but Divine inspiration. He therefore said to him, "Go, and the Lord be with thee." After which he prepared David for the action, by dressing him in his own armour, and giving him his coat of mail, sword, and helmet. David, not having been accustomed to such arms, found them rather burthensome than useful, and told Saul they were much sifter for a prince than a shepherd; begging, at the same time, that he would permit him to throw them off, and take his own way. This being granted, David took his shepherd's staff, a sling and five smooth stones, and with these only he advanced towards his antagonist. When Goliath saw David he looked upon him with contempt, and, in a deriding manner, said, "Comest thou to fight a soldier or a dog?" To which David replied, "I come to fight neither; for thou art very unlike the first, and much worse than the last." This so exasperated Goliath, that he swore, by his gods, he would give David's flesh to the fowls of the air and the beasts of the field. David answered, "You come to me with a sword, a spear, and a coat of mail; but I come to you in the name of the Lord of Hosts, the God of the armies of Israel, whom you have defied. This day will the Lord deliver you into my hand; and I will smite you, and take your head from you, and give your carcass to the fowls of the air, and to the wild beasts of the earth, that all the world may know there is a God in Israel. The whole assembly shall see that the Lord saveth not with sword and spear. The battle is his, and he will deliver you into our hands."

Goliath advanced toward David with as much expedition as the weight of his armour would permit; at the same time intimating, by his gestures, the contemptible light in which he considered this almost defenceless adversary. David, putting his trust in the Almighty, hastened to meet him, and, when he thought himself at a proper distance, he took one of the stones, put it into his sling, and cast it at the Philistine. The stone went in such a direction as to strike him in the forehead, and that with such force, that he immediately fell prostrate on the ground. David seeing this ran directly to Goliath, and taking his sword from the sheath (not having any of his own) slew him, and cut off his head.

CHAP. XI.

Saul pursues and totally routs the army of the Philistines. Conceives an envy and jealousy against David, for his success in the combat. Endeavours to ensnare him by a plot.

WHEN the Philistines saw the fate of their champion, they were so chagrined that they immediately betook themselves to flight. The Israelites availed themselves of this circumstance, and pursuing the Philistines as far as the skirts of Gath, and the very gates of Ascalon, killed upwards of 30,000, besides wounding double the number. Saul, in his return, first pillaged their camp, and then set fire to it; and David carried the head of Goliath to his tent, and dedicated his sword to the Lord.

This distinguished conquest raised the reputation of David to the highest summit; but, at the same time, time, it procured him the mortal hatred of the king. On Saul's return from the victory, he was met by great numbers (a) of women out of every city, who congratulated him on his success with different sorts of musical instruments; some of them singing, Saul hath slain his thousands, and David his ten thousands.

Saul was so irritated at this superior compliment paid to David, that he grew jealous of him, fearful lest, in time, he might become so popular among the people as to injure him in the sovereignty. As the character David was then in, namely, that of armour-bearer, obliged him to be near the king, Saul removed him from this office, and made him captain over a thousand men. This, indeed, was a more advantageous office than that of armour-bearer; but Saul's bestowing it on David did not arise from respect to him; on the contrary, it was from a design against his life, as he intended to employ him in the most dangerous enterprises.

David, however, escaped the malicious designs of Saul; for, having God on his side, he proved successful in all his undertakings. He became not only universally beloved by the people, but also by those about the court: and such were the graces of his person, and so distinguished his conduct, that he particularly attracted the notice of Saul's daughter, who gave evident signs of her wishes to form with him a matrimonial alliance. Saul took no notice of his daughter's affection for David, but did not appear in the least averse to it, thinking to make this the means of producing an opportunity that might prove effectual in his design against David's life.

Saul promi-

After some consideration Saul hit upon a project for answering his purposes, which was, to make a proposition, that whoever brought him the heads of 600 Philistines, should have his daughter in marriage. He imagined that David, from his renowned courage, would not hesitate to accept this offer, and that the attempt would cost him his life. This he thought the most decent method of obtaining revenge on David; as it would look better to have him destroyed by the Philistines, than by his express orders.

Having formed this plan, Saul employed some of his domestics to sound David with respect to his affection for his daughter, and whether he would be willing to receive her in marriage. They told him he was beloved both by the king and people, and that it was Saul's desire he should become his son-in-law. "You, perhaps, (says David), may not think it any great matter to be the son-in-law of a mighty prince; but, under the circumstances of my quality and extraction, I am not vain enough even to think of such an honour."

When Saul's messengers told him what David had said, he sent them back with these instructions: "Tell him (says he) I desire neither money or presents: when I part with my daughter she shall be bestowed, not sold. I am determined to give her to a man, not renowned for his wealth, but his courage, and other virtuous accomplishments. Let him only bring me the heads of 600 Philistines, and they will be more acceptable to me than all the possessions of the world. On such a

(a) It was common, in ancient times, for the women to go out in order to meet the conquerors; and, on such occasions, they sang songs in praise of their valour. When they said that David killed his ten thousands, they meant that he had killed Goliath, who was so much esteemed among the Philistines, that his life was reckoned more valuable than the lives of ten thousand men.

(b) The conduct of Jonathan, not only in this affair, but also various others that succeeded, is highly meritorious. When his father ordered him to kill David, he disobeyed the command, and instead of being accessory to the murdering of him, pleaded his innocence and merit as reasons for being saved. He discovered to David his father's design, and fixed resolution of destroying him; in doing of which he neither acted inconsistent with his duty as a child, or to the allegiance he owed his father as a subject. He who knows of a conspiracy against an innocent person's life, and doth not discover it, or who kills such a one by another's instigation or command, is himself a murderer;

"man will I freely bestow my daughter, which will be an honour to her, and give me the most pleasing satisfaction."

David was so pleased with Saul's proposition (not suspecting but his intentions were honest, and only calculated to confirm a strict tie of friendship) that he did not consider the difficulty of the action, or how far it was likely to be practicable. He immediately set out with his army to meet the enemy, in order to execute what was desired, and to obtain the king's daughter in marriage. By the assistance and protection of God he succeeded in the undertaking; and having killed 600 Philistines, he cut off their heads, and brought them to the king, demanding him to perform the covenant made between them relative to his daughter. Saul would willingly have evaded the fulfilment of his promise; but thinking it might disclose the treachery of his heart, he at length complied, and gave David his daughter Michal to wife.

CHAP. XII.

Saul continues to lay snares for the life of David, which he escapes through the friendly offices of Jonathan.

THE alliance between Saul and David did not in the least mitigate the enmity of the former against the latter. He found that David grew daily more and more the favourite of the people; and thinking himself in danger while he lived, he formed the resolution of having him dispatched, and ordered Jonathan his son, with some of his most trusty servants, to perpetrate the horrid deed.

Jonathan was thunderstruck when he received these orders from his father. He loved David to his soul, and determined to pervert the base designs of the king. He accordingly hastened to David, and told him Saul's intentions, advising him, as he loved his life, immediately to retire. "In the mean time (says he) I will go to my father, and ask him the cause of the disgust he has taken against you, and endeavour, as far as lays in my power, to appease his wrath." David, knowing the fidelity of Jonathan, took his advice, and immediately departed.

Jonathan interposes with his father in behalf of David. Effects a reconciliation, and David's reinstatement in his former office.

EARLY the next morning Jonathan went to his father's apartment, and finding him in a pleasant humour, he took the opportunity of fulfilling the promise he had made to David. "Father, (says he), I cannot conceive (b) the reason of your having taken so great a dislike to David, as to issue orders for his death. Has he committed any offence for which thou thinkest he deserves to die? Was not thy life, in a great measure, preserved through his means; and have not the Philistines felt the force of his avenging arm? Did he not vindicate the honour of our and no duty to a father, or allegiance to a prince, can oblige any one to shed innocent blood. Jonathan was therefore so far from acting contrary to his duty and allegiance, in refusing to become his father's instrument in murdering David, that he gave a noble instance of filial piety, affection, and duty, in his repeated endeavours to preserve him from so unnatural and atrocious a crime; and humanity and virtue will ever applaud him for the generous concern he expressed for the honour of his father, and the preservation of his friend. It is to be observed, that Jonathan ever considers David as an innocent person, and pleads for him to his father, not as a rebel, or notorious offender, to obtain his pardon, but as a person having never done any thing to forfeit Saul's favour, or lose his own life: and therefore Jonathan must be commended in disobeying his father's orders, and doing all that laid in his power to avert Saul's designs of taking away David's life.

clines, upon oath, his designs against the life of David.

This forcible speech made such an impression on Saul, that he bound himself, by oath, never to do any thing more to the injury of David secretly.

Jonathan, as soon as possible, hastened with the welcome news to David, told him the particulars of all that had passed, and assured him he need not be afraid, for his father had made a solemn vow never to do him the least injury. He then took David with him to court, and presenting him to the king, ■ seeming reconciliation took place, and David was reinstated in his office.

CHAP. XIV.

Saul, still jealous of David, tries various means to take away his life; but he escapes, and flies to the prophet Samuel. Jonathan forms a league of friendship with David, for which he incurs his father's displeasure. David goes to the city of Nob, and receives protection from Abimelech, the high-priest. THE Philistines, having again made war against the Israelites, and brought into the field a very considerable army, Saul ordered David to march with all expedition to give them battle. David obeyed the king's order, and meeting the Philistines, he fell on them, and obtained a total defeat, the greatest part being slain, and the remainder put to flight.

and jealousy

Pleased with this success, David hastened to communicate (as he thought) the agreeable news to the king. But Saul, instead of expressing his satisfaction at the victory, was highly jealous of David's increasing reputation, and imagined that what tended to his honour must be prejudicial to himself. He forgot the obligations he was under to David, and the vow he had so lately made not to injure him. Pride and enmity proved predominant over reason, justice, and gratitude; and he again determined to take away the life of David.

Saul enters your, with his own hand, to kill David.

Saul being one day attacked with a fit of his old disorder the phrensy, he sent for David to play on the harp to him. David accordingly obeyed, but, while he was tuning the instrument, Saul suddenly arose, and taking up a javelin, threw it with all his might at David. The javelin luckily missed him, and stuck in the wall; upon which David hastily left the room, and ran to his own house, where he continued the remainder of the day.

In the mean time Saul sent messengers, with a body of his guards, to watch David's house, and to prevent his making his escape, ordering them, as soon as it was day-light, to seize and bring him with them, for that he should suffer death as a common criminal.

Michal, David's wife, being apprised of the king's intentions, told her husband the danger he was in, and that if he did not make his escape before morning, he would certainly be a dead man. David readily took his wife's advice, and, after embracing each other in the most tender manner, she let him down, by the assistance of a rope, from a back window of the house, and not being perceived by the guard, he made his escape.

As soon as David was departed, Michal made up the bed in such a manner that it appeared to contain a sick person; and to make the deception greater, she placed beneath the covering the liver of a goat she had slain for the purpose. Early in the morning, when the messengers asked for David, she told them he was sick, and had been restless all the night. The messengers seeming to doubt her word she took them up stairs, and they being deceived by the motion arising from the liver, appeared satisfied, left her, and returned to relate the particulars to the king.

Saul, fired with indignation, ordered the messengers immediately to return, and bring David in whatever situation they found him; for he was determined he should be put to death. The messengers accordingly returned, and, on removing the bed-clothes in search of David, discovered the deception, and that the motion of the clothes, which resembled the palpitation of the heart, was occasioned by the warm liver of the goat.

When the messengers returned to Saul and told him the trick that had been played on them by Michal, he sent for her, and upbraided her for her conduct: but she excused herself by saying, she did it through fear, as David had threatened her life: that it was not done from choice, but necessity; and that she thought he was not so anxious for the destruction of David as he was for the preservation of his daughter's life. Saul admitted this excuse, forgave Michal, and restored her to his favour.

In the mean time David went to the prophet Samuel at Ramah, to whom he related all the snares that had been laid for him by Saul, and the manner in which he had made his escape. He told Samuel he was not conscious of having committed the least offence; that he had always behaved himself to the king as became a dutiful subject; that, by the assistance of God, he had repeatedly conquered his enemies; and this, he feared, was the only cause of the king's displeasure.

Samuel, being informed of the unjust proceedings of Saul, left Ramah, and taking David with him, went to a place called Galbaath, (in the scripture Naioth), where they resided together for some time.

When Saul understood where David was, and with whom, he dispatched a body of men to Galbaath, with orders to seize David, and bring him immediately to the palace. But when they came to Galbaath, where Samuel was teaching and instructing the young prophets, they were seized with the spirit of prophecy, and could not return. In consequence of this Saul sent other messengers, and after them others again; but no sooner did they come near the place than they were all affected in like manner. Saul, at length, impatient of these delays, went himself; but as he drew near the place, the spirit of prophecy seized him also, so that he went along prophesying till he came to the spot where Samuel and David were, and then, taking off his upper garment, he lay (as it were in an extasy) on the ground all that day and the following night.

David took this opportunity of making a private visit to his friend Jonathan, with whom he expostulated on the unkind behaviour of his father, when he had committed no manner of injury or injustice against him. Jonathan told him not to judge rashly, nor to place too much confidence in the tales of other men; that he was sure, if his father meant him any harm, he would have made him privy to his intentions; and, had that been the case, he he should certainly have told him of it, and put him on his guard. David then affirmed, with an oath, what he had said relative to Saul's unkindness, and told Jonathan not to be too credulous where the life of his friend was at stake. "It is not (says he) to be supposed that the king, who knows the friendship subsisting between us, should ever communicate to either a design he may have on the life of the other."

Jonathan is convinced of Saul's hatred to David.

A consultation between David and Jonathan.

This weighty argument greatly affected Jonathan, who begged of David that he would make his mind as easy as possible; "For (says he) whatever services are in my power to do, you may readily command." To this David replied, "I am very sensible of your good-will and readiness to serve me. Now to-morrow their will be a new moon, and consequently a festival. At such times, you know it has been customary for me to sit at meat with the king; but, if you think well of it, I will go out of the city, and secrete myself in some private place in the fields, where you may come to me when convenient. If the king asks for me, tell him I am gone to Bethlehem to celebrate the day with my own tribe, and that I had your permission. If he speaks kindly, take it for certain he has no malice in his heart against me; but if otherwise, depend upon it he bears me a grudge. Fail not to communicate to me the issue with all expedition, as you value the sacred and mutual league of friendship formed between us."

Jonathan promised David he would do everything he desired, and that, if he found his father had any plot against him, he would be sure to give him timely notice. He sealed this declaration with an oath, that he would leave nothing unattempted, which might conduce to his preservation. "That God (says he) looking up to heaven, who saw all things, and is omnipresent, knows the utmost secrets of my heart: and here I call that God to witness the covenant I make with thee, that I will never give over searching into the private deliberations and purposes of my father, till I have discovered the bottom of his heart; and when I have done this, whether it be for or against thee, I will not lose a moment till I have informed thee of it. God himself knows how earnestly I have prayed to him for your safety. That God is with thee, and will not forsake thee; but (whether my father Saul or myself should prove thy enemy) will keep thee safe and unhurt. Remember the things I have now told thee; and if it should be my fate to suffer death for pleading in your behalf, do you supply my place, and acknowledge my services, by being a father to my children."

Jonathan and David enter into a covenant of amity.

Having said this, Jonathan desired David to retire to the corner of a certain field; and when he had done the business he had promised, he would immediately come to him, and make known the issue by certain tokens. "I will come (says he) attended by a boy, and as soon as I enter the field, will shoot three arrows. If you see the boy take them up, and bring them to me, set your heart at rest, that all is well; but if not, take it for granted you are in danger. However, be assured of this, that happen as it may, it shall be my particular care you come to no harm I can prevent." Having said this, they embraced each other, and David departed to the spot agreed on for his concealment.

A private token settled between the two sworn friends.

The next day, which was the feast of the moon, Saul purified himself according to custom, and sat down to meat, Jonathan his son being placed on his right hand, and Abner, his captain-general, on the left; but the seat of David was left vacant. Saul took no notice of his absence the first day, supposing he might not be properly circumstanced for attending (a); but missing him the second day, he sternly asked Jonathan what occasioned the son of Jesse (b) to be absent from the feast two days together? Jonathan told him, he had given him leave to go to Bethlehem, to feast with his own tribe on the occasion; that David had entreated his company, and, as he knew the friendship he had for him, if he pleased he would follow him. This expression touched Saul to the quick; and being no longer able to conceal his hatred against David, he fell into a violent passion, called Jonathan a traitor, and an enemy; an abettor of, and confederate with, David; and that he was a conspirator against his own family. "He must be blind (says he) who cannot see that myself and kingdom are in the most imminent danger while David lives. I command thee, therefore, immediately to send for him, that he may be brought to justice." Jonathan, in a very cool and respectful manner, begged his father to tell him what capital crime David had committed; for that he had never known him guilty of the least disobedience. This question threw Saul into such a rage, that he immediately snatched up a javelin, and would certainly have sacrificed Jonathan to his resentment, had he not been prevented by some of his friends then present.

Saul here, affected with his son's forsaking him, good-will to David.

In rage, he attempts to slay Jonathan.

This violent outrage convinced Jonathan of his father's hatred to David, and that he was determined to put a period to his life. He quitted the company as soon as possible, and retiring to his chamber, spent the whole night in prayer and supplication for the safety of his friend. Early the next morning he took his bow and arrows, and, attended by a boy, went into the fields, under pretence of shooting, but, in reality, to discover to David the disposition of his father, as had been before agreed. He conveyed the first intelligence by leaving the armour on the ground; after which he sent the lad back to the city, that he might have the opportunity of going to David, and informing him of all that had passed. As soon as Jonathan came near to David, the latter fell prostrate at his feet, and called him his mighty preserver. Jonathan immediately raised him from the ground, and, after embracing him, with tears, he told him all that had passed between him and his father; that he was implacable, and determined to destroy him; and therefore he advised him to make his escape as fast as possible. They then made fresh protestations to each other of perpetual friendship; and having again embraced, Jonathan left him, with fervent prayers that the Divine protection might accompany him wherever he went.

Jonathan puts in motion the scheme between him and David.

David, knowing the necessity there was for attending to the advice of Jonathan, left the place of his retirement, and went to Nob (c), where, at that time, stood the tabernacle, and where Ahimelech was high-priest. Not having any attendants with him, Ahimelech took notice of it, and asked him the reason (d). David told him, he was come on very particular business, at the express order of the king; that, as it was of a private nature, he had, for the present, discharged his train; but that they were to meet him at a certain time and place he had appointed. He then told Ahimelech he was greatly distressed for necessaries to prosecute his journey, and that he should consider it as the most friendly office if he would supply him with such as he wanted. This request the high-priest cheerfully granted; upon which David told him he would greatly increase the obligation, if he would furnish him

Sam. xiv. David repairs to Ahimelech, the high priest.

(a) It is probable that Saul imagined something had happened to David by which he had been polluted; such as the touching a dead body, in which case it would not have been proper for him to attend on this occasion.

(b) Saul's calling David the son of Jesse, was spoke by way of derision, thereby intimating to those who were present, that he despised him for the meanness of his birth.

(c) The city of Nob belonged to the tribe of Benjamin, and was situated about four leagues from Gibeon, not far from Anathoth. It was in the north part of the sacerdotal cities; and it is probable that Saul ordered the tabernacle to be removed from Shiloh to this place.

(d) From the whole of this affair it is evident that Ahimelech knew nothing of the circumstances of David. He was insensible of Saul's displeasure against him, or of his determined resolution to destroy him; and, therefore, as he was the king's son-in-law, he was surprized to see him without any attendants.

with a sword, or spear, and some pieces of arms. The high-priest said, he had no other arms than the sword that killed Goliath, which was hung up, and dedicated to God; and if he chose to accept that, it was at his service. (An unfavourable circumstance attended this conversation between David and Ahimelech, for there happened to be within hearing a servant of Saul's, named Doeg, who was Syrian by birth, and enjoyed the office of groom to the king.)

David, being provided with necessaries for a journey, and having with him the sword of Goliath, left Nob, and went to the city of Gath, belonging to Achish, king of the Philistines. He had not been long here before he was discovered, and the king informed of his being the person who had so often defeated and destroyed the Philistines. In consequence of this information David was taken before Achish, when, to avoid the danger that threatened him, he feigned madness and an epilepsy, which he did in so artful a manner, that the king, after rebuking the officers, ordered him to be discharged.

The next day David left Gath, and took up his residence in a cave near Adullam, a town belonging to the tribe of Judah. His friends and relations, hearing where he was, came flocking to him, together with many malcontents, and men of desperate fortunes; the whole amounting to about four hundred.

This junction was very acceptable to David: but his mind was greatly distressed on account of his aged parents, whom he feared would fall victims to the rage of Saul. He therefore applied to the king of Moab, beseeching him to take them under his protection. The king readily complied with his request, received them with great cordiality, and treated them with distinguished respect.

David continued, with his little army, in the cave for some time; till at length he was advised, by the prophet Gad, who attended him, to return to the land of Judah; which he accordingly did, and took up his station in the forest of Hareth.

Saul, being informed of David's situation, and the number of men he had with him, was greatly alarmed. He knew his natural intrepidity, and was fearful of the consequences. He therefore convened an assembly of his friends, captains, and the tribe to which he belonged, at Gibeah; who being met, he addressed them as follows: "Ye men of Benjamin (says he) ye cannot be insensible of the many good offices I have done you; and that through my means many of you have been advanced to the highest posts of honour. Wherefore, I now ask, whether ye expect greater favours from the hands of the son of Jesse than ye have received from me? I am informed that ye are all ready to revolt to him; and that ye are countenanced in your conduct by my son Jonathan. I am no stranger to the solemn league and confederacy between him and David; nor of his abetting the cause of my adversaries with his power, interest, and council. Let me intreat you not to listen to his advice, nor to suffer any of his persuasions to direct your conduct; but be good subjects, and you shall find in me a firm protector."

As soon as Saul had finished his speech, Doeg, the groom (who overheard all that passed between David and Ahimelech at Nob) arose, and related the following particulars: "When (says he) I went to Ahimelech, the high-priest, in the city of Nob, I saw David, who had come thither to consult the oracle. Ahimelech furnished him with conveniences for his journey, and, as an instrument of defence, gave him the sword with which he had slain Goliath."

In consequence of this declaration, Saul immediately sent for Ahimelech, and ordered that all his relations should be brought with him. When the high-priest arrived, Saul addressed him as follows: "What evil or bad usage (says he) hast thou received at my hands, that thou shouldest entertain the son of Jesse, to whom thou not only gavest victuals, but armour, to enable him to lie in wait for my kingdom. Thou well knowest that he hath secretly withdrawn himself from me, to avoid that punishment his treacherous conduct justly merits."

Ahimelech did not attempt to deny the charge, but frankly confessed he had supplied David with the articles mentioned. "I did it (says he) not to gain his esteem, but to promote your service. I did not receive him as your enemy, but as the faithfullest of your friends and officers; and what is still more, as the son-in-law of a great sovereign. How should I imagine him to be your enemy on whom you have conferred the most distinguished honours? It was more reasonable for me to suppose him one of your dearest friends. If he consulted me about the will of God, it is not the first time he has done it, nor the first time I have given him an answer. He told me he came from you on business of the most important nature; and if I had not relieved his wants, it would have been an indignity to you more than to him. Wherefore I beseech you not to blame me, even though you should find David guilty as you suspect. The service I did him was a matter of respect to the king's son-in-law, and the king's military officer, not to the person or interest of David."

The endeavours of Ahimelech to justify his conduct to David availed little with Saul, who, as soon as he had finished, ordered him and all his family to be put to the sword. The guards, who stood by, and heard the high-priest's defence, refused to execute the royal orders, thinking it an act of the most sacrilegious nature. In consequence of this the king commissioned Doeg, Ahimelech's accuser, to perform the bloody deed. He made not the least hesitation to execute the royal commands, but, beginning with Ahimelech, slew him and his family, the whole amounting to 385 persons. Not satisfied with this, Saul dispatched a party to the city of Nob, with orders to put to the sword every creature they found, and afterwards to burn the city to the ground. Thus was fulfilled what had been foretold by God to Eli, the high-priest, namely, that his posterity should be destroyed for the abominable impieties of his two sons.

The enormous cruelty of Saul, in extirpating the sacerdotal race, putting to death both old and young, without either pity for the one, or reverence for the other; the destroying a city God himself had honoured with a peculiar privilege, by setting it apart as a nursery for priests and prophets: these inhuman violences, I say, display the natural corruptness of Saul's heart, and point him out to us in his just colours. While men are low, poor, subject to laws and penalties, and, in truth, under the necessity of appearing honest for want of power to be wicked, how temperate, just, humane, nay, how religious, do they pretend to be! they live as if they acknowledged a Providence, and believed the omnipresence of an all-seeing God: but no sooner do they come to an advanced station, than they become quite different creatures: like actors on the stage, they lay aside their manner with their dress, and change both the scene and the person. They grow proud and imperious, and pay no respect either to God or man. Instead of being pious, and administering that justice which alone can secure them from detraction, they live and act as if either God knew not what they did, or as if their elevation placed them above the reach of Divine justice. When this arrogant vanity is on the wing, what confusion ensues! They govern by passion, not reason: they unjustly take umbrage at some, and bestow their favours with partiality to others. They endeavour to make the world believe their conduct is directed by the will of heaven, though, at the same time, they have not the least thought of futurity. Those who have done them any signal services they compliment with honours and rewards but then it is in the power of any base incendiary not only to divert them of their dignities, but also their lives; and all this without trial, or even examination. This tyranny does not so much affect the real guilty, who deserve punishment, as it does those who frequently suffer on the most erroneous accusations (a).

It is remarkable, that the same person, who was the first king of the Hebrews after the dissolution of the aristocracy, and taking the administration out of the hands of the judges. On a bare suspicion of some injury done him by Ahimelech, he not only caused him, together with more than three hundred priests and prophets, to be put to death, but also their city to be reduced to ashes, and the place, which contained the tabernacle of God, to be rendered desolate.

The difference thus stated between a low and elevated situation, in the same person, is evidently manifested in Saul, the son of Kish, who was the first king of the Hebrews after the dissolution of the aristocracy, and taking the administration out of the hands of the judges. On a bare suspicion of some injury done him by Ahimelech, he not only caused him, together with more than three hundred priests and prophets, to be put to death, but also their city to be reduced to ashes, and the place, which contained the tabernacle of God, to be rendered desolate.

Saul's intentions were totally to extirpate the family of Ahimelech; but it happened that one of his sons, named Abiathar, fortunately escaped, and fled to David, to whom he related all the particulars relative to his father, and the destruction of his kindred. David was greatly afflicted when he heard of Saul's cruelty, and the more so, as he considered himself, in some measure, the innocent occasion of it. "I thought (says David) when I saw Doeg at your father's house, he would be calumniated before Saul, and am sorry to find my conjectures were too well founded. I lament that so melancholy a circumstance should have taken place on my account; but fear not, Abiathar, place yourself under my protection, and I will shield you from all danger."

The Philistines renew their revenge on the territories of the Israelites.

While Saul was embruing his hands in the blood of his innocent subjects, David was employing his arms in the necessary defence of his country; for, hearing the Philistines had made an incursion upon Keilah, a city of Judah, he went and retrieved the place, repelled the enemy with a great loss of men, and took from them a considerable booty in cattle.

The news of this action soon reached the ears of Saul, who, supposing David would fortify himself in the town, sent an army to invest it. In the mean time David, having consulted the Divine Oracle (b), and being informed that the inhabitants of the place would prove perfidious to him, he left it before the arrival of Saul's army, and retired, with his men, to a wood in the deserts of Ziph (c).

David consults the Divine will. Jonathan goes to David.

Renewal of the covenant of amity between them.

Saul, not knowing whither David had fled, could not pursue him; but Jonathan, his son, having received private intelligence, immediately repaired to him, and gave him all the comfort and encouragement he could. He assured him his father's malice could never reach him; that he doubted not but the time would come when he should see him king of Israel; but that he must consider such blessings were not to be obtained without toil and hazard. They then renewed the league of friendship between them, and, after embracing each other, parted.

The inhabitants of Ziph were very officious in sending intelligence to Saul where David was, and told him, if he would supply them with a proper

(a) This paragraph (says a celebrated writer) contains an admirable reflection of Josephus concerning the general wickedness of men in great authority, and the danger they are in of rejecting that regard to justice and humanity, to Divine Providence and the fear of God, which they either really had, or pretended to have, while they were in a lower condition. It can never be too often perused by kings and great men, nor by those who expect to obtain such elevated dignities among mankind.

(b) This was one of the most noble adventures of David's life, and perhaps the most extraordinary of any recorded in history. Another man, in David's place, would have rejoiced at this invasion, and perhaps encouraged it; and this both from self-preservation and policy. First, because he had nothing to fear for himself, while Saul had to his enemies upon his hands; and, secondly, because the districts of his country was the like-force, they would engage to deliver him into his hands. Saul thanked them for the intelligence, and immediately sent a body of men to assist them in the execution of their intentions, resolving soon to follow with his whole army. David, being apprized of the conspiracy of the Ziphites, baffled all their schemes, by retiring, with great precipitation, to a rock in the wilderness of Maon.

The inhabitants of Ziph give intelligence to Saul of David.

Saul, having received intelligence whither David had retired, marched against him, and pressed him so close, that the two armies were only separated by a narrow valley. Saul's intention was, to encompass the army of David, in order to prevent their escape; but before he could carry this design into execution, news was brought that the Philistines had broken in upon the Hebrews, and were ravaging their country: so that Saul was forced to drop his private resentment for the public good, and to divert his arms another way. David, having thus escaped the danger that surrounded him, left the rock, and took shelter, with his army, in the wilderness of Engedi.

An insurrection of the Philistines diverts Saul from pursuing David.

In the mean time Saul, having defeated the Philistines, and received intelligence where David had retired, selected 3000 of his choicest men, and marched against him with the greatest expedition. David and his men had concealed themselves in a cave, which was very deep and wide, and extended a considerable distance in length. It happened that when Saul came to this cave, he had occasion to give a loose to nature, and, not suspecting that the place was inhabited, retired from his army, and went into it for that purpose. One of David's men seeing Saul, and knowing him, communicated the intelligence to David, telling him, he had now the opportunity of a glorious revenge, by cutting off the head of his mortal enemy, for that God had delivered Saul into his hands. But David rejected the proposition with abhorrence, saying, "God forbid I should stretch forth my hands against the Lord's anointed;" and only (to shew Saul how much he was in his power) went softly, and cut off the skirt of his upper garment.

After Saul had overcome the Philistines, he resumed his pursuit of David.

Saul falls into the hands of David, and nobly suppresses his resentment and spurs his life.

When Saul was gone out of the cave, David followed, and called after him. The king, well knowing the voice, turned about, when David, with great reverence and respect, addressed him in words to this effect: "What an unhappy thing it is, when a great prince so listens to the tongues of calumniators and detractors, as to suspect the integrity of his tried and most faithful friends! It certainly would be much more laudable to judge every man by his works. Words may be false as well as true: but demonstration by fact is infallible. Believe me, great king, when I tell you I am a well-wisher both to you and to your family, and yet you make it your constant business to endeavour to seek my life. How can you excuse yourself to God for committing so enormous a wickedness to desire the death of a person, who this very day had it in his power to revenge himself by depriving you of your existence? I could as easily have taken your head from your shoulders, as this piece of stuff from your mantle, (shewing the skirt he had cut off); but I had not the heart to commit so vindictive an act; while you, at the same time, without the least scruple of conscience, liek means to bring Saul to reason, and force him to recall, and be reconciled to, his best companion. But David was governed by other than these narrow views; nor safety nor honour were desirable to him, purchased by the distress of his country and his friends. His holom heart with an earnest desire to relieve Keilah; but it was not an adventure to be unadvisedly undertaken; and therefore we are assured, that he enquired of God, saying, "Shall I go and smite these Philistines?" None but an hero could put the question, and none but God could solve it. And the Lord said unto David, "Go, and smite the Philistines, and save Keilah."

"ence, pursue me with ■ most injurious persecution. But let God judge between us; and, if I have done any thing, either in thought or deed, to your detriment, let me be punished as I deserve."

The graceful and modest manner in which David delivered his speech, and the circumstance of his sparing the king's life when he had it in his power to take it away, made such an impression on Saul, that he fetched a deep sigh, which being answered by David, the king said, "Such lamentations better become me than you. Thou hast been the author of many good things to me, but I of many calamities to thee. You have convinced me, by your conduct, that you are not degenerated from the goodness of your ancestors, who, when they had their enemies in their power, refused to take advantage of it, by giving them their lives and liberty. From the transactions of this day it appears manifestly evident that you are designed by God as the ruler over this kingdom, and that the whole nation of the Israelites will be subject to your government. Wherefore I have this request to make, that you will promise, on oath, to forgive all the injuries I have done you; and that, when you come to be possessed of your government, you will be merciful to my family."

Saul having obtained this request, returned home; but David, not choosing to trust to his fair words, kept himself close in the fastnesses of the hills.

About this time died the prophet Samuel, ■ man universally respected by the Hebrews for his probity and virtue. He was buried at Ramah (a); and the people testified their respect for him by mourning more than the usual time, and celebrating his funeral rites with the most distinguished pomp. While he lived his actions declared him born to execute justice, which he adhered to, in every circumstance of life, with an impartial hand; and on that account was particularly beloved of God (b). He died in the 98th year of his age; twelve of which he governed alone, and eighteen in conjunction with Saul.

During the time of lamentation for Samuel, David removed from Engedi, and retired farther into the wilderness of Paran, not far from Maon, where he had once before taken up his residence.

In the neighbourhood of this place lived a person named Nabal, a man naturally of a very savage and morose disposition. While David abode in this part of the country before, he had taken great care to restrain his men from doing any injury to Nabal's flocks; and it being now the time of sheep-shearing (which was always a season of great festivity and entertainment) he sent messengers to him, requesting that, in consideration of the many civilities he had shewn him, he would be pleased to send some provisions for the support of his army. Nabal received the messengers in a very abrupt manner; and, with some opprobrious reflections on David himself, sent them away empty. This treatment so exasperated David, that, in the heat of his resentment, he vowed he would destroy all Nabal's family before the next morning. But he was prevented from executing his design by means of Abigail, Nabal's wife, (a very beautiful woman, and, in temper, quite the reverse of her husband), who, being informed of what had passed, took the following expedient to divert David's resentment a-against her husband. She ordered her servants to pack up two hundred loaves of bread, two bottles of wine (c), five sheep ready dressed, five measures of parched corn, an hundred clusters of raisins, and two hundred cakes of figs. With these articles, placed on asses, Abigail hastened to meet David, who was marching with all speed, accompanied by four hundred of his men, (the number being now increased to six hundred, two of which he left behind to take care of the baggage), to put in execution his rash vow. As soon as Abigail saw David she threw herself prostrate on the ground, and besought him to pass over the words of her husband, he being a man whose name was suited to his nature; (Nabal, in the Hebrew language, signifying a fool or madman.) She said, she saw not the messengers that came, begged pardon for what had happened, and desired David to give God thanks for sending her as the instrument to keep his hands from being stained with blood. "Be pleased, Sir," (said she) I beseech you, to accept of the goodwill of your poor servant, with these small presents, and, upon my humble request, to pass over the offence of my husband, who has so justly incurred your displeasure; for there is nothing so well becoming the character of the person who is designed for a crown as clemency and compassion."

The very feeling manner in which Abigail addressed herself to David so wrought upon him, that he accepted the presents. His indignation was totally laid aside, and they both parted with mutual satisfaction: he, for being thus prevented from shedding blood; and she, for having thus happily succeeded in her embassy.

When Abigail arrived at her home she found her husband rioting and drinking; so that she deferred telling him what had passed till the next morning. But when he came to understand the danger to which he had been exposed he was so terrified at the thoughts of it, that he suddenly became quite stupid; and continued in that state for ten days, when he gave up the ghost.

David, hearing of Nabal's decease, sent for Abigail; and married her; as he did also another woman, whose name was Ahinoam, a Jezreelite: for his first wife, Michal, had been some time given by Saul to Phalti, the son of Laish, of Gallim.

Some time after this the Zephites (who were professed enemies to David) gave information to Saul of the place where he and his men were concealed; in consequence of which (notwithstanding the solemn promises Saul had made not to do any thing in future to the injury of David) he headed 3000 men; and, marching with all expedition against him, pitched his tents on the mountains of Hachilah.

David having received intelligence where Saul's army lay encamped, went first privately himself to reconnoitre it. On the evening of the same day he went again, taking with him his nephew, Abishai, and Ahimelech, the Hittite; who, on their arrival at the camp, found Saul in his tent, with his general Abner, and the guards about him, all fast asleep. Abishai, seeing the king in his bed, and his spear by him, would willingly have dispatched him; but David restrained his hands, saying, "He is God's king, and therefore only accountable to him for his misdeeds. But, (says he), that he may be they be understood of such bottles as are now commonly in use with us: But, in these eastern countries, they used to carry and keep their wine and water in leathern vessels made on purpose to hold liquids, which vessels they called bottles. Such were the bottles brought by the Gibeonites to Joshua's camp, which they said were worn out, and torn, in their pretended long journey. See Josh. ix. 13. And of such as those it is not unlikely Our Saviour speaks, Matth. ix. 17; where, in the marginal note of our old Bible, bottles are explained by bags of leather, wherein wine was carried on asses or camels. And that two such vessels as these might hold a quantity of wine proportionable to the rest of the present which Abigail took with her, is not to be disputed.

(a) In the time of the emperor Arcadius his remains were removed to Constantinople, and (as St. Jerome informs us) received, both by the clergy and laity, with joy unspeakable, and honours almost infinite.

(b) A late learned writer, in describing the character of Samuel, says, "He was, indeed, while he lived, an excellent governor, and, through his whole administration, above vanity, corruption, or any private views. Those that attend to his life may observe, that he was modest without meanness, mild without weakness, firm without obstinacy, and severe without rashness."

(c) It will, at first view, appear obvious that what is called two bottles of wine could bear no proportion to the other parts of the present, nor answer the exigencies of David's army, if convinced how much he was in my power, I will take with me his spear, and the pitcher of water from his bed-side." Having done this they immediately left the tent; and when David had got at such a distance as to be distinctly heard, he called aloud unto Abner, who, waking, and desiring to know who was the person that called, was answered, "It is David, the son of Jesse:" after which he thus ironically upbraided Abner: "Are not you (said he) a very proper person to be the favourite of a great prince, the general of his army, and the protector of his royal person; and, under all these obligations, to lie stretching yourself at ease, when your master's life is in danger? Can you tell what is become of the king's spear, and the pitcher of water that were this night taken by the enemy out of his tent, and from his very bed-side, without you or your guards knowing any thing of the matter? Whether this arose from neglect or treachery is immaterial; for which ever it was, thou deservest death."

Saul, hearing the voice of David, came out of his tent, and understanding the great danger he had been in, and that his life was in the hands of the very person he meant to destroy, he was so sensible of the goodness of David, that he gave him public thanks for his life. He accused himself of cruelty, applauded David's generosity, confessed his guilt, and promised, for the future, never to make any farther attempts on his life.

When Saul had done speaking, David desired him to send some person for his spear and the pitcher of water; after which he called upon God to judge betwixt them, and to bear him witness, that, when he took them from Saul's bed-side, he could with as much ease have deprived him of his existence.

Saul now returned home with his army; soon after which David, knowing the instability of his temper, and how impossible it was for him to live in safety while he continued in his dominions, determined to go over to the Philistines. Accordingly, having obtained from Achish, king of Gath, a safe conduct for himself and men, he lived for some time in the royal city; but not liking his accommodation, and growing more and more in favour of Achish, he obtained from him a town called Ziglag, which the king gave to him and his heirs for ever.

He made great presents to the king, who asked him from whence he had obtained them; to which David replied, from the southerly parts of Judah. This gave great satisfaction to Achish, who imagined, that whilst David abode in his territories, and continued to commit hostilities against his own nation, he would become his most trusty and faithful servant.

pare themselves on the occasion, and to assemble forthwith at Shunem, the place designed for the general meeting of the army. In consequence of this resolution Achish acquainted David with his intentions of taking him and his men with him to assist him against the Israelites. This declaration was far from being displeasing to David, who answered, he was ready to perform the duty he owed him; and farther said, he hoped the time was now come when he should be able, in some measure, to make a return for the great services he had received at his hands. To which Achish replied, "If we succeed in this battle, I promise to invest thee with all the honours it is in my power to bestow."

Saul, having received intelligence that the Philistines were advanced as far as Shunem, and had encamped on the plain there, marched with his forces against them, and pitched his tents near the mountain of Gilboa, directly opposite the camp of the enemy. Having in this place a full view of the army of the Philistines, and finding them much more numerous, and in better order than his own, Saul began to despair of success; but his heart quite misgave him, when he found, on application to God, that he would not be consulted by him, nor give him any instructions in what manner to act.

Some time before this Saul had banished all diviners, and such as dealt with familiar spirits, out of the nation; but being now in the utmost perplexity, he was resolved to consult some person of this profession, in order to know what would be the issue of the war. At a place called Endor, about three leagues from Mount Gilboa, he was told there lived a witch, or sorceress; upon which, disguising himself, and taking but two servants with him to avoid suspicion, he went to the woman by night, and desired her to use her skill in calling upon the ghost of such a person as he should name. The woman at first refused, saying, if it was known, she should be infallibly ruined. But Saul assuring her, with the most bitter imprecations, that no mortal should ever know a syllable that passed between them, she at length consented: upon which Saul desired her to raise up the ghost of Samuel; and, on her complying with his request, a phantom immediately appeared. From this spectre the woman learnt it was Saul who had employed her: and Saul, when he saw it, knowing it to be the figure of Samuel, bowed his face to the ground. The apparition spoke first, and demanded of Saul the reason why he had raised him from the dead. Saul replied, that the Philistines, with a powerful army, had invaded him, and that, in his distress, God had forsaken him, and would give no answer which ever way he consulted him. The spirit answered, that, for his disobedience in not destroying the Amalekites, God had taken away the kingdom from his family, and given it to David; and that, as to the fate of the war, the Philistines, the next day, should rout his army, and he and his sons fall in the battle.

When he had a little recovered himself, the woman entreated him to taste some kind of sustenance, saying, she desired no other reward for the danger in which she had placed herself, than the opportunity of enabling him to return to his army. After many importunities Saul was at length prevailed on to accept the woman's offer; upon which she immediately killed a young calf (the only companion of her solitary life) and having properly prepared the flesh, set it before Saul and his attendants, who, after eating thereof, returned that night to the camp.

The APPARITION of SAMUEL raised by the WITCH of ENDOR at the request of King Saul.

Josephus commends the liberal behaviour of the woman.

It is but justice due to this poor woman, that we should here take some notice of her distinguished liberality towards Saul. She had been greatly injured by the king, in being restrained from the practice of that art whereby she comfortably maintained herself and family. He came to her as a mere stranger, and requested her advice by methods himself had prohibited; when, notwithstanding the danger she was in, she complied with his request. She likewise treated him in the most hospitable manner her circumstances would permit, and all this without the least expectation of any future reward; for she knew that Saul was on the point of losing both his kingdom and life. Such generous conduct finely displays to us the honour and humanity of relieving the distressed; and we may be assured that a sincere and unaffected charity is a virtue of all others the most acceptable in the sight of God.

Encomium upon Saul.

Some encomiums are likewise due to Saul on this occasion. He was certain he should die in the combat, having been told so by the prophet; notwithstanding which he was determined to submit to his fate, and not save himself at the expence of his people. He esteemed it a glory to die fighting for the defence of his government; and rather to have his sons, and his whole family, share with him in the conflict, than be left at the disposal of the person who should succeed him. Such conduct dignifies the man and the prince, and ought to be an example to all elevated characters. The man who hazards his life in the common course of war, acts between hope and fear, and, by favourable circumstances, may escape; but the great soul is placed in him, who, when he knows he must unavoidably perish, boldly meets his destruction, and encounters his fate, without the least hope of being able to surmount it. This character is justly due to Saul; and his conduct should be an example to all future princes, in whom either a mediocrity of courage or virtue, is a kind of reproach. But I leave this digression, and resume the history.

Sam. xxix. The leaders of the Philistines object to David's going with them to battle.

The Philistines having gathered their troops together from all quarters, according to their distribution into tribes, kingdoms, and governments, Achish, the king of Gath, with his men, after the rest, and David, with his little army, after Achish, some of the Philistine commanders observing there were many Israelites among them, asked, who they were, from whence they came, and who brought them thither? To this question Achish replied, that the young man (pointing to David) was one of Saul's servants, but that having incurred his displeasure, he was obliged to have recourse to flight. "He came to me (says Achish) and solicited protection for himself and his people. I received him, and provided for him; and he has promised, on this occasion, to use his utmost efforts in assisting us against the Israelites, as an acknowledgement for the services he has received at my hands."

David leaves the camp of the Philistines. Sam. xxx.

When the Philistines knew who David was, they strongly objected against accepting his assistance, saying it was certainly dangerous to place the least confidence in a person belonging to their professed enemies. They therefore insisted that he should be dismissed; upon which Achish, calling David aside, told him the desire of the people, which being far from disagreeable to David, he immediately left the camp, and departed, with his men, for Ziglag.

David, in the course of his march, was joined by several of the tribe of Manasseh, so that his army

(a) These Amalekites appear to have been clans of straggling free-booters, who rambled from place to place, and, like the Arabians, were common enemies to mankind. It may seem strange, that David, having killed all he could meet with in one of his excursions against them whilst at Ziglag, they should not have served his people in the same manner. But, though they sought revenge, yet they gave the preference to booty. Being a poor and covetous people, they spared not the men and women from compassion, but avarice; because they wanted slaves either for their own use, or to sell to others. The gracious interposition of Providence is very conspicuous in this event; for, doubtless, it is most extraordinary that the captives should have been thus spared, to be recovered afterwards, safe and unhurt, out of the hands of a people so abandoned and execrable as the Amalekites.

(b) The number of Amalekites that fled were equal to all became considerably augmented. This, indeed, was a favourable circumstance; for when he came to Ziglag, he found that the (a) Amalekites had, during his absence, pillaged and burnt the place, carried away his two wives, and all the inhabitants: but what added to this misfortune was, the soldiers accused him of being the occasion of it.

In consequence of this disaster, David consulted Abiathar, the priest, whether, if he went against the Amalekites, he should prove successful, and recover the spoils they had taken? The high priest bid him follow them, and prosper. On this encouragement David, leaving two hundred of his men to take care of the baggage, marched the rest against the enemy. Having gained intelligence which way they took, he soon came up with them, and found them so intoxicated in consequence of the spoil they had taken, as to be totally insensible. He took advantage of this favourable opportunity, and immediately falling on them, put the greater part to the sword, a very few only saving themselves by flight (b). He then gathered together the people whom they had made captives, and, with the spoils they had not only taken from him, but from others, in their expedition, returned to Ziglag.

David is encouraged by the high priest to pursue his enemies.

Vanquishes them with dreadful carnage.

Recovers the spoils they had taken.

A dispute arises concerning the partition of the booty.

David adjusts the matter.

An equality of division passes into law.

1 Samuel xxxi. A desperate engagement ensues.

The issue of this battle occasioned a dispute between the soldiers who were left as guards over the baggage, and those who attended David, the latter not agreeing to allow any part of the booty to the former, except their wives and children. After some altercation the dispute was settled by David, who told them, the victory was God's, and being a blessing in the common cause, it was but reasonable that the whole body should partake of the benefits; for that those who guarded the camp and baggage, did equally their duty as those who attended in the field. From this circumstance David established it as a law, (which has ever since been in force,) that whatever plunder should be obtained in war, an equal division thereof should be made, as well among those who were ordered to guard the camp, as those who were present in the battle.

During these transactions a desperate engagement took place between the two armies of the Philistines and the Israelites. The former were so powerful that the latter were obliged to give way, and they maintained a running fight till they came to Mount Gilboa, when, taking advantage of the ground, they attempted again to rally, but with as little success as before. Saul and his sons did all that was possible for brave men to do; but the Philistines aiming wholly at them, in a short time overpowered them with numbers; so that Jonathan, with two of his brothers, Abinadab and Melchishua, were killed on the spot, and the whole army thrown into confusion.

Saul's sons are slain in the action.

Saul defended himself, for a time, with unparalleled resolution: but the small party that remained with him being at length entirely broken, and the enemies archers pressing hard, he found himself so weakened from the wounds and loss of blood, that, to prevent falling into the hands of the Philistines, and being insulted by them, he begged of his armour-bearer to dispatch him. The man refused to perform the office; upon which Saul fixed the point of his sword to his breast, and leant on it; but not being able, from weakness, to finish what he had begun, he requested the assistance of a young man, an Amalekite, who stood near him. The young man readily complied, the sword penetrated to the heart

Saul leans upon his own sword, and, by the assistance of an Amalekite, puts a period to his existence.

David's forces; and out of self-preservation he was obliged to put as many of them to the sword as he could, to prevent being surrounded and destroyed by so superior a number. A partial victory, instead of being any service to him, would have rather turned out to his disadvantage, because the straggling parties might have united, and watched an opportunity of retrieving their defeat by a second attack. Besides, it was unknown to David, nor can it be unknown to every attentive reader, that the Amalekites were such inveterate enemies to the Israelites, and so restless at the same time, that they would have lost no opportunity of wiping off their disgrace, or endangering the very being of the Israelitish nation. It is to be observed, lastly, that David in this case, not only acted with great prudence, in pursuing his victory, and endeavouring to extirpate the Amalekites, but also manifested his duty to God, who had condemned them to be utterly cut off.

of Saul, and he fell, and died; after which the Amalekite took the golden bracelets from his arms, and the royal crown from his head, and fled away. When the armour-bearer saw his master dead, he desperately followed his example, and, in the same manner, put a period to his existence. There was not a single person of the king's guards that escaped; the whole number, without distinction either of age or sex, being put to the sword.

No sooner did the Hebrews, who resided in the valley beyond Jordan, as also those who inhabited the cities in the plain, hear of the death of Saul and his sons, with the destruction of the army, than they immediately withdrew themselves to fastnesses and strong holds; while the Philistines, in the mean time, quietly made themselves masters of the places they had quitted.

The Philistines expose the bodies and armour of Saul and his sons in an ignominious manner.

Early the next morning the Philistines went into the field of battle, to take a view of the general carnage, when finding the bodies of Saul and his sons among the slain, they stripped them of their armour, cut off their heads, and sent expresses to every place of their victory. They sent their armour to the temple of Ashtaroth, and their bodies they hung on gibbets against the walls of Bethshan.

This barbarous outrage committed on the bodies of Saul and his sons, coming to the ears of the people of Jabesh-gilead (who retained a grateful sense of the services Saul had done them) they sent a party of their best soldiers by night, who took down their bodies and brought them to Jabesh, where they first burnt their flesh, and afterwards honourably interred the bones and ashes in a grove near the city. The people mourned, on this occasion, seven successive days; during which time men, women, and children, kept a strict fast, and continued to express their grief by the greatest lamentations.

The inhabitants of Jabesh testify a respect for the memory of the deceased king and his sons.

Such was the end of Saul, according to the prophecy of Samuel, (a) for his having disobeyed God in not destroying the race of the Amalekites, and for putting Ahimelech, and his whole family, to the sword. He ruled forty years; eighteen of which were during the life of Samuel, and twenty-two after his decease.

(a) But while we consider the obstinacy and fate of Saul, who can avoid dropping a tear over the faithful, the amiable Jonathan? There are few characters among men more lovely, or more extraordinary. He was possessed of fortitude, fidelity and magnanimity. He had a soul susceptible of the most refined friendship, and superior to all the temptations of ambition and vanity; and all these good qualities were crowned with the most resigned submission to the will of God.

CHAP. I.

David laments the deaths of Saul and Jonathan. Is appointed to the sovereignty by the tribe of Judah; but opposed by Abner, the late king's general, who proclaimeth Ishbosheth, the only remaining son of Saul, successor to the throne. Abner marches against the army of David, and is defeated by Joab, his general. He goes over to David, and is barbarously murdered by Joab. David laments his death, and pays the greatest respect to his funeral obsequies.

THE battle between the army of the Philistines and that of the Israelites happened on the very same day that David returned to Ziklag, after defeating the Amalekites. In the morning of the third day after this, the man who had slain Saul, having escaped out of the battle, came to Ziklag, and, with his cloaths rent, and ashes on his head, threw himself prostrate on the ground before David. Being asked from whence he came, and why he appeared so mournful, he answered, that he was an Amalekite, and came to inform him of the event of the battle between the Hebrews and Philistines. That the king and his sons were slain, and the greatest part of the army shared the same fate. He told him, that what he said might be depended on, for that he was a spectator of the whole scene. That he stood by Saul when he attempted to stab himself, but not having strength enough, from the many wounds he had received, to force the point of his sword through his body, after he had leant upon it, he begged him to finish what himself was unable to perform, and that he readily obeyed the royal command. To confirm what he had related, he produced the golden bracelets and crown of Saul, and told David he took them away, after Saul was dead, with no other design than to make a present of them to him.

David, being convinced of the truth of this relation, rent his cloaths, and spent the whole day in fasting and lamentation. He was particularly afflicted for the loss of Jonathan, who had more than once been the preserver of his life. And such respect did he still shew to the memory of Saul, notwithstanding the repeated attempts he had made to take away his life, that, instead of rewarding the man for the presents he brought, he ordered him to be put to death, not only as an enemy, but a professed regicide.

When David had performed his last duties to the memory of Saul and his sons, and the time of mourning was expired, he consulted God, by the prophet, which of the cities of Judah should be allotted for his habitation. Being answered, the city of Hebron (a), he immediately left Ziklag, and removed hither with his family and forces; soon after which the princes of Judah came to Hebron to congratulate him on his return to his native country, and in a full assembly, convened for the purpose, elected him their king.

By this time David had been informed of the generous conduct of the people of Jabesh-gilead, in rescuing the bodies of Saul and his sons, and giving them honourable interment. He was so pleased with this information, that he sent messengers to thank them for what they had done, and to assure them that they might ever depend on his favour and protection. He likewise desired the messengers to inform them, that he had been chosen, by the tribe of Judah, as successor to the sovereignty.

While the princes of Judah were interesting themselves in behalf of David, Abner, the late king's uncle, and general of the army, set up (b) Ishbosheth, the

(a) The city of Hebron stood in the midst of the tribe of Judah, and being the metropolis of the whole tribe, it was very commodious for David's residence at this juncture; for he could not be insensible that the determination of the people of that metropolis in his favour, would be of the greatest weight to influence the whole tribe.

(b) Ishbosheth was forty years of age at the time he was elected king. He reigned (properly speaking) only two years, though seven years and a half elapsed before David (who resided all the time at Hebron) was made king by the general voice of the people. As Ishbosheth was a very weak and inactive prince, when the war broke out with Judah, Abner took the government the only remaining son of Saul, as successor to the throne. He appointed Mahanaim (a), on the other side of Jordan, as the place of his residence; and, by his great interest and authority, Ishbosheth was recognized king by all the tribes, except that of Judah.

Abner was so incensed against the tribe of Judah for choosing David their king, that he determined to make war against them, and accordingly dispatched a body of the best men he could select from his whole army for that purpose. In the mean time Joab (the general of David's forces) hearing that Abner was on his way, marched from Hebron with his army against him, taking with him his two brothers, Abishai and Asahel. When the two armies came near each other, and were drawn up in order of battle, Abner proposed that the contest should be determined by twenty-four men, twelve to be chosen out of each army. This proposition being agreed to, the men were selected and engaged, when their skill was so equal on both sides, that every man killed his antagonist, and the whole twenty-four lay dead on the spot. In consequence of this a general engagement commenced between the two armies, which, for some time, was exceeding desperate on both sides; but at length Abner was totally routed, and put to flight. Joab, and his two brothers, pursued the fugitives; and Asahel, the younger brother of Joab, being much more active than the rest, got greatly a-head, and made the best of his way after Abner. As soon as he came up with him, Abner, who knew him, begged he would desist, and not attempt to attack him, as he should be very unwilling, by defending himself, to rob him of his existence. Asahel paid no attention to this remonstrance, but, ambitious of taking a general prisoner, made a stroke at Abner, who, with his spear, gave him a wound, of which he immediately died.

When the victorious army came to the spot where the body of Asahel lay, they were so shocked at the spectacle, that they immediately ceased the pursuit. Abner availed himself of this opportunity to rally his scattered forces, and making a stand on an advanced ground where he could not be attacked, he sounded a parley, and calling aloud to Joab, thus addressed him: "This outrageous animosity (says he) has already gone too far among people of the same blood and profession. As for your brother Asahel, I begged him to desist, but he was so obstinate in his determination, that I was reduced to the necessity of taking away his life for the security of my own; so that his death was owing to his own misconduct." Joab could not but admit the justice of Abner's argument, upon which he sounded a retreat, and the two armies separated. Abner immediately marched with his men to the palace of Ishbosheth, but Joab encamped on the spot that night. The next morning he took a view of the dead, and found, upon computation, that Abner had lost about 360 men, and himself nineteen, exclusive of Asahel, whose remains were carried, by Joab and Abishai, to Bethlehem, and there interred in the sepulchre of their ancestors. After this ceremony they returned to Hebron, whither David had arrived with his army.

From this period a civil war continued between the families of Saul and David for some years; during which time the forces of the latter, in most rencounters, had the advantage; and the interest of David increased in the nation, as that of Ishbosheth sensibly declined.

While David resided at Hebron he had six sons, born of as many wives; namely, Amnon, the son of Ahinoam; Chileab, the son of Abigail; Absalom, the son of Maachah, the daughter of Talmais, king of Geshur; Adonijah, the son of Haggith; Shephatiah, the son of Abital; and Ithream, the son of Eg-lah.

ment upon himself; so that the other five years and a half, which passed before David ascended to the throne of Israel, is not reckoned as part of Ishbosheth's reign, because he was only a nominal king, not having the least authority.

(a) Mahanaim was a place belonging to the tribe of Gad, and had its name from the appearance of an host of angels to Jacob, as he went with his family from Padan-aram, Gen. xxxii, 1. The reasons why Abner retreated hither in the beginning of Ish-

While the civil war lasted between David and Ishbosheth, Abner was the grand support of the latter, and, by his prudence and interest, the people were kept to obedience; but a circumstance at length occurred, which produced a fatal dissension to both parties. Abner had for some time preserved a familiar intimacy with Rizpah, the daughter of Sibeth, one of Saul's concubines. Intimation of this coming to the ears of Ishbosheth, he severely rebuked Abner for his conduct, who, thinking, himself treated with indignity, vowed no less a revenge than converting his interest from Ishbosheth to David.

In consequence of this determination, Abner sent a commissioner to Hebron, with full power to form a league with David, on the following single condition: That from and after the time he should draw off the tribes from Ishbosheth, and place David upon the throne by the universal consent of the people, he should be received as his prime-minister, and have the chief management (exclusive of himself) in all public affairs.

This proposition was very acceptable to David, who, in return, requested of Abner, as an earnest of their future alliance, that he would restore to him his wife Michal, whom he had not only purchased with the heads of six hundred Philistines, but also at the most imminent danger and hazard of his own life.

These matters being reciprocally agreed to, Abner immediately took Michal from Phalti (on whom she was bestowed by Saul with the privacy and assistance of Ishbosheth) and sent her to David; after which, calling together the elders and principal people, both civil and military, he thus addressed them: "There was a time (says he) when ye would willingly have renounced your allegiance to Ishbosheth, and gone over to David: I was then against it; but you are now at liberty to use your own discretion. I am fully convinced that, as God, by the prophet Samuel, hath anointed and constituted him king over all the Hebrews, and hath foretold that he should be the scourge of the Philistines, and shall subdue and bring them under his obedience, so shall he actually obtain the sovereignty over all Israel." When the elders, and the officers of the army, found the sentiments of Abner corresponded with those they had themselves entertained, they unanimously agreed with him in opinion, and from that time acted openly in favour of David.

Abner, having thus far proved successful, summoned together the tribe of Benjamin, which included the guards of Ishbosheth, to whom he addressed himself in the same manner as he had done to the elders and officers. These likewise he found condescending, and ready to favour his design; upon which, selecting twenty of the choicest, he took them with him, and went to David, in order to ratify the treaty that had been agreed on between them. David received Abner and his company with the greatest affection, and entertained them, for some days, in the most sumptuous manner; at the expiration of which Abner desired to be dismissed for the present, that he might go and bring the army and people to Hebron, in order to make good what he had undertaken, by publicly delivering up the government into his hands.

Abner had hardly quitted the gates of the city, when he met Joab, David's general, to whom he related the particulars of all that had passed relative to the treaty of alliance between him and David. Joab, at this information, was immediately struck with an outrageous fit of jealousy, thinking, from the great ambition of Abner, he would infallibly supplant him in his master's esteem. He therefore hastened to David with all expedition, and remonstrated with him on the impropriety of his conduct in listening to any terms proposed by Abner, whom, he said, was bosheth's reign were, that he might secure the people on that side the Jordan, especially the gallant inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead, who were firmly attached to the house of Saul; and, chiefly, that he might be at a greater distance from David, have the new king more absolutely under his command, and a better opportunity of recruiting his army among a people, who were not only very courageous by nature, but likewise well affected to the cause he had espoused.

to be considered in no other light than a spy, and whom he knew to be the protector and supporter of his professed enemy. That what he had done was all a delusion, and that he was probably gone home to take advantage of his great and ill-judged credulity.

David, not seeming to countenance the observations made by Joab, the latter (determined to seek revenge on Abner by some means or other) formed the resolution of effectually obtaining his wishes by taking away his life. He accordingly dispatched messengers after Abner, in the name of David, requesting his immediate return, as some things were omitted in his instructions that were exceeding important. The messengers overtook Abner at a place called Sirah, about twenty furlongs from Hebron, and communicating their business, he immediately returned.

In the mean time Joab, attended only by his brother Abishai, planted himself in a private place without the gates of the city; and when Abner came to the spot, he called him aside, telling him he had some business to relate to him of a private nature. Abner, not suspecting any danger, complied with Joab's request, when the latter, suddenly drawing his sword, stabbed him to the heart. Thus was this brave man taken off by the perfidy of Joab, who pretended he did it in revenge for the death of his brother Asahel; but, in reality, it was to gratify his jealousy and revenge, for fear of being supplanted in the king's favour.

When David was informed of Abner's death, he was so affected, that he knew not how to contain himself. But, stretching out his hands, and lifting up his eyes to heaven, he solemnly declared, in the presence of all about him, that he was neither accessory to the murder, nor knew any thing of it previous to its being perpetrated. He denounced the most heavy curses on Joab and his family, wishing they might receive that punishment due to so enormous a crime. He ordered all the army to march before the bier of Abner, and, with tears and lamentations, with their clothes rent, and putting on sackcloth, to bewail his loss, and to perform all funeral rites to him in the most solemn manner. He attended himself as chief mourner; and the example he set in expressing his lamentations for the loss of Abner, was followed by the whole body of the people. In short, so affected was David at this melancholy circumstance, that, notwithstanding the earnest persuasions of his friends, he could not be prevailed upon to take the least refreshment that day, swearing, he would not taste any thing till the sun was down. The severity of this religious strictness gained the universal affection of the people, who were sufficiently satisfied that David was not only a total stranger to the murder of Abner, but that he held him in the highest esteem. Besides this, it greatly enhanced the character and reputation of David, the people naturally imagining, that if any future circumstance should arise of the like nature, he would shew the same respect to their memories as he had done to that of Abner.

When the funeral ceremonies were over, David addressed the multitude in a very pathetic harangue, in which he first pointed out to them his own particular unhappiness in being deprived of a friend for whom he had so great a value; and then told them, that his loss must be sensibly felt by the whole nation, since he was not only a brave soldier, but a wise and prudent counsellor. "But that God (says he) who governs all things, will not let this murder pass unrevenge. He is my witness that my situation will not permit me to do by Joab and Abishai as they deserve, they having, probably, a greater interest in the army than myself; but I doubt not that, sooner or later, Divine justice will find them out, and inflict on them that punishment they merit for so enormous a crime."

Thus did the great general Abner fall a sacrifice to the jealousy and resentment of an inveterate assassin.

CHAP. II.

The perfidious murder of Ishbosheth avenged by David on the regicides. He is universally recognized as king. Besieges and takes the city of Jerusalem. Joab signals his bravery on the occasion.

WHEN Ishbosheth heard of the death of Abner he was greatly afflicted in his mind, not only on account of having lost a relation, but the person who had been the means of advancing him to the throne. He did not, however, long survive his friend, being soon after treacherously murdered by Baanah and Rechab, the sons of Rimmon. These two persons being Benjamites, and of the first rank, thought if they put Ishbosheth to death, it would be well received by David, and that, for their conduct, he would advance them to some honourable employment. Having resolved on carrying their design into execution, they went into that apartment of the palace where Ishbosheth was accustomed to repose himself during the heat of the day. There being no guards about the place, and the servant appointed to watch the door absent, they stole into the chamber, where finding Ishbosheth alone, and fast asleep, they first stabbed him, and then, cutting off his head, halted, with all expedition, to Hebron, in order to present it as fresh as possible to David. They made not the least doubt of being amply rewarded for this singular achievement: but they soon found themselves mistaken; for when they presented the head to David, he was so far from approving of what they had done, that he expressed his detestation of so impious an act in words to this effect: "Ye basest of wretches, (says he,) immediately prepare yourselves to receive the just reward of your horrid villainy. What! have ye so soon forgot the punishment I inflicted on him who brought me the crown of gold belonging to Saul, after he had slain him, at his own desire, for fear of falling into the hands of his enemy! Do you imagine I am not the same person now I was then? Or can you suppose me so abandoned a wretch as to countenance the murder you have committed on your master, by taking off his head in his own bedchamber; the head of him who never did injury to any man, and who, in an especial manner, heaped his favours on you? Wherefore I will avenge his death by taking away your lives, and avenge myself on you for cutting him off under pretence of doing me service. Your entertaining such base sentiments of me is the greatest injury you could have done to my honour and reputation." Having said this, he ordered their hands and feet to be cut off, and their bodies to be hung up in a public place, as a terror to all regicides; after which he ordered the head of Ishbosheth to be honourably interred in the sepulchre of Abner.

As soon as the death of Ishbosheth was generally known, all the tribes sent deputies to David, acknowledging his right to the sovereignty, and promising him their allegiance. David received them with the greatest respect, and assured them, that so long as they continued obedient and dutiful subjects, they should not have reason to repent having chosen him as their king. He entertained the deputies for several days in the most hospitable and magnificent manner; after which he dismissed them, with orders to summon the whole body of the people to repair immediately to his palace at Hebron.

The deputies having obeyed these orders, and the different tribes being gathered together, the number in each appeared as follows:

Of the tribe of Judah, 6,800, armed with shields and lances. These had been of Saul's party.

Of the tribe of Simeon, 7,100.

Of the tribe of Levi, 4,700, headed by Jehoida, their captain. With these was Zadock, the high-priest, accompanied by twenty-two of his kindred, all captains.

Of the tribe of Benjamin, 4,000, armed. This tribe was of opinion that some of Saul's family would succeed to the government.

Of the tribe of Naphthali, 1000 commanders, armed with shields and spears, and attended by an innumerable multitude of their followers.

Of the tribe of Dan, 27,000 choice men.

Of the tribe of Asher, 40,000.

Of the two tribes beyond Jordan, and the other half of the tribe of Menasses, 22,000, all armed with shields, spears, swords and helmets.

Each of these tribes brought with them great quantities of corn, wine, and other provisions, which were respectfully received by David; and in the presence of the whole multitude he was anointed king over all Israel, after having reigned at Hebron, over the tribe of Judah only, for the space of seven years and six months.

David, being now invested with full regal power, and having a multitude of brave and gallant soldiers to attend him, formed the resolution of making an expedition against Jerusalem, which was at this time inhabited by the Jebusites, a people belonging to the race of the Canaanites. He accordingly marched with his army towards the place; and, when he came to the castle, or fort of Zion, which commanded the city, and was thought impregnable, he summoned the inhabitants to surrender. But they were so little intimidated, that they bid defiance to him, and, by way of derision, placed on the walls great numbers of people, who were lame and infirm, saying, they wanted no other guard to protect them from such an enemy. This insult so irritated David, that he resolved immediately to attack the city, reasonably imagining, that if he made himself master of that, it would so terrify those in the castle, that they would readily submit. He accordingly besieged the place with the flower of his army, and making a general assault, soon entered the Lower Town. The Jebusites made all the resistance they were able; but, by the intrepidity of David's army, they were soon overpowered, the greater part being killed on the spot, and the rest obliged to save themselves by a precipitate flight. Having thus made himself master of the lower city, he marched to the castle; but the inhabitants being still resolute, and the place so strong as to render the attack dangerous, he knew not, for some time, how to act; till at length, in order to animate his men to undertake the arduous task, he caused a proclamation to be made throughout the camp, that whoever first mounted the walls, and made good his station, should be made captain-general of all his forces. This had the desired effect, a general emulation immediately taking place among the people; but Joab, being more alert than the rest, got before all, and having ascended the tower, called aloud to David to fulfil his promise. The rest of the troops immediately following Joab, the besieged soon gave way, and, in a short time, abandoned the place. After this, David expelled the Jebusites, enlarged the buildings of the Lower City, which he joined to the citadel, made it his place of residence, and gave it the name of The City of David. He erected many fortifications in different parts of it, surrounded the whole with a strong wall, and gave the command of it to Joab; who, in the mean time, repaired and enlarged the upper city, for the better accommodation of the people. From this time David kept his court at Jerusalem.

CHAP. III.

Hiram, king of Tyre, courts the friendship and alliance of David. His wives and children.

ABOUT this time Hiram, king of Tyre, hearing how prosperous David was in all his affairs, sent ambassadors to congratulate him on his accession to the throne, and to join with him in a treaty of alliance and friendship. He likewise sent him a present of cedar trees, with carpenters and other artificers, to assist him in erecting a royal palace at his new city.

The city of Jerusalem (which name David expunged after subduing the Jebusites) was called, in the days of Abraham, Solyma; and it is imagined that Homer points at this city when he speaks of the people of Solyma; that word, in the Hebrew language, signifying a fortress, or place of defence. From the time that Joshua waged war with the inhabitants of Canaan, and, after subduing them, divided their country among the Hebrews, the Jebusites still kept possession of this city; nor could they be driven out of it till it was effected by David, which was an interval of no less than 515 years.

There was left amongst the Jebusites one Orphan, who was not slain at the siege of Jerusalem, at the particular instance of David, because of the good will he bore the Hebrews in general, and the king in particular. So that his name is worthy of record.

Soon after David had established himself in his new city, he took to him several new wives, as also many concubines. By these he had born to him eleven sons, named Amnon, Ellus, Ebas, Nathan, Solomon, Jebar, Elial, Phalna, Ennaphen, Jenas, and Eliphel; besides a daughter, named Thamar, who was sister to Absalom. The nine first of the sons were by his lawful wives, but the two last by concubines.

CHAP. IV.

David totally routs the Philistines and their allies. Removes the ark to Jerusalem. Forms a design of building a temple, and acknowledges the Divine favour.

IN the mean time the Philistines, having heard of David's increasing greatness, and supposing it a sure presage of their own downfall, determined to check his power as soon as possible; to effect which they raised a considerable army, and marching towards Jerusalem, encamped in a place called The Valley of the Giants, not far from the city.

David, not choosing to engage in any enterprize without first consulting the Divine oracle, commanded the high priest to signify to him the pleasure of the Almighty, and what issue he would vouchsafe to give should he engage the Philistines. Having received for answer that he should obtain the victory, he immediately drew out his men, and marching with all expedition against the enemy, fell on them so suddenly, that they were thrown into the greatest confusion, and, in a short time, totally routed. Great numbers were killed on the spot, many others desperately wounded, and the remainder saved themselves by flight.

But the Philistines were so far from being intimidated at this overthrow, that, a short time after, they came again, with an army consisting of thrice the number they had before, having been joined by the Syrians, Phoenicians, and other warlike nations. On this occasion David again consulted the oracle, and received orders that he should march with his army to a certain place, not far from the enemy, called The Wood of Lamentation; from whence he should not attempt to move, on any account whatever, till he saw the branches of the trees move, without the blowing of the wind. That when this took place, he might suppose the time was come that Providence had allotted for his encountering the enemy, and that he should immediately leave the place and begin the attack. David strictly attended to these directions, and, as soon as he discovered the providential signs, immediately marched out with his army, fully assured the business he was about would prove successful. The Philistines gave way at the first onset; when they found themselves closely attacked, they betook themselves to flight. David pursued them as far as Gaza, a city on the extreme borders of their country, and killed great numbers in his way; after which he returned to their camp, took what valuables they had left behind, and destroyed their idols. This defeat so weakened the Philistines that they did not attempt to attack the Israelites for many succeeding years.

The war with the Philistines being now over, and all things quiet, David thought it a very proper season to remove the ark of God (which, for almost fifty fifty years, had continued in the house of Abinadab, at Kirjath-jearim) to a place which he had prepared for it in his own city. For this purpose, he assembled the elders and principal men of the respective tribes, together with the priests and Levites, and taking with him a strong guard for the protection of the ark, in case any enemy should attempt to surprize them, went in grand procession to Kirjath-jearim. Having removed the ark out of Abinadab's house, instead of carrying it on mens shoulders, they, in imitation of the Philistines, put it into a cart drawn by two oxen, and in this manner proceeded with it towards Jerusalem; the king going before it, and the multitude following after, singing praises to God, and dancing to various tunes played on different instruments, such as harps, psalteries, cornets, and cymbals. When they came to a place called Nachon's Threshing Floor, the cart was near being overturned; upon which Uzzah, one of the drivers, in order to save the ark, put his hand upon it; for which presumption (not being in holy orders) the Almighty was pleased to punish him with instant death. This melancholy circumstance not only afflicted David, but the whole multitude; and, as a memento, they called the place ever after by the name of Perez-Uzzah, that is, the Breach of Uzzah.

David was so terrified at the sudden death which the Almighty had inflicted on Uzzah, for touching the ark, that he was apprehensive of meeting the like fate should he presume to carry it to the place intended. Instead, therefore, of proceeding towards the city, he turned out of the way, and went to the house of a righteous man, a Levite, named Obed-Edom, into whose custody he left the ark, where it remained for the space of three months. At the expiration of this time, David, having heard of the great prosperity that had attended Obed-Edom, since the ark had been in his possession, was delivered from the fear he had conceived, and resumed his intentions of removing it to his own city, which he did in great form and solemnity. It was borne on the shoulders of the priests, whom David had caused to be sanctified on the occasion: seven companies of singing-men went before it, and the king himself followed, dressed in a linen ephod (a), dancing and playing on his harp. The ark being brought into the city, and properly secured in the place allotted for it, David offered sacrifices to God of considerable value; after which he made a feast for the people, giving to each person a cake of bread, a flaggon of wine, and a piece of the sacrifice.

When David returned home, he was met by his wife Michal (the daughter of the late king Saul) who, having seen him through a window dancing before the ark, upbraided him for his condescension, saying, such locusts were beneath the dignity of a king. In reply to this, David told her, that what he had done was in honour of that God who had chosen him to govern Israel, in preference to her own father, and to all other men; and that such condescension would never bring him under any just contempt. Michal had not any children by David; but she had five sons by her other husband, to whom Saul, her father, gave her in marriage, after he had forcibly taken her from David.

By this time the palace (which Hiram, king of Tyre, had furnished David with men and materials to build) was finished; and as he was reflecting on the meanness of God's habitation compared with his own, it came into his mind to build a temple for his religious worship, and to place in it the ark of the Lord. He communicated his design to the prophet Nathan, who at first approved of it: but that night the word of the Lord came to Nathan (b) to this effect: "Go and tell David I accept of his good-will in being the first proposer of erecting "a temple to my services; but, as he has been engaged in so many wars, and has embued his hands in the blood of his enemies, I will not permit him to carry his design into execution. The care of this undertaking I shall reserve for his son Solomon, over whom I will be as a tender father, and will continue the government in the line of his family; and, if he should be guilty of any transgressions, I will not totally reject him as I did Saul, but only punish him with pestilence and famine."

The prophet Nathan, having communicated these tidings to David, he was so rejoiced at the thoughts of the succession being secured to his posterity, and the honour of his family so graciously provided for, that he immediately repaired to the ark of God, and throwing himself prostrate before it, addressed his Divine benefactor to this effect: "Blessed be thy name, for all the benefits and mercies thou hast been pleased to bestow on thy servant. Thou hast raised me from the lowest situation in life to the summit of dignity and power. I bless thee for all this; for thy continued providences to myself, and thy promises to my posterity, as also for thy multiplied deliverances and protections to thy own people." After this he arose, sang an hymn, and then departed.

CHAP. V.

David wages a successful war against the Philistines and their confederates.

AS the Almighty had thought proper to refuse David the privilege of building him a temple, and had reserved that work for his son Solomon, he thought it advisable to employ his time in subduing his enemies on every side, that, when his son came to undertake so great an affair, he might meet with as little interruption as possible.

In consequence of these thoughts he immediately gathered together his forces, and resolved first to attack the Philistines, who had twice invaded him soon after his accession to the throne. The army being prepared, he accordingly marched against the enemy, took from them the greatest part of their country, and added it to the possessions of his own people. He then marched against the Moabites, whom he totally subdued; and having destroyed two thirds of their army, took the rest captive, and rendered them tributary. After this he turned his victorious arms on Adrazar, the son of Arach, king of Sophene, whom he defeated near the Euphrates; 20,000 foot, and 5000 horse, falling in the action. Of a thousand chariots taken he reserved but one hundred, ordering the rest to be consumed.

David obtains a complete conquest over Adad. Subdues the Idumæans. Forms an alliance with the king of Hamah. Is mindful of the friendship of Jonathan, the son of Saul. Wages war against the Ammonites.

IN the mean time Adad, king of Syria and Damascus, having heard of the ill success of Adrazar, who was his particular friend and ally, marched with a strong body of forces to his assistance. He joined Adrazar's army near the river Euphrates, when a desperate battle ensued between his army and that of David, in which the former, contrary to his expectations, was defeated, 22,000 of his men being killed on the spot, and the remainder obliged to save themselves by precipitate flight.

This king Adad is taken notice of by Nicholas of Account of Nicholas, the historian.

(b) At what time this prophet began to appear in Israel we are not any where informed. He was a man of great prudence and fine address, who knew how to mitigate the rigour of his reproofs with a great deal of sweetness and wisdom, which qualified him so well for the conversation of kings, and other great persons. He was equally esteemed and beloved by David; and, in his conduct towards him, maintained a just medium between inflexible austerity, and a servile flattery.

Damascus,

(a) David laid aside his royal ornaments, and was girded with a simple ephod, which was used by those who were not priests. His moving in certain solemn measures, suited to music of the same character and tendency, was highly to the purposes of piety; and his mixing with the public festivities of the people was a condescension not unbecoming the greatest monarch. Policy taught Augustus to put himself on a level with his subjects in their public rejoicings; piety taught David that all men were upon a level in the solemnities of religion.

Damascus, in the fifth book of his history; who says, "A certain valiant man, named Adad, reigned over Damascus and Syria, Phœnicia only excepted. He having declared war against David, several encounters took place between them, but at last he was overcome at Euphrates, behaving himself with the resolution of a brave prince and a great commander." The same writer, in speaking of the posterity of Adad, says, "After his death his posterity, for the succeeding generations, possessed the sovereignty, each, at the time he became king, taking upon him the name of Adad, as the kings of Egypt did that of Ptolemy. The third of these becoming very powerful, resolved to renew the war his father had begun; upon which he made an inroad into Judea, and sacked the country now called Samaria." This account of Nicholas is authentic; for this is that Adad who invaded Samaria, when Ahab reigned over Israel.

David having vanquished the enemy, obtains an immense booty

David, having reduced the Syrians, and made himself master of that country, put garrisons into the fortified cities, and made the inhabitants tributary. Having done this he returned home, loaded with spoils and honours: but all the valuable articles, such as gold, silver, and a particular sort of brass, which was more esteemed than gold, was the metal Solomon afterwards used in making some of the vessels for the service of his temple.

The Idumæans are subjected.

The successes of David were enhanced by those which attended his deputies, several of whom he dispatched, with a proper number of forces, to engage the enemy in such parts as he had directed. Among these was Abishai, Joab's brother, who being sent out with an army against the Idumæans, totally subdued them, killing 18,000 on the spot, and making the survivors tributary to David.

The king of Hamah sends to congratulate David.

When Toi, the king of Hamah, heard of the great victories obtained by David, he sent his son Joram to congratulate him on the occasion; and made him a considerable present of vessels of gold, silver, &c. (all which he dedicated to God) as an acknowledgment for his having destroyed the power of his most inveterate enemies.

David's officers of state.

Though David's attention had been engaged in the prosecution of foreign wars, yet, at the same time, he was not unmindful of administering justice to his subjects at home; for the effecting of which he had a certain number of very great men employed in the highest offices of trust. Joab was captain-general; Jehosaphat, keeper of the records; Abiathar, high-priest; Sezaiiah, secretary of state; Benaiah, captain of his guard; and his own sons, prime ministers of his household. To these David added one more, namely, Mephibosheth, the son of Jonathan, whom, with great difficulty, he found out, by means of one Ziba, who had for many years been a servant to Saul. He restored to him all his grandfather's estates; and though he was a cripple (a), and lame of both his feet, yet (from the great respect he had for his father) he entertained him with the most distinguished kindness, and ordered him to sit with his own sons at the royal table.

King Nahash dies. David sends to congratulate his son.

His ambassadors are treated with ignominy.

Some time after this, David, hearing of the death of his good friend and ally Nahash, king of the Ammonites, sent his compliments of condolence to his son and successor Hanun: but the great men who were about the young king made him believe that the sole intent of David's sending this embassy was, to spy out the weakness of the city, and in what place it might be most advantageously assaulted. In consequence of this, he ordered his ambassadors to be half shaved (b), and their cloaths cut short even to the waist; and with this ignominious appearance they were dismissed.

David, fired with indignation at this treatment of his ambassadors as a violation of the law of nations, as well as hospitality and honour, determined to assert his dignity, and avenge the insult he had himself through them received from their king. The principal men amongst the Ammonites, conscious that so flagrant a breach of friendship would excite the resentment of the king of Israel, no sooner heard of his determination, than they prepared for opposition, and dispatched ambassadors to Syrus, king of Mesopotamia, as well as the kings of Zoba, Maachah, and Ishob, who, for valuable considerations, furnished them with a powerful armament.

DAVID, by no means intimidated by the preparation of the Ammonites in forming such powerful alliances, maintained his resolution, conscious of the justice of his cause, and depending therefore on the Divine aid and protection. He appointed Joab commander of a select body of forces, and dispatched him against the enemy. He pitched his camp near Rabbath, their metropolis; whereupon they came out, and set themselves in array in two bodies, the auxiliaries being fixed on the plains by themselves, and the Ammonites before the port over-against the Hebrews. Joab observing the disposition of the enemy, as an expert general opposed stratagem to stratagem, and selecting the choicest men, prepared to head them, and charge the confederates; while he gave his brother Abishai the command of the rest of the army, with orders to attack the Ammonites, and come to his relief, if he should find him oppressed by the confederates.

David forms a body of men against the Ammonites.

Having exhorted his brother, and the troops under his command, to conduct becoming their country and cause, Joab began the action by an attack on the Syrians, who, for some time, withstood him with great bravery, till, dismayed by the slaughter around them, they betook themselves to flight; and the Ammonites, observing the confusion into which the confederates were thrown, followed their example, and, with the utmost precipitation, ran towards the city, before Abishai's detachment could come up with them. So that Joab returned to Jerusalem with honour.

This defeat, however, did not suppress the hostile designs of the Ammonites, who sent to Chalama, king of the Syrians, beyond Euphrates, and hired of him an army of auxiliaries. Shobach was his lieutenant-general, and had command of 80,000 foot and 7000 horse. When David received intelligence that the Ammonites were so powerfully reinforced, he determined to take the command in person; so that passing the river Jordan with the whole army, he gave them battle, and routed them with great slaughter. Forty thousand foot, and seven thousand of their horse, fell in the action; and Shobach, the general of the Syrians, received a wound which proved mortal. The Mesopotamians, awed by this victory, submitted to the king of Israel, and gratified him with presents by their ambassadors. After this glorious enterprize, David returned in safety to Jerusalem. As soon as the season would permit, he sent Joab

(b) The wearing of long beards and garments was then (as it still is) the fashion of the east, where they were deemed badges of honour, and consequently, the cutting off, or curtailing of either, was considered as the greatest indignity. Nay, in some places, the cutting off the beard was not only looked upon as a matter of the highest reproach, but also of the severest punishment. It was the same thing anciently among the Indians, and is at this day among the Persians. It was one of the most disgraceful punishments for cowardice in Sparta; for those who turned their backs in the day of battle, were obliged to appear abroad with one half of their beards shaved, and the other half unshaved. There were two reasons which caused the easterns of old, as well as at present, to look upon the beard as venerable: in the first place, they considered it as a natural ornament designed to distinguish men from women; secondly, it was the mark of a free man in opposition to slaves; so that, in every view, the insult of Hanun to the ambassadors of David was capital. It was a violation of the law of nature, of hospitality, and of the right of nations.

Sam. xi.

While Joab was carrying on the siege of Rabbah, David, though a person of great piety towards God, justice with respect to man, and a strict observer of the laws and customs delivered by his forefathers, became guilty of a great sin and offence against his Divine Protector. As he was one evening walking on the top of his palace, for the benefit of the air, he espied a woman, of a most exquisite shape and beauty, bathing herself in her garden. He was so struck with her appearance, that he made immediate enquiry who she was, and was informed that her name was Bathsheba, and that she was the wife of Uriah, the Hittite, an officer of his army, who was then with Joab at the siege of Rabbah. In consequence of this information, he ordered her to be brought to the palace, when her appearance so wrought on his passions, that he took her that night to his bed, and the next morning dismissed her. A short time after, finding herself with child, she went to David, told him her situation, and withal desired him to consult her honour and safety, in devising some means whereby it might be concealed. David hereupon sent a messenger to Joab, with orders for Uriah to come to him immediately, as he had some business to relate to him of a very particular nature; but his whole intent was, to give Uriah the opportunity of lying with his wife, that the child, when it was born, might be reputed his. Uriah was sent for agreeable to the royal order; and after the king had asked him some questions relative to the situation of the army, and the state of the siege, he ordered him to go home and refresh himself after his journey, sending after him a handsome collation for his entertainment.

David sends back Uriah to Joab with instructions to accomplish his death.

Uriah, after behaving with the utmost gallantry, falls covered with wounds.

Uriah, instead of going home, as the king had ordered, slept that night in the guard-room; information of which being given to David the next morning, he resolved on another expedient to accomplish his wishes. He invited him to sup that night at his own table, and prevailed with him to drink to such a pitch, that he did not doubt but the heat of the liquor would so inflame his desires as to make him go home to his wife. This scheme likewise failed; for Uriah slept in the same place he had done the preceding night; upon which, the next morning, David asked him how it came to pass, that, after being so long away from his wife, instead of going to her, as most men would do in his circumstances, he seemed to shun her company? To this Uriah replied, "I do not think it fair to indulge myself in the arms of my wife, at a time when I know my general and fellow-soldiers are lying on the bare ground in an enemy's country."

David, finding all his efforts proved ineffectual, at length hit upon a project for taking away Uriah's life. He ordered him back to the army, and with him sent a letter to Joab, commanding him, on the first dangerous attack, to place Uriah in the front, and privately to tell those who should be with him at the time, that, as soon as they found the Ammonites press forward, they should retreat, and leave Uriah exposed to the enemy. Joab strictly obeyed the king's orders: he posted Uriah on the very spot where he knew the enemy would make the most vigorous defence, and, the better to conceal the design, placed with him some of the bravest men in his army. He made an apology to Uriah for allotting him so dangerous a situation; but being a man of courage, and not suspecting the mischief intended, he undertook the charge with the greatest cheerfulness.

When the Ammonites saw the Hebrews approach near the walls of the city, they thought it high time to begin the attack; and suddenly throwing open one of their gates, made a desperate rally on the front ranks of the Hebrews. The men who were with Uriah, agreeable to the orders of Joab, immediately fled, and left their leader to fall a sacrifice to the enemy. He did all that was in the power of a single man to do against numbers, and, after receiving several wounds, fell like a man of honour and courage.

As soon as Uriah was dead, Joab dispatched a messenger to inform David of the event, who returned with orders to carry on the siege till he had made himself master of the city; then to raze it to the ground, and put all the inhabitants to the sword.

Joab certifies David of his death.

In the mean time Bathsheba, the wife of Uriah, being informed of her husband's death, lamented and mourned for him some days: but as soon as the time was elapsed for observing that ceremony, David sent for her, and took her to wife, soon after which she brought him a son.

David takes Bathsheba to wife, and hath a son by her.

This marriage greatly offended the Almighty, who appearing to Nathan, the prophet, in a dream, enjoined him to inform David how much he was displeased with his conduct. Nathan, who was a man of great prudence, considering within himself that kings, when angry, are prone to hearken more to the dictates of passion than reason, resolved not to tell David in plain terms the wrath and threatenings of the Almighty, but to discover it to him in such a manner, that he should be under the necessity of condemning himself. Accordingly, when he came before the king, he addressed him as follows: "There were (says he) two men who lived in the same city: the one was rich, and possessed many asses, and great herds and flocks of oxen and sheep; the other was poor, and had but one little ewe-lamb, which he had brought up and nourished with his children. It happened that a stranger came to the rich man's house, whom he was bound, by honour, to entertain; but instead of doing it at his own expence, he sent a person to bring away, by force, the poor man's ewe-lamb, which he dressed, and set before his guest." A villain! says the king, to do so base and unjust an act. I would have him make four-fold satisfaction, and after that be put to death. "Why then, (says Nathan,) thou thyself art the man, and out of thy own mouth hast thou pronounced judgement on thyself." He then told him that he had greatly deserved the Divine displeasure, in offending that God, who had made him king over all the Hebrews, and lord of the nations round about him; and who had several times delivered him out of the hands of Saul. That the Almighty had given him wives, whom he had lawfully married; and that for him to take away another man's wife, and to betray her husband to the enemy, and to death, was a crime of the most unpardonable nature. That God would chastise him for this transgression, by causing his women to be ravished by one of his sons, who should lay snares for his life; and that he, who had committed so great a sin in private, should be brought to public shame and punishment. He concluded with this preface, that the son of his unlawful love should surely die.

Nathan, by an allegorical fable, convinces David of the heinousness of his crime.

Nathan foretels David of the Divine vengeance.

David having received this message from God, by the mouth of Nathan, was thrown into the greatest confusion: he wept bitterly, made an ample confession of his guilt, and, in the most fervent manner, implored pardon for the offence he had committed. Till this time he had lived in the fear of God, and, except in the case of Uriah, had never been guilty of any kind of wickedness. Wherefore the Almighty, upon his sincere repentance, took compassion on him, and commanded Nathan to tell him, that the eternal punishment due to his transgression he had remitted, but the temporal should be inflicted on him: that he should not be put to death, or lose his kingdom; neither should the sword depart from his family.

David repents.

It was not long before part of the sentence, denounced against David for his transgression, took place; for the child, which he had by Bathsheba, was taken sick, and died. While it was ill, David fasted and prayed for seven days, beseeching the Almighty to preserve its life; but when it was dead, he acknowledged the justness of God, and cheerfully submitting to his will, made his ardent supplications to him, that the remainder of his afflictions might be mixed with mercy. This was, in some measure, complied with; for, in a proper space of time, he had another son by Bathsheba, who, by the direction of the prophet Nathan, was named Solomon (a).

David's son by Bathsheba dies.

able: but Nathan gave the name of Jedidiah, which signifies the beloved of God. The scriptures, however, never call him

During these transactions Joab was carrying on the siege of Rabbah, and renewing his assaults every day. He at length got possession of the works which supplied the city with water. Having thus far distressed the enemy, he dispatched a messenger to acquaint the king, that the city was reduced to the utmost extremity; that it was in no condition to hold out much longer; and therefore he desired him to come in person, that he might have the honour of taking it. David, agreeable to his general's desire, went with a strong reinforcement, took the place by storm, and divided the spoil among his soldiers, reserving only to himself such articles as belonged to the king, among which was the crown, of inestimable value. Having thus reduced the city, he put those, who had held out against him, to the most exquisite torments; and the inhabitants of other places, who would not immediately surrender, he treated with the like severity. Thus were the Ammonites totally subdued by David, who, returning with his army to Jerusalem, was received by the people with the loudest acclamations of joy.

David had been but a short time at Jerusalem, after conquering the Ammonites, before a circumstance occurred in his family that gave him great uneasiness. He had several sons, but only one daughter, a virgin, named Tamar, who was sister to Absalom by the same mother. She was most exquisitely beautiful in her person, and possessed of every female accomplishment. Amnon, the eldest son of David, by another queen, fell desperately in love (a) with her, and, for some time, pined away with an hopeless desire of obtaining her. At length, by the advice and contrivance of Jonadab, his intimate friend and counsellor, he found means to decoy her into his apartment, when, notwithstanding all her entreaties and expostulations, he first ravished her, and, when his brutish passion was satisfied, in a sudden humour bid her be gone. She for some time remonstrated with him on the ill-treatment she had received, and the ignominy to which she must be exposed; but all remonstrances were in vain; and Amnon, finding her unwilling to go, at length ordered his servants to turn her out of the house.

In this distressed situation Tamar immediately repaired to her brother Absalom, and related to him the whole particulars of what had passed. Absalom, though a man naturally of a high spirit, advised her, as the most prudent method, to be silent on the occasion, because her ravisher was heir apparent to the crown; and he so artfully concealed his own resentment, that the people doubted whether he even knew of the transaction. In the mean time David, having heard of the circumstance, was greatly afflicted; but as Amnon was his eldest and most beloved son, he did not think proper to expose him by punishment.

About two years after this (during which time Tamar resided with her brother) Absalom took the opportunity of revenging the injury done by Amnon to his sister. It being the time of sheep-shearing (which was usually attended with great mirth and jollity) he invited the king, and all the princes of the blood, to come to his country seat at Hazor, to partake of the entertainment. David excused himself, by saying he would not put him to so great a trouble as must consequently follow his attendance. On this Absalom desired he would permit his brothers to come; to which the king readily complied.

by this name, only by that of Solomon; but for what reason we cannot tell, unless we may suppose that the people, being harassed in war during his father's reign, might be pleased with this name, and use it rather than the other, in intimate their hopes and long desire of peace. And for this reason, among others, it may be inferred, that Solomon was born after the conclusion of the Ammonitish war; though the sacred history takes occasion, from the death of Bathsheba's first-born, to relate that event first. Bathsheba had some time after another son, whom David called Nathan; and it is in him that the two lines of Our Saviour's genealogy unite themselves, who, on Joseph's side, descended from Solomon, and on Mary's, from Nathan. See Matth. i. 6, 7. Luke iii. 31.

They accordingly went to Hazor, where, while they were engaged in feasting and drinking, the servants of Absalom (who had received previous instructions how to act) suddenly fell on Amnon, and immediately dispatched him.

CHAP. VIII.

To escape his father's resentment, Absalom flies to Geshur. Joab reconciles him to David. Absalom engages in rebellion, and is guilty of breaches of piety and filial duty through the persuasion of Abithophel.

THE unexpected violence on Amnon so alarmed the rest of the princes, that, fearful of meeting the like fate, they precipitately left the place, and fled, with all expedition, to their father's house. A messenger, who was dispatched on the occasion, arriving first at the palace, with a relation of the event, David was thrown into the utmost consternation, supposing that Absalom had killed all his sons; but his fears were soon removed by the arrival of the princes, when a scene of the most affecting nature took place, the father and sons reciprocally greeting each other with tears, and all lamenting the cruel death of Amnon.

In the mean time Absalom, knowing how highly his father would resent this treacherous murder, fled to his mother's relations, and was entertained by his grand-father Talmi, at Geshur. Here he remained three years; at the expiration of which Joab, perceiving that David had a secret desire to see Absalom, projected a scheme for facilitating the accomplishment of his wishes, without exposing him to censure for his conduct. He procured an ancient and artful woman from Tekoah, and having dressed her in mourning, introduced her to the king, with a feigned petition for the life of one of her sons who had killed the other. She related her tale in so apparently an affecting manner, that the king was induced to comply with her request; upon which she told him that the case she had been stating was Absalom's, and that, if he was disposed to shew mercy to a private man, there was much more reason for his pardoning his own son, whose absence the people lamented, and for whom they had the greatest respect.

David easily saw through this piece of artifice, and, on interrogating the woman, found it (as he suspected) to have been concerted by Joab. He therefore sent for him, told him he had gained his point, and ordered him to recall Absalom. Joab, highly pleased with the royal command, immediately went to Geshur, and, without delay, brought Absalom with him to Jerusalem. When the king was informed of his arrival, he ordered him to go to his own house, and there live retired with his family, as he did not yet choose to admit him into his presence; nor would he, by any means, allow him to appear in public.

In this reclusive manner did Absalom live for two years with his family, (which consisted of three sons, and one daughter, named Tamar,) when, being tired of his situation, he sent to Joab, intreating him to intercede with his father for a free pardon. Joab, not complying with his request, he sent to him again; but receiving no answer, he ordered some of his people to go to a field of corn belonging to Joab, and set it instance, strikes the soul with horror, and the impossibility of an innocent gratification loads that horror with desperation. A conflict too cruel and too dreadful for human bearing. Witness the two most remarkable instances of it found in history; that of Antiochus for Stratonice, his mother-in-law; and this of Amnon for Tamar, his sister. Indeed, that of Antiochus appears the less criminal of the two, inasmuch as he seemed determined to conceal his till death, and at the same time to hasten that death to prevent its publication, had not the sagacity of his physician discovered it. Though possibly Amnon had done the same, had not the impurity of his false and subtle friend Jonadab, the son of Shimeah, David's brother, drawn the secret from him. It is lamentable to think that the heirs of royalty, whose virtue is of infinitely more consequence than that of meaner men, should yet be under more temptations to taint it.

on fire. As soon as Joab was informed of this, he went to Absalom, and asked him why he treated him in that manner? Upon which he answered, "I had no other method of getting a sight of you. I wrote to you about interceding for me to my father, but you have not taken the least notice of it. Let me beseech you to try if you can pacify him; for the manner in which I now live is a greater punishment to me than when I was in exile." This had the desired effect. Joab immediately complied with his request, and so far succeeded, that Absalom was ordered into the king's presence. As soon as he saw his father he fell prostrate on the ground, and, in the most humiliating manner, begged pardon for the offence he had committed. Upon this the king took him by the hand, raised him from the ground, and saluted him, as a token of his forgiveness and royal favour.

Absalom re-instituted in the king's favour.

Absalom was, in person, one of the handsomest men in all Israel; nor was his beauty the least impaired by the punishment he had lately undergone. He was remarkable for having a prodigious head of hair, which he had cut once every year; and the quantity was usually so great, that, in general, it weighed about two hundred shekels. This greatly added to the natural beauty of his person; and having a graceful air of address, he was particularly noticed by all ranks of people.

Absalom aspires to the crown.

Courts popularity by dissimulation.

Some time after Absalom was restored to his father's favour (Amnon, his elder brother, being slain, and his second brother dead) he considered himself as presumptive heir to the crown, and thereupon affected a state and equipage greater than usual. He provided himself with chariots and horses, and had a guard of fifty men to attend his person. But notwithstanding all this pomp, he was so obsequious and humble in his manner, as to stoop to the meanest people who had any thing to say to him. He offered his service to all who requested any favour at court; and, at proper opportunities, took the advantage of instilling into the peoples' minds a bad opinion of his father's administration, intimating, that the public affairs were neglected, and that, if he was at the helm, business should be conducted in a very different manner. By these arts and insinuations, which were advantageously seconded by the comeliness of his person, and the familiarity of his address, he gained the hearts of the people, and prepared them for becoming serviceable to his ambitious and treacherous designs.

In the fourth year after the reconciliation took place between David and Absalom, the latter, thinking matters were properly ripe for his purpose, desired leave of his father to go to Hebron, pretending he had made a vow in his exile, that, whenever it should please God to bring him back to Jerusalem, he would offer, in that place, a solemn sacrifice of thanksgiving. The king, little suspecting his hidden design, and being desirous that all religious services should be performed, gave him free permission to go, wishing him a good journey, and a safe return.

Goes to Hebron on a preconcerted design.

Absalom accordingly set out for Hebron, accompanied by a great multitude of people, exclusive of his own guards and attendants, who, not knowing his design, went from a pure motive of attending the sacrifice. As soon as he came to Hebron, he sent for Ahithophel, David's counsellor, and dispatched emissaries into different parts to sound the inclination of the several tribes, and to exhort those, whom they should gain over to his party, to be ready to take up arms, as soon as they should hear that he was proclaimed king.

Ahithophel becomes a principal conspirator.

These emissaries proved very successful in their embassy. Absalom was the darling of the people, who, on the summons, flocked to him from every part; and, being proclaimed king in Hebron, a general insurrection took place.

Absalom is proclaimed king.

In the mean time David, having received intelligence of his son's treachery, and the great success he had met with among the people, thought it not safe to continue any longer in Jerusalem. Leaving, therefore, his palace to the care of ten of his concubines, he set out with a design of retiring beyond Jordan, taking with him the six hundred troops who had so closely stuck by him during the time he was persecuted by Saul, and accompanied by a great number of his most intimate and sincere friends.

When Zadock and Abiathar, the high-priests, understood that David was about to leave Jerusalem, they took out the ark of the Lord to accompany him in his distress; but he desired them to carry it back, and to continue in Jerusalem, as they might be useful in giving him intelligence of the enemy's motions and designs; while their own characters were too sacred to fear any violence from the usurper. Ahimaaz, the son of Zadock, and Jonathan, the son of Abiathar, he left with their fathers, knowing them to be strictly devoted to his interest; but Ittai, the Gittite, who was no less his friend, would not leave him, notwithstanding David earnestly pressed him to continue in the city.

The high priest and Levites desire to accompany him, but are refused.

As David was ascending Mount Olivet, walking barefoot, and the company about him weeping, he received intelligence that Ahithophel was gone over to the faction of Absalom. This gave him great uneasiness, well knowing his distinguished abilities as a statesman; upon which he prayed to God so to infatuate Ahithophel, that he might be deprived of his powers, and thereby rendered useless to his rebellious son and rival.

David hears of the desertion of Ahithophel.

When David had got to the top of the mount, he espied his faithful friend and counsellor Hushai, who had followed him unknown, and, with all expressions of sorrow at seeing him in such distress, earnestly intreated that he might share with him in his fortune. But David enjoined him to return, telling him he would be more serviceable to him in the city, by pretending to adhere to Absalom, and by defeating the counsels of Ahithophel, who was engaged in his son's measures, and from whose great abilities he thought himself in the utmost danger.

Encounters Hushai, a confidential adherent of Sam. xvi.

David had scarce passed over Mount Olivet, when Ziba, whom he had made steward to Mephibosheth, his friend Jonathan's son, accosted him, and presented him with a considerable quantity of wine and other provisions. David asked him where his master was; to which the perfidious wretch replied, he had left him in Jerusalem, where he determined to remain, in hopes, from the present broils, of being himself chosen king. The too credulous David, in this general distraction of his affairs, believing the accusation to be true, made an hasty grant of all Mephibosheth's estate to the base and treacherous Ziba.

Ziba falsely accuses the master, and gains his estate.

When David came near to Behurim, a city belonging to the tribe of Benjamin, one Shimei, a descendant of the family of Saul, who lived there, threw stones at him, and, in the hearing of the whole multitude, loaded him with the bitterest reproaches. This so irritated Abishai, that he begged permission to dispatch the rebel for his insolence; but David would not, by any means, suffer him to commit such a violence. He bore all with great patience and resignation to the Divine will, being conscious of his own guilt in the case of Uriah, and of the Divine justice in thus punishing him for his transgressions.

Shimei curses David, who restrains the resentment of Abishai.

While David was at Behurim, Absalom, and his party, entered Jerusalem, and were received with the general acclamations of the people. Hushai, not forgetting the instructions given him by David, went to Absalom, complimented him on the occasion, and offered him his services. The latter, knowing that Hushai was his father's friend and counsellor, at first bantered him for pretending to desert his old master; but Hushai excused himself in such a manner, and answered all his questions with such subtilties, that Absalom's jealousy ceased, and he admitted him a member of his privy-council.

Hushai perfidiously goes over to Absalom.

Absalom, placing his dependance chiefly on the abilities of Ahithophel, sent for him to consult what measures were most proper to pursue, in order to establish him on his father's throne. The treacherous statesman advised him, first, to lie publicly with David's concubines; "for (says he) by so doing, you will convince the people that a reconciliation can never take place between you and your father; the consequence of which will be, that the soldiers will exert their utmost endeavours in your behalf. They have hitherto been fearful of openly espousing your cause, being apprehensive that if a reconciliation should take place, they might fall victims to your father's resentment." This advice being

HAVING thus far followed the advice of Ahithophel, Abfalom next asked him, what steps he thought most proper to take, in prosecuting the war against his father. Ahithophel asked for ten thousand choice men, with whom, he said, he would set off that very night in pursuit of David: that as his guards must, from the great fatigue of marching, be unable to make any material resistance, he should consequently reduce them to immediate subjection; and he doubted not of bringing back with him the head of David, as a proof of his conquest. Though this proposition was not disapproved of by Abfalom, yet he did not chuse to have it carried into execution, without consulting Hushai. He accordingly sent for him to attend the council; when being informed of what had passed, he did not seem to disapprove of Ahithophel's proposal; but, at the same time, gave it as his opinion, that it would be better to delay the attempt till they had got together a more considerable army: "For (says he) as David and his men are known to be brave, and at this time both exasperated and desperate, if they should defeat the party sent against them, it would be the means of discouraging others, and be thought a very inauspicious beginning; whereas, if you postpone the attempt till you have got together a more numerous army, there is not the least doubt but your efforts will be crowned with success." This advice being universally approved of by the council, it was admitted in preference to that given by Ahithophel.

As soon as the council broke up, Hushai hastened to Zadock and Abiathar, the high-priests, to whom he related all that had passed; and at the same time desired them immediately to dispatch messengers to David, acquainting him with every particular, and advising him instantly to pass the river Jordan, lest Abfalom should change his mind, and, by falling on him suddenly, obtain a victory.

The high priests immediately dispatched their sons on this important business; but, being seen on the way by some of Abfalom's party, whom they found pursuing them, they went out of their road to the habitation of a poor woman, who, in order to conceal them, let them down into a well, and covered the mouth of it with the skins of beasts. When the pursuers arrived, they asked the woman if she had not seen two men lately pass that way; to which she replied in the affirmative, and said, if they were expeditious, they might soon overtake them. They accordingly went some way farther, but not seeing any thing of the people they were after, they gave over the pursuit, and returned by the woman's house in their way to Jerusalem. As soon as the woman found all was safe, she assisted her guests in getting out of the well, and they prosecuted their journey with the utmost expedition. When they arrived at the camp of David, they immediately delivered to him their dispatches; in consequence of which he decamped by break of day, passed the river Jordan, and marched to Mahanaim, a city of Gilead, where he was kindly entertained by the chief of the people, who furnished him with every article necessary for the accommodation of himself and army.

Ahithophel was so irritated at the thoughts of Hushai's counsel being admitted in preference to his, that he determined no longer to assist Abfalom with his advice. He accordingly left Jerusalem, and went to his family at Galmon, the place of his refidence. As soon as he had got home, he assembled all his people together, to whom he related the advice he had given to Abfalom, and the disregard he had paid to it, which, he said, would, in a short time, prove his destruction. He told them, that David would prove victorious, and would be soon reinstated in his kingdom. "Therefore (says he) it is better for me that I put a period to my existence willingly and courageously, than to come under the power of David, and be made an example, by an ignominious death, for having conspired with Abfalom." After saying this, he retired to a private chamber, where he first made his will, and then hanged himself.

In the mean time Abfalom, having got together a very considerable army, (the command of which he gave to Amasa, a relation by marriage,) he left Jerusalem, and passed the river Jordan, in pursuit of his father. David, hearing of his son's approach, and foreseeing that a battle was unavoidable, divided his army into three bodies. The first was commanded by Joab; the second by his brother Abishai; and the third by his old friend Ittai, the Gittite. David intended to have gone with them himself; but, by the importunities of the people, he was prevailed on to stay at Mahanaim. He was, in all probability, more easily dissuaded from his intentions than he otherwise would have been, because the battle was to be against a son, for whom he still retained a tender affection; as a proof of this, he gave the three generals a strict charge, in the hearing of the soldiers, that, in case Abfalom should fall into their hands, they would, for his sake, not only spare his life, but treat him in a manner consistent with the dignity of a royal captive.

The two armies met on a plain near the wood of Ephraim, belonging to the tribe of Manasseh. The battle was exceeding desperate for some time; the one party fighting for the recovery of what they had lost, and the other for the defence and maintenance of what they had got. At length victory declared in favour of David; the army of Abfalom, though much superior in numbers, being totally routed, and put to flight. The loyalists behaved so gallantly that 20,000 of the rebels were killed on the spot, besides great numbers in the pursuit; and the slaughter would doubtless have been carried much farther, had not Abfalom (who was the chief cause of all this mischief) been overtaken and slain. His hair (as we have before observed) was of a prodigious length and thickness, and, as he was in his flight from the enemy, mounted on a mule, and riding with great speed under the trees, with his hair flying about from the quickness of the motion, it entangled on one of the boughs in such a manner, that it lifted him from the saddle, and the beast, continuing its speed, left him suspended in the air, and unable to disengage himself.

In this situation was Abfalom found by one of the soldiers belonging to David's army, who telling it Joab, he blamed him for not having killed him; but the man, in excuse, urged the command which he had heard the king give the generals, to be very tender and careful of his son should he fall into their hands. Upon this Joab commanded the man to direct him to the place where Abfalom was hanging, whither he had no sooner arrived, than he gave him his death's wound with a javelin, and ordered the people who attended immediately to dispatch him. This was accordingly done; after which Joab founded a retreat to prevent any farther effusion of blood, and to give Abfalom's party an opportunity of escaping to their respective homes.

Thus fell the wicked and rebellious Abfalom, whose body, instead of an honourable interment fit for a prince, was taken down, and thrown into a pit, which being filled up, was covered with a heap of stones by way of sepulchre.

Abfalom had, some time before he rebelled against his father, erected (a) a pillar of marble, on a spot called the King's Dale, about two furlongs from Jerusalem. He named it the Hand of Abfalom, and David laments the death of Absalom. His return to Jerusalem. Is reconciled to Shimei, and returns Mephibosheth half his possessions. The Israelites afflicted with a famine. Are again punished with a pestilence, on account of David having numbered the people.

AS soon as the army of David had obtained a complete victory over that of Absalom, Ahimaaz, the son of Zadock, the high-priest, begged of Joab that he might be immediately dispatched with the glad tidings to the king. Joab, at first, did not think proper to comply with his request; but sent a person, named Chusi, in his stead. Ahimaaz still soliciting Joab to let him go, he at length complied; when Ahimaaz, knowing the nearest way, and being more alert than Chusi, got first to David's camp. He found the king sitting at the gate of the city, waiting, with anxious expectation, to know the event of the battle. As soon as David saw him, he hastily asked, "What news from the army?" To which Ahimaaz replied, "Great success, and victory." David then asked, what was become of his son Absalom: to which the other replied, he could not inform him, having been dispatched in such haste, that his orders were only to carry the news of the victory; and that, at his departure, the name of his son was not even mentioned. By this time Chusi arrived; when the king, asking him what was become of his son, he replied, "As it is with him, so may it be with all the enemies of my lord the king."

These words struck David to the heart, and all the joy of victory was immediately turned into sorrow. He withdrew himself to the top of one of the highest turrets in the city, where he gave a vent to his grief, by beating his breast, tearing his hair, and thus exclaiming: "Oh! my son Absalom! my son Absalom! Would to God I could have died for thee, my son!" As for the army, instead of returning in triumph, they stole silently into the city, as if they had done amiss, and, instead of obtaining, had lost the battle.

David was so affected at the loss of his son, that he gave himself up to the deepest melancholy. This was easily perceived by Joab, who being sensible that such excessive grief, at this juncture of affairs, would be of great prejudice to the king, went boldly to his apartment, and expostulated with him on his conduct in the following terms:

"My Lord (says he) you dishonour yourself by this ridiculous and effeminate lamentation. It appears as if you detested the very people, who have preserved your life at the hazard of their own; and that you respect those mortal enemies who have suffered a punishment they justly deserved. If Absalom had overcome us, and possessed himself of the kingdom, he would have begun his vengeance on you and your family, and the whole of us should have fallen in an undistinguished ruin. Both your conscience and your honour ought to check you for this intemperate tenderness for the memory of so implacable an enemy. 'Tis true, he was your son; but he was certainly a most ungracious one; and you cannot be just to God's providence, without acknowledging the blessing of his being taken away. Let me, therefore, beg that you will immediately shew yourself chearfully to your people, and tell them that, next under God, it is owing to their loyalty and courage, you are indebted for the honour of this day. If you persist in your lamentations, your army and kingdom will fall into other hands, and then you will have just cause to weep and lament your absurd conduct."

This speech had the desired effect: the king was roused from his melancholy, and appeared in public, to the great satisfaction of his subjects. He was, however, greatly offended with Joab, for the blunt manner in which he had chastised him; and, as he had thought himself insolently treated by him on several other occasions, he resolved, from this time, to take the first opportunity he could of dismissing him from his military services.

Those of David's subjects, who had appeared in arms against him, being now made fully sensible of the folly of their rebellion, became the forwardest in shewing their loyalty: but, what greatly afflicted David was, his own tribe (that of Judah) appearing very indifferent. In consequence of this he sent to Zadock and Abiathar, the high-priests, not only to remind them of their own duty, but to authorize them likewise to treat with Amasa, who had commanded Absalom's army, and was a man of great authority in the tribe. David told them to offer Amasa a free pardon, and to assure him, that if he would come fully into his interest, he should be placed in the same character that he had been in under Absalom. The high-priests strictly obeyed the king's orders; and Amasa, being satisfied with the promise made him, was readily brought over to the interest of David.

All things thus conspiring to David's happy restoration, he left Mahanaim, and set forward on his journey towards Jerusalem. He was attended by the chiefs of the respective tribes; but those of Judah were now the most forward in shewing their loyalty. They went before him to the banks of the river Jordan, and, assisted by some others belonging to the tribe of Benjamin, laid a bridge over the river, for the better convenience of his passing it with his troops.

Among many others, who came to meet David on this occasion, was Shimei, the Benjamite, who, but a short time before, had loaded him with curses and imprecations. He was attended by a thousand men of his own tribe, whom he brought with him as witnesses of his humiliation for his past conduct. As soon as he saw David he threw himself at his feet, begged pardon for the indignities he had put upon him, and hoped that his early repentance, and return to his allegiance, would, in some measure, atone for his past transgression. Abishai would willingly have had him put to death; but David strongly objected to this proposition, saying, he would not eclipse the public joy with the blood of any one. He therefore gave him his royal word and oath that no harm whatever should come to him on his account; upon which assurance Shimei made his reverence, and departed.

The next distinguished person who appeared before David was Mephibosheth, the grandson of Saul. He was dressed in a very mean habit, with his hair dishevelled, and his clothes rent, in which state he had remained ever since the king's departure from Jerusalem. Having prostrated himself before David, and done him reverence, the king asked him, "Why he did not follow him, and make himself a companion of his flight and troubles?" Mephibosheth replied, that it was owing to the injustice of Ziba, his servant, who, instead of getting things ready for his journey, as he had desired, totally neglected him, and rather treated him as his slave than his master. That he refused getting him his ass to ride on, though he knew, from his great lameness, it was impossible for him to walk. "But, (says he,) this is not all the injury that Ziba has done me: he has also raised calumnies, and forged lies to “ provoke my lord and master against me. But I know thou art so righteously disposed, and such a lover of truth, that thou wilt not give credit to unjust detractions.” Having said this, David resolved neither to punish Mephibosheth, nor to condemn Ziba. He told him, that, believing him to be negligent in his duty, he had given all his possessions to Ziba; but he now forgave him, and promised that one half (a) of his estate should be restored to him. Mephibosheth replied, “ Let Ziba possess the whole: it is enough for me that my lord has recovered his kingdom.”

Is promised great things by the king, but desires to go home.

Another remarkable person who came to wait on David, and pay his respects to him before he passed the river Jordan, was one Barzillai, who had been very kind to him in his exile, and constantly supplied him with provisions while he continued at Mahanaim. After he had paid the king reverence, David, in gratitude for his kindness, invited him to go with him to Jerusalem. Barzillai modestly excused himself, saying, that from his great age (being near fourscore) he had lost the relish of the pleasures of a court, and rather desired that he might retire to his own estate, and spend the remainder of his days in preparing himself for a happy dissolution. David admitted his request; but desired that he would leave with him his son, Chimham, on whom he would bestow some distinguished favours. This being agreed to, Barzillai left his son, and, after paying reverence to the king, and wishing him success in his undertakings, departed to his own home.

The tribe of Judah adheres to David's interest.

Amasa made commander in chief instead of Joab.

He delays, and Joab is sent against the insurgents.

David, having passed the river Jordan, was desirous of making all possible haste to Jerusalem; and, as the tribe of Judah was the first that came to conduct him home, he (probably to gratify them) marched on without waiting for the great men of Israel, who were flocking from all parts in order to join him. This circumstance occasioned some dispute between the princes of Israel and those of Judah; and as the king was unwilling to displease either party, and therefore did not think proper to interfere in the controversy, several of the tribes of Israel took umbrage at it, and an insurrection ensued. Sheba, of the tribe of Benjamin (a man of a factious and turbulent spirit, and probably a descendant of Saul) made public proclamation, by the sound of trumpet, that, “ since the tribe of Judah had engrossed David to themselves, they might even take him; and since all the other tribes had visibly deserted, the wisest way would be to stand to their arms, and take such measures as were most proper for their own security.” In consequence of this many of the tribes followed Sheba; but the men of Judah persisted in their loyalty, and conducted the king to Jerusalem.

The first thing David did, after his arrival in the city, was to clear his palace of his concubines, who had been defiled by Absalom. They were accordingly removed to a building appointed for the purpose, where they were supplied, by the king's especial command, with all things necessary for their subsistence. In this place they were kept during the remainder of their lives, the king never after having the least intercourse with them.

David, having appointed Amasa his general instead of Joab, ordered him to gather together what troops he could from the tribe of Judah, and bring them to him in three days, that he might give him the sole command of them, with orders to march against Sheba. Amasa found more difficulty in executing this order than was expected; and not having accomplished it at the time limited, David sent Joab, accompanied by his brother Abishai, with his guards, and the company of six hundred men, in quest of Sheba, desiring him, as soon as possible, to join his army with that of Amasa, and engage the rebels, lest they should secure themselves in some fortified place, from whence it might be difficult to rout them.

(a) By David's disposal of half Mephibosheth's estate to Ziba, one would imagine that he was much dissatisfied, and doubtful whether Mephibosheth's story was entirely true or not. Nor does David now invite him to diet with him, as he did before, but only forgives him as if he had been wholly guilty. Nor is this odd way of mourning that Mephibosheth made use of, here, and Joab resolved to make no delay; but taking with him his brother, and the troops assigned him, marched in quest of Sheba. When they came to a village called Gibeon, about forty furlongs from Jerusalem, they met with Amasa, who was marching, with all expedition, at the head of a considerable army. As Amasa was to take upon him the sovereign command of the whole troops, Joab advanced with all seeming friendship to salute him on the occasion. In his way he designedly caused his sword to fall from the scabbard, which he took up, and kept naked in his right-hand till he closely approached to Amasa, when, taking him by the beard with his left-hand, as if going to salute him, he, with the other, plunged the sword into his heart, and he immediately expired.

Joab perishes doubly by Amasa.

Joab then ordered a proclamation to be made throughout the army, that Amasa was a bad man, and that he had served him only according to his deserts. As the body of the deceased particularly attracted the notice of the people, Joab, fearful it might produce bad consequences, ordered it to be removed to a private place at some distance; after which he took the command of the troops, and marched, with all expedition, in pursuit of Sheba.

In the mean time Sheba had applied to all the tribes of Israel, to try if he could prevail with them to take up arms against David; but finding very few who were willing to engage in his measures, he was forced at last to shut himself up in Abel, a fortified town belonging to the tribe of Naphtali, in the northern part of Judea.

As soon as Joab received intelligence of Sheba's retreat, he immediately marched to the place, laid siege to it, and made the necessary preparations for an assault: but he was prevented from executing his design by the interposition of a woman, who, getting on the top of the walls, called to the besiegers, and desired she might be permitted to speak to their general.

Joab besieges Abel, where Sheba had retired.

This being granted, Joab approached the walls within hearing, when the woman addressed him as follows: “ It has (says she) been always a custom, founded on the law of God, that whenever the Hebrews came before any city, to offer peace in the first place, even though the inhabitants were of another nation; much more ought it to be done to a people, who are all of the same blood, and the greatest part of them loyal subjects to the king.” Joab replied, “ He had not any ill design against the people of the city; all he required was, that they would deliver up the rebel Sheba, on doing which he would immediately raise the siege, and draw off his army. The woman begged him to desist for a short time, and his request should be complied with, for that the head of Sheba should be thrown to him from the battlements. She then went to the principal people of the city, and expostulated with them to this effect: “ Will ye, (said she,) like traitors, suffer your wives and children to perish for the sake of a villain, whom none of you know? What has Sheba done for you that can balance the obligations you lie under to David? Or, setting aside all other arguments, how can you be so unreasonable as to suppose that you are able to resist the force of so powerful an army as is even now before you? Be quick in your determination, for on that depends either your safety or immediate ruin.” This had the desired effect: Sheba was immediately seized, his head cut off, and thrown over the walls to the soldiers. Joab, according to his promise, immediately raised the siege, and taking with him the head of Sheba, returned with his troops to Jerusalem. David was so pleased with his services on this occasion, that he laid aside his former wrath, and reinstated him in his office of captain-general of his army.

Some time after this there happened a most dreadful famine throughout the whole country; and the long continuance of it (which was for three years) made David suspect it did not proceed from any common cause, but that it was inflicted by the immediate hand of God. He accordingly consulted the Divine oracle, to know the occasion of it, and received for answer, that it arose from Saul's cruelty to the Gibeonites, in having killed great numbers contrary to a treaty which had been sacrilegiously made between him and them. In consequence of this, David sent to the Gibeonites, to know what satisfaction they desired; who returned for answer, that, they expected he would deliver into their hands seven of Saul's posterity. David immediately complied with their demand, by sending two sons of Rizpah, Saul's concubine, and five of Michal, his eldest daughter, choosing to preserve Mephibosheth, from the great respect he had for his father (a). These seven being delivered to the Gibeonites, they put them to death by hanging them on gibbets (b); and soon after the Almighty sent down rain (the want of which had occasioned the famine) to nourish the earth. The ground was no longer parched; the country again flourished, and its accustomed productions appeared in abundance.

The calamity of the famine was no sooner removed, than David's attention was engaged in opposing the Philistines, who, though they had been greatly humbled in the beginning of his reign, having yet some gigantic men among them, again waged war against him. He accordingly marched out at the head of a considerable army, and engaging them, obtained a compleat victory. In this rencounter, however, he narrowly escaped with his life: for one of the Philistines (a man of so large a size, that his lance weighed three hundred shekels) seeing David alone, and quite spent, turned short, and suddenly struck him to the ground: but Abishai, the brother of Joab, coming at the precise moment to his relief, not only preserved the king, but killed the Philistine. The whole army were so sensible of the king's danger, and the interposition of Providence for his safety, that the officers bound him, by an oath, never from that time, personally to engage in battle, lest his natural courage should involve him in the like, or worse misfortunes, by means of which the nation would sustain an irreparable loss, and the people be deprived of those distinguished blessings they had continually experienced under his government (c).

Notwithstanding this defeat, the Philistines were still determined to disturb the peace of Israel. They rallied their forces, and three other engagements took place between them and the army of David, in all which the Philistines were defeated, and, among great numbers of others, four of their gigantic men were slain by David's officers. The last conquest sickened the Philistines, and they relinquished all farther thoughts of interrupting the Israelites.

David being now at leisure from the toils of war, employed his time in composing hymns and psalms, in different measures (such as trimeters and pentameters) to the glory of God. These he ordered to be sung by the Levites on their sabbaths, and other festivals, accompanied with several musical instruments he had provided for the purpose.

The chief of these instruments were, a ten stringed harp, which was touched with a quill; a psaltery of twelve strings, played upon with the fingers; and several large cymbals of brass.

The king had at this time about him great numbers of men of the most approved courage, thirty-seven of whom he called his Worthies, they having performed exploits of the most dangerous and surprising nature. Of these we shall only take notice of the actions of five, by which a tolerable idea may be formed of the achievements of the rest.

The first of these was Itham, the son of Achem, who, in one encounter, broke into the ranks of the enemy, and, with his own hands, laid 800 dead at his feet.

The next was Eleazar, the son of Dodo, who distinguished himself for his great valour and strength, in an engagement at which David was present. The Philistines were so numerous, that the Israelites gave way and fled; but Eleazar maintained his ground, and encountering the enemy, made such a dreadful slaughter among them, that his sword in a manner stuck to his right hand with their blood. This example of bravery animated the whole army, who immediately returned, and falling vigorously on the Philistines, they were totally defeated, and the greater part slain.

The third was Sebas, the son of Hus. This chief also, in an engagement with the Philistines, maintained his ground with such courage, after the Israelites had given way, that he put them to flight, and, from his valour, obtained a compleat conquest. These three heroes, besides the feats already mentioned, performed one of a very singular nature in conjunction. The army of the Philistines lay in the valley of Rephaim, between David's camp and Bethlehem, where they had likewise a garrison. David intimated a desire of having some water from the well of Bethlehem, which being heard by these three chiefs, they found their way through the enemy's camp, and having drawn some water out of the well, returned uninterrupted (the Philistines staring at them with distinguished amazement as they passed) and presented it to the king. When David understood at what price it had been purchased, even at the most imminent hazard of their lives, he would not touch it, but giving God thanks for their safety, poured it on the ground as an offering to the Lord.

The fourth of these champions was Abishai, the brother of Joab, who, in one day, slew 300 of the Philistines with his own hands.

The fifth and last we shall mention was Benaiah, a man of a sacerdotal family. He was challenged by two brothers (Moabites) famous for their military exploits, whom he fought and slew. He likewise engaged with an Egyptian, a man of prodigious strength and size. His adversary was well provided with arms, and himself almost defenceless; but closing

(a) David had given Saul his oath "that he would not cut off his seed after him, nor destroy his name out of his father's house." Had Saul's family committed crimes worthy of death, David's oath would have been no reason against punishing them according to their deserts; and such punishment, if deserved, had been no breach of his oath. If David did not cut off his seed after him, so as to destroy his name out of his father's house, he did not violate his oath to Saul. Now David did not cut off one single person of Saul's family, whose death had a tendency to destroy his name out of his father's house. The seed is always reckoned by the males, and not the females of a family; and the name in a father's house could only be preserved by the male's descendants. But David gave up only two bastards, the sons of Rizpah, Saul's concubine, who were not the legal seed of Saul; and five of the sons of his eldest daughter by Adriel (who could only keep up Adriel's name, and not Saul's;) and hereby observed, without the least violation, his oath to Saul. Not one of the persons he surrendered was capable of succeeding Saul, especially whilst any of the male branches were alive. Now, at this very time, Mephibosheth, Jonathan's eldest son, dwelt in David's family at Jerusalem; and though lame in his feet, yet he was found enough to be the father of a son named Micha, who was at this time old enough to have children, and, indeed, had afterwards four sons, from whom descended a numerous posterity, amounting in the whole (sons and grandsons included) to not less than one hundred and fifty. This was undoubtedly a farther proof that David did not violate his oath to Saul in his treaty with the Gibeonites; but, on the contrary, that he took every measure his thoughts could project of strictly preserving it.

(b) The sacred text informs us, that, as soon as Rizpah knew of this, she had a tent, made of sackcloth, pitched near the place, in which she resided, and kept watch night and day, to prevent the birds and beasts from doing any hurt to the dead bodies. That when David was informed of her pious care, he was moved thereby to take up the bones of Saul, and Jonathan his son, (which had been buried under a tree at Jabesh-Gilead) and, together with these seven sufferers of the same family, gave them an honourable interment in the sepulchre of Kishi, the father of Saul, at Zelah, in the county of Benjamin.

(c) The prohibition of David's going again to battle is thus beautifully expressed in the scriptures: "Thou shalt go no more out with us to battle, that thou quench not the light of Israel;" 2 Sam. xxi. 17. Good kings are, in scripture, justly called the light of the people, (1 Kings xi. 36.) because the beauty and glory, the conduct and direction, the comfort and safety, and welfare of a people, depend on, and are derived from, good kings.

with him, he wrested his spear from his hands, and killed him with his own weapon. But he performed another achievement still more extraordinary than the former. A lion had fallen into a pit from whence he could not extricate himself; and there being at the same time a deep snow, the mouth of the pit (being narrow) was almost closed, which occasioned the lion to let up a most hideous roar. Benaiah, directed by the noise, went to the place, and immediately descending into the pit, struck the lion with his club, and killed him.

Such were the exploits performed by these five champions; and the other thirty-two were no less distinguished for their military prowess.

David, whatever was the occasion of it, suddenly took it into his head that he would know the number of his people, forgetting the command of Moses, who had said, that, on such occasions, there should be an oblation of half a shekel by the head offered to the Lord. He accordingly gave orders to his chief officers to go through the whole kingdom, and bring him an account of all the people. Joab endeavoured to remonstrate against it, in a manner more modest than was customary with him: but the king's orders were positive; upon which Joab, with other officers to assist him, began on the east side of the river Jordan, went round by the other parts of Canaan, and returned to Jerusalem at the end of nine months and twenty days. By the estimate he brought there appeared to be 800,000 men fit to bear arms, and 500,000 in the tribe of Judah only; exclusive of the tribes of Levi and Benjamin, whom he had not numbered.

David had no sooner received the account than his heart misgave him. He knew he had offended the Almighty in what he had done, and intreated pardon by the most fervent prayers and supplication. Soon after the prophet Gad was sent to him with an offer of three things for his choice; namely, a seven years famine; a persecution from his enemies for three months; or a pestilence for three days. The choice of such great evils exceedingly perplexed and confounded David. "If (says he) I choose the famine, it will appear as if I had more care for myself than my people, as it is very unlikely I should be distressed for the want of bread. If I choose a course of unsuccessful battles with the enemy, it will appear the same, having strong holds and castles to which I can fly for safety. But for the last, it is a calamity common as well to kings as subjects, and which strikes terror into all without distinction. I had rather fall into the hands of God, than those of our enemies." David having made choice of the pestilence, God was pleased to send it immediately among the people, and it raged with such irresistible violence, that in a very short time it took off no less than 70,000 souls. It began in the extreme part of the kingdom, and made hasty advances towards Jerusalem, which, when the king and the inhabitants heard, they clothed themselves in sackcloth, and, with all humility, cried unto God for mercy.

A little before the offering up of the evening sacrifice, there appeared an angel (a) over Jerusalem, brandishing a flaming sword, as if going to destroy it; upon which David exclaimed, "Lord, punish the shepherd, but preserve the sheep: pour down thy wrath on me and my family, but let me beseech of thee to spare the innocent people; for 'tis I alonewho have offended thee." The Almighty was pleased to listen to his prayers, by immediately putting a stop to the pestilence. He also ordered David, by the mouth of the prophet Gad, to go, without delay, to the threshing-floor of Araunah, the Jebusite, there to erect an altar, and offer up sacrifices. David obeyed the Divine commands; and when he came to the place found Araunah threshing his corn, who no sooner saw David than he ran to meet him, and after paying reverence, asked him why he came there, and what commands he had for his servant. "I came (says David) to purchase your threshing-floor, in order to raise an altar on it, and to offer sacrifices to God." Araunah replied, "Not only my threshing-floor, but all that I have is at my lord's service gratis; and I humbly beseech God that he will be pleased to accept your sacrifice." David thanked him for his generous offers; but told him, he could not accept of them; for that it must be a purchase, and not a gift, as it would not be right to offer a sacrifice at the expence of another. He therefore gave him fifty shekels of silver for the threshing-floor and some oxen, and immediately offered up sacrifices to God, who, in consequence thereof, was pleased to reinstate him in his favour. This was the place where Abraham brought his son Isaac to sacrifice; but just as he was about to commit the deed, there suddenly appeared a ram, which he took, and sacrificed instead of his son.

David was so happy in the thoughts of his prayers being received by the Almighty, and his sacrifices accepted, that, as a memento, he called the whole place The Altar of the People, and resolved to build a temple in it to the honour of God. This was agreeable to what was afterwards predicted by the Almighty, who sent his prophet to tell David, that a temple should be built in that place by his son, who should succeed him in the government of Israel. In consequence of this prediction he thought his time could not be better employed, than in making some necessary preparations for so great a work. He therefore appointed people to take an account of all the strangers in his dominions, then number of whom, upon an estimate given, amounted to one hundred and eighty thousand. Of these he appointed eighty thousand to be hewers of stone, and the rest to be labourers, except three thousand five hundred, who were to act as superintendants over the rest. He likewise got together great quantities of iron, brass, and cedar wood; the latter of which, by his particular request, was sent him from Tyre and Sidon. When his friends asked him the cause of his gathering together all these materials, he told them, they were to lie by till his son should have occasion for them in building the temple, when it would both save time, and be the means of expediting the work; for as yet he was too young and inexperienced to enter upon so important an undertaking.

CHAP. XI.

David gives Solomon orders for the building of a temple. Adonijah claims the succession. His schemes are frustrated. David causes Solomon to be anointed king. Addresses the people and his son Solomon, who is declared king a second time.

SOME time after this David summoned together the princes of the respective tribes, accompanied by his son Solomon; to the latter of whom he gave a strict charge, that, as soon as he came to the throne, he would immediately enter upon the building of a temple to the honour and worship of God. "I would have done it (says he) myself, but being frequently in war, and consequently polluted with blood, I was expressly forbidden by the Divine command, and the work reserved for you, my son, whom God has predicted shall succeed me in the kingdom. Let me, therefore, beseech you, since the Almighty, even before you was born, designed you to be king, to endeavour to behave yourself in all things worthy of his Providence, by strictly observing piety, justice, and fortitude. Keep his commandments and laws, as taught us by Moses, and suffer not others to transgress them. As to the temple, which God has appointed you to build in your reign, I beg you will attend to it with the greatest diligence, and be not in the least

(a) The judgment against David for his transgressions was sufficiently visible, otherwise he could not have seen the form that the destroying angel assumed; but here we find, that as a most pious man and a good sovereign, he repents of those sins he had committed in the most voluntary manner; and while he looks upon himself as the procuring cause of all the evils that had happened, he begs that God would wreak his vengeance upon him, and not upon his people, who were innocent.

Having made these regulations, David called together an assembly of the magistrates, princes of the tribes, the officers of the army, and those who had the care of the revenue; when, placing himself on an eminence, he addressed them as follows :

gold and silver. God, by his prophet Nathan, has forbid me doing it myself, on account of my having embred my hands in the blood of your enemies; but he has appointed my son and successor to execute it in my stead. Now, since you know our forefather Jacob had twelve sons, and Judah was appointed king over them; and that I, having six brothers, was preferred to them, and received the kingdom at the hands of God, to their satisfaction; I therefore entreat my sons not to be concerned in any rebellion against Solomon, who now hath received the government, but to believe God chose him to be king, and, on that account, with pleasure, pay obedience to his authority. If God had been pleased that a stranger should have enjoyed the chief command, it would have been the duty of every one cheerfully to have owned their allegiance to him; but now a brother has arisen to so high a pinnacle of honour, how great ought to be your joy at so happy an appointment! My prayer is, that the promises God has vouchsafed to make may have the desired effect; and that the peaceful administration under the reign of Solomon, my son, (said David, addressing himself to Solomon,) will be assuredly confirmed to you, if you live an holy life, do justice, and preserve the laws of your country; but if you do not, you will live miserable, and die unlamented."

David's particular address to Solomon.

Delivers him the model of the temple, and the order and form of the necessary apparatus

Enjoins the principal of the tribe of Levi to lend their aid upon the occasion.

The purport of David's address is universally approved.

When David had finished his speech, he gave his son, in the presence of all the people, a plan of the intended temple; the foundation and superstructure of it; the height and breadth; the number of private cells, with their dimensions; and how many vessels should be provided of gold and silver, with the precise weight of each; after which he exhorted him to undertake the building with the utmost cheerfulness. He then desired the princes of the tribe of Levi to give their assistance in the undertaking, not only in regard to his son's youth and inexperience, but in reverence to the Divine commission. He told them the work could not be attended with any great difficulty, he having already provided many talents of gold, but still more of silver; great store of wood, emeralds, and all other kinds of precious stones; with a prodigious number of masons, carpenters, and other workmen. "I have, likewise, (says he,) reserved 3000 talents of the purest gold, out of my own store, for adorning the holy place, and the chariot of God, that is, the ark, which is to be ornamented with a cherub at each end, whose expanded wings will cover the whole."

As soon as David had done speaking, not only the princes and priests, but likewise the whole multitude, shewed their zeal for promoting the work, every one contributing something in proportion to their circumstances. They likewise promised to contribute 10,000 talents of gold, as many of silver, and the like number of shekels. In short, so great was the zeal of the people for having this work executed, that if any person had in his possession a precious stone, he brought it to David to be put into the treasury, the care of which was entrusted to one Jalus, a descendant of Moses.

David was so pleased at this great readiness of the people to facilitate the work, that he offered up his prayers to God on the occasion, calling him the Father and Creator of the universe; the Master of all things both divine and human; the preserver of the Hebrew nation, and the fountain of all that happy and peaceable government they had so long enjoyed. He then wished all happiness to the people in future, and commanded them to offer up their praises to God. They immediately obeyed his commands, fell on the ground, and worshipped; after which they unanimously returned their thanks to David for the great benefits they had received under his administration.

Solomon's anointing as king, and the people's allegiance.

The next day (after offering up sacrifices in abundance) Solomon was again anointed, and acknowledged, by all the people, their lawful king. He was afterwards conducted to the palace, and placed on his father's throne, from which time the people paid him their true allegiance. Zadock, by the general voice of the people, was declared high-priest, in the room of Abiathar, who had publicly espoused the interest of Adonijah.

CHAP. XII.

David's last charge to his son Solomon. His death and burial.

A SHORT time after this, David perceiving his dissolution was near at hand, called for his son Solomon, and gave him this, his last exhortation: "I am now (says he) going a journey common to all, but to a place from whence no traveller returns. Wherefore, while I am yet living, let me remind you of those things I have before said to you; namely, that you exercise your authority with justice over your subjects, humbly obey God, who has been pleased to bestow the government on you, and carefully observe those laws and commandments which he has transmitted to you from our great legislator Moses. Be careful that you are not induced to violate these injunctions, either from the flatteries of your courtiers, your own corrupt desires, or any other cause whatever. If you do, be assured your great and Divine Protector will immediately forsake you; whereas, on the contrary, if you behave yourself towards him as you ought, and as I most sincerely wish, you will confirm the kingdom to your posterity; no other house but ours will sway the sceptre of the Hebrews, but it will be continued to you and yours for ever. Forget not the crimes of Joab, who, through jealousy, put to death two just and faithful generals, namely, Abner, the son of Ner, and Amasa, the son of Ithra: punish him for their deaths, as you shall think fit; for being more powerful than myself, he has hitherto escaped the threats of justice. I beseech you to do all the good offices you can for the sons of Barzillai, the Gileadite, not under the light of an obligation, but as an acknowledgement for the great benefits I received from their father during my banishment, which I reckon as a debt incumbent on our whole family to discharge. As for Shimei, the Benjamite, who reviled me in the days of my persecution, and whom I afterwards pardoned, you may act with him as you think proper; but I would not have him escape unpunished". (a)

A short time after David had delivered this exhortation to his son, he gave up the ghost, in the 71st

(a) The sense of the two charges given by David to his son Solomon relative to Joab and Shimei, are thus expressed by the learned Bishop Patrick. Speaking of the first, he says, "Thou rememberest what Joab did unto me; with what insolence he treated me in the time of the war against Absalom; how, contrary to my orders, he slew him, and afterwards talked to me in a menacing and imperious manner. Thou rememberest what he did to Amasa, whom I intended to have put in his place, and made the general of all my forces; and what to Abner, who adhered to the house of Saul. The injury done to these two brave men redounds upon me, since they were both under my protection, and both murdered, barely murdered, because I had an esteem for them; and till justice be done to their murderer, (which I, in my life-time, have had not power to do) their innocent blood will not depart from my house. Do thou, therefore, take care to atone it; and

"whenever he commits any transgression against thee, let the blood of these two valuable men be charged to his account; and let him, as he has long deserved, be put to death." Speaking of Shimei, he says, "Thou hast Shimei with thee, and some share, perhaps, he may have in thy favour; but trust him not; he is no friend to kings, or kingly power. Remember what he did to me in my distress; how bitterly, how virulently he cursed me to my face; and I make no doubt, but that he would do the same to thee in the like circumstances. I forgave him in my exile, because I looked upon him as an instrument in God's hands, to humble me for my great offence. I forgave him, in my return home, because he came to me when my heart was open, and unwilling to damp the joy of my restoration with the effusion of any blood. I promised him his life; and let not that promise be violated in my days: but what I did is no rule or obligation

71st year of his age, and 40th of his reign; seven of which he governed in Hebron, and thirty-three in Jerusalem (a).

He was a man of most distinguished courage, and possessed all the qualities necessary for the forming of a great king. He was temperate, meek, bountiful, and humane, and never stained the greatness of his authority in any instance, except in the case of Uriah's wife. He left a greater treasure behind him than had been done by any of his predecessors; and the purposes to which he assigned the greater part of it rendered his name immortal (b).

He was buried at Jerusalem with great pomp and magnificence; and his son Solomon deposited in his monument an inestimable treasure. Some idea may be formed of the great riches Solomon deposited in his father's tomb from the following circumstances.

When Antiochus, surnamed the Pious, the son of Demetrius, laid siege to Jerusalem, Hyrcanus, the high-priest, offered him a certain sum of money if he would raise the siege, and draw off his army. This proposition was accepted by Antiochus; upon which Hyrcanus, not having any other method of fulfilling the treaty, broke open David's tomb, from whence he took 3000 talents of gold, with part of which he paid the sum agreed on, and Antiochus immediately raised the siege.

Many years after this king Herod opened another part of David's tomb, from whence he took treasures of great value; of which we shall speak more at large in the Sixteenth Book of this work.

"obligation to thee. Let him not die, however, for his offence against me; but rather watch his conduct, and, if he should chance to give thee a fresh occasion, be sure to lay hold of it, because it is not in his nature to be a good subject."

(a) David was buried, with great pomp, in that part of the city of Jerusalem which himself had taken from the Jebusites, and called, after his own name, The City of David. His sepulchre was always held in the greatest veneration by the Jews. It was in being in St. Peter's time; for so he tells the people, Acts ii. 29. Dio (in the life of Adrian) informs us that part of it was fallen down in the emperor Adrian's reign. Modern travellers describe some magnificent monuments hewed in a rock not far from Jerusalem, which are doubtless very antient; but they do not agree that they are the sepulchres of the kings of Judah. It is, however, somewhat strange, that the place of David's sepulchre (which both the Chaldeans and Romans, when they took Jerusalem, thought proper to spare) should now be so entirely lost, that, for many years past, not the least traces of it have been to be found. But though Providence has so ordered it, that the place of David's sepulchre should not at present be known, yet there does not want an eternal monument of his most excellent genius. The Book of Psalms, which, for the most part, was composed by him, doth publish the glory of its author more than the most pompous eulogies; and the son of Sirach has consecrated an epitaph to his memory, which will remain when brass and marble shall be no more. "As the fat" (says he) is taken away from the peace-offering, so was David chosen from the people of Israel. He played with lions as with kids, and with bears as with lambs. He slew a giant when he was young, and took away reproach from the people; for he called upon the Most High Lord, and he gave strength to his right hand to slay this mighty warrior, and to set up the horn of his people. So the people honoured him with ten thousands, and praised him in the blessings of the Lord; for he destroyed the enemies on every side, and brought to nought the Philistines his adversaries. In all his works he praised the Holy One Most High, and blessed the Lord with words of glory. He set singers also before the altar, that, by their voices, they might make sweet melody, and daily sing praises in their songs. He beautified their feasts, and set their solemn times in perfect order. The Lord took away his sins, and exalted his horn for ever. He gave him a covenant of kings, and a throne of glory in Israel."—Ecclesiasticus, chap. xlvii. 2, &c.

(b) A very learned and celebrated writer, in describing the character of David, says, that his life was loaded with such a multiplicity of the most singular transactions, that, to give it in a compass usual to other distinguished characters, would not be to do him that justice his great merit deserves. He then proceeds to relate the principal incidents that occurred from his first becoming popular to the period that produced his dissolution; and concludes with the following observations: "Such (says he) are the outlines of a Jewish prince, whom Christians justly extol as a man after God's own heart; whom God himself called to be king over Israel; who faithfully answered the purpose for which God raised him; in whose family he established the throne; with whom he made an everlasting covenant; and who was the great progenitor of the Messiah himself, who now reigns over all, and shall reign till all his enemies are put under his feet."

CHAP. I.

Solomon succeeds his father on the throne of Israel. Adonijah conceals a scheme for dispossessing him. He is assisted by Abiathar, Joab, and Shimei. Solomon detects the scheme, and avenges himself on the authors.

THE virtues and prowess of king David, with the singular benefits his subjects derived from him, considered both as a statesman and warrior, during an auspicious reign, have been fully treated of in the foregoing book.

On his demise his son Solomon, who had been by him declared king of Israel, assumed the reins of government amidst the joyful acclamations of the people. He received, upon the occasion, the congratulatory addresses of the heads of all the tribes, with their warmest wishes that he might rule long and happily.

Solomon, however, was no sooner seated on the throne, than a circumstance occurred, which, tho' disagreeable, laid him under a necessity of putting into speedy execution the commands of his dying father. Adonijah, his elder brother, who, during the life of David, made several bold attempts to gain possession of the regal authority, now applied to Bathsheba, the king's mother, and saluted her with those blandishments which seldom fail of effect. When he perceived that she was rendered complacent by his assiduities, he intimated, "That though the crown was his right both by seniority, as well as the will of the people, yet, as it was transferred to Solomon, her son, according to the Divine pleasure, he was contented to act in subordination to him, and perfectly satisfied with his present station; that he had only to request of her that she would use her interest with her son to obtain the royal consent to his taking Abishag to wife." Bathsheba immediately promised to comply with his request, and encouraged him to hope for a joyful event, persuaded, that her son would hardly refuse the joint petitions of two of his nearest relatives, in a matter of such importance as the present. She accordingly repaired to the king upon the subject of Adonijah's request. Solomon received his mother with every token of duty and affection, conducted her into the palace, and placed her on a throne at his right hand. When she was seated, she entered upon the business, and informed her son that she had a suit to prefer, which, if he should refuse, would affect her in the most sensible manner. Solomon, in the most compliant terms, desired her to lay her commands upon him, as it was his duty to grant whatever she should ask. Without farther ceremony she then interceded with him for his royal permission that his brother Adonijah might take Abishag to wife.

The king, highly incensed at the subject of her request, dismissed his mother abruptly, observing, "that Adonijah had aspiring views; that he might have been more explicit, and requested of him the resignation of the kingdom to him upon the claim of seniority, and especially as he had such powerful friends as Joab, the general, and Abiathar, the high-priest, to back his pretensions." To frustrate at once his presumptuous designs, he sent for Benaiah, the captain of the guards, and commanded him to put Adonijah to death (a). Summoning Abiathar, the high-priest, before him, he told him, "that although his treacherous behaviour merited death, he would spare his life in consideration of the services he had rendered his royal father, and particularly the assistance he afforded in bringing back the ark; but that as for his punishment, he should be for ever banished his pretence for his perfidy in repeated instances, and deprived of the dignity of the high-priesthood, as he had rendered himself unworthy of that sacred function."

(a) It was formerly very customary among princes to employ their officers, or greatest confidants, in such like executions. Among the Romans the soldiers were always the persons who carried to prison, to torture, or to execution, such as were found guilty of any offence; and this Tertullian makes an argument to dissuade Christians from engaging in the wars, lest thereby they should be obliged to imprison, punish, or execute malefactors. In Dan. ii. 24. we read, that "Nebuchadnezzar sent Arioch, who was chief commander of his troops,

"to destroy the wise men of Babylon," because they could not interpret his dream; and therefore we need less wonder that we find Solomon employing Benaiah, the captain of his guard, on the like office: but whether he did not first drag him from the altar, before he slew him, for fear of polluting the holy place with blood, or whether Solomon did not rather think fit to have him killed even at the altar, and let all men see that no place, though ever so sacred, should secure any man from the hand of justice, commentators have not agreed.

This circumstance gave occasion for transferring the sacerdotal dignity from the family of Ithamar (as had been foretold to Eli, the grandfather of Abiathar) to that of Phineas, in the person of Zadock. Those who were of the family of Phineas, but lived in private stations during the time the high-priesthood continued in the house of Ithamar, were, computing from Eli, the first that received it; Baccias, the son of Joseph; Jonathan of Baccias; Marceoth of Jonathan; Arapha of Marceoth; Achitob of Arapha; and Zadock, the son of Achitob, who was first made high-priest in the reign of David.

Joab, the general, alarmed at the punishment of death inflicted on Adonijah, and conscious that, from his own treachery, he merited the same, fled for sanctuary to the altar, apprehending, from the king's known veneration for religion, that he should thereby be protected. But when the king was informed that Joab had taken sanctuary, he commanded Benaiah to raise him from the altar, and bring him to the tribunal of justice, to answer the charge alledged against him. Joab would not leave the altar, averring, that if he must die, he would die there. When Benaiah reported his resolution to the king, Solomon commanded his head to be cut off there, as a just punishment for the execrable murders of Abner and Amasa, the two captains of the host, in violation of the laws of justice, humanity, and honour. Orders were likewise given by the king to Benaiah to see his body interred, and a memorial to posterity of his flagitious crimes, and an acquittal of himself and his father from the imputation of rigour on the death of Joab. Benaiah, having executed his commands, succeeded Joab as commander in chief, as did Zadock, Abiathar as high-priest.

With respect to Shimei, Solomon gave express orders, that he should build him an house in Jerusalem, be confined to that spot, nor pass the brook Hebron upon pain of death. He was also enjoined, in confirmation of the king's will and pleasure, to make a solemn oath to obey the orders. Shimei acknowledging the candour and clemency of the king, readily made an oath of compliance, and, leaving his own country, took up his abode in Jerusalem. About three years afterwards two of his servants ran away from him, and hearing that they were at Gath, he went over the river in quest of them. On his return the king received intelligence of it; and such was his displeasure at his abuse of his clemency, and contempt of his commands, as well as violation of his own solemn oath, that he expressed himself to the delinquent in terms to the following effect: "Didst thou not solemnly swear to me, that thou wouldst never depart this city to the day of thy death? Now, like an impious, perjured wretch, thou hast violated thine oath, and for this most heinous of crimes thou shalt die. Remember, that Divine vengeance, sooner or later, will find out the offender, and that forbearance will aggravate the punishment. Justice is due to the indignities thou didst offer my royal father. Think of these things, and vindicate thyself if thou canst." Upon this Benaiah put Shimei to death at the king's command.

Solomon espouses the daughter of the king of Egypt. Repairs the walls of Jerusalem. His extraordinary wisdom, opulence, and power. Epistolary correspondence between him and the king of Tyre. SOLOMON having firmly established himself on his throne, avenged himself of his enemies, and conciliated himself to his friends, took to wife the daughter of the king of Egypt. His next concern was to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem upon a more extensive and defensible plan than the former; after which he applied himself to the administration of public justice. Nor was his youth any impediment to him in the execution of his duty as king, respecting either the awarding of justice, the enforcing of the laws, or the fulfillment, with religious reverence, the commands laid upon him by his venerable father in his dying moments. Nay, his conduct was such in general, as might have become the gravity and judgment of an old and experienced monarch.

In this interval of profound peace both at home and abroad, he resolved to go to Hebron, and sacrifice to God upon the brazen altar that was erected by Moses, in acknowledgment of the many mercies he had received. He accordingly repaired thither, and offered a thousand victims for a burnt offering. This distinguished instance of pious zeal was so pleasing in the sight of the Almighty, that he appeared to him in a dream the following night, and commanded him to ask of him some gifts he was ready to bestow, as a reward for his dutiful and grateful regard. Solomon asked that which was most excellent in itself, what the bountiful donor could bestow with the greatest approbation, and what was most profitable for man to receive. He did not desire either gold or silver, nor any of those gratifications, to which mankind in general, and young persons in particular, are too fondly attached. On the contrary, his petition was, "Give me, O Lord, a sound mind and a good understanding, whereby I may judge the people according to truth and righteousness." This petition was so acceptable to the Almighty, that he not only promised him wisdom and understanding in such a degree as no other mortal ever possessed, but glory, riches, and victory over his enemies; and further, that the government should remain in his family for many years, if he continued righteous and obedient to him, and trod in the steps of his pious father. When Solomon heard these words he awoke, leapt from his bed, worshipped and gave thanks; after which he returned to Jerusalem, offered great sacrifices before the tabernacle, and feasted all the people.

In those days a difficult case was brought before him to determine; and I think it necessary to explain the matter, in order that the reader may form a judgment of Solomon's abilities and rectitude, and that future kings may follow his example, in points which affect the interests of their subjects.

Two harlots applied to him for justice. The plaintiff first related her tale in words to this purport. "This woman, O king, and I dwell together in one house. We both bore a son at the same hour. On the third day the woman against whom I prefer my complaint overlaid her son and killed him; then taking mine to herself as I was asleep, laid her dead son in my arms. Being desirous, in the morning, of giving the infant the breast, I found it was not my own; and persuaded that it was this woman's dead child, I demanded my own; but not being able to obtain him, I had recourse to my lord the king for justice. For, as we were alone, and there is no evidence to convict her, she obstinately perseveres in a denial of the fact."

When this woman had finished her tale, the king demanded of the other what she had to say in her defence. Upon her denial of the charge brought against her, and affirming that her child was living, and that of her opponent dead, and none present being able to decide the point in controversy, the king devised the following method of discovering the merits of the cause. He ordered both the dead and living child to be brought in; then commanded one of his guards to fetch a sword, and cut both the children in halves, that each of the women might have half the living and half the dead child. This was deemed a trifling proceeding at first; but it caused the real mother of the living child to exclaim against it, and consent that the child should be delivered to the other woman as her own, declaring she would be satisfied with the life of the child, and with the sight of it, although it were esteemed the other's. The other woman submitted to the judgment, and was ready to see the child divided; nay, seemed to take a pleasure in seeing the mother tormented.

mented. Now the king wisely inferring that their respective behaviour, upon the occasion, was, from the impulse of their passions, adjudged the child to her who cried out to save it, as the real mother, and condemned the other as a wicked woman, who had not only killed her own child, but was endeavouring to destroy that of her friend (a). This determination was applauded by the multitude as an evident token of the king's extraordinary sagacity, and they ever after looked on him as a prince endowed with a Divine understanding.

Solomon's determination universally approved.

■ Kings iv. Principal officers.

Solomon's great officers were the following: Uri, the son of Hur, presided over the tribe of Ephraim, including Bethlehem. Aminadab, who married the king's daughter, had the region of Dora and the sea coast under him. The great plain was under Benaiah, the son of Achil. He also governed all the country as far as the river Jordan. Gabaris, the son of Geber, ruled over Gilead and Gaulanitis, as far as mount Libanus, and had under him sixty large and well fortified cities. Ahinadab, who married another of Solomon's daughters, directed the affairs of Galilee up to Sidon. Baanah had the sea coast about Asher. The mountains Itabar and Carmel, and all the Lower Galilee to the farther side of Jordan, was under the command of Jehoshaphat; as was the whole country of the Benjamites under that of Shimei. And Tabar governed the country beyond Jordan. These governors were all under the superintendence of one lieutenant-general.

The people cultivate the arts of peace.

The Hebrew nation, and particularly the tribe of Judah, were now in a flourishing condition; for as they enjoyed the invaluable blessings of peace and plenty, unmolested by the distractions and tumults of war, they applied themselves to agriculture and other arts, and by that means advanced both their fame and fortunes.

The magnificence and splendour of Solomon.

The king had likewise other rulers, who were over the land of Syria, and other barbarous parts between Egypt and Euphrates, and these collected the receipts from the tributaries. These people contributed towards the daily supply of the king's table thirty measures of meal, ten fat oxen, twenty oxen out of the pastures, and an hundred fat lambs, besides deer, birds, fish, and other sporting productions. He had so vast a number of chariots, that there were forty thousand stalls provided for the horses that belonged to them, besides twelve thousand horsemen that were his guards; the half of whom were quartered at Jerusalem near his person, and the other half distributed throughout the villages adjacent to the city. The same officer who superintended the supply of the king's table was commissary-general for the household.

Solomon's wisdom.

His immense literary productions.

The wisdom and knowledge of Solomon were so great, that he exceeded the ancients in philosophical attainments, and was infinitely superior to the Egyptians, who were reputed to be the most accomplished people of their age. He also excelled the most celebrated of his countrymen and contemporaries: those were Athan, and Heman, and Calcol, and Dodan, the sons of Hemahon. He composed fifteen hundred books of poems, and three thousand of parables and similitudes. He wrote an history of plants, from the cedar to the hyssop; as also of beasts, and living creatures in general; for he was a consummate natural philosopher, and therefore perfectly ac-

(a) The distinguished penetration and wisdom of Solomon in adjusting this intricate affair, is not to be paralleled in any history, either sacred or profane. He saw at once, that the only sign whereby to discover the true mother, would be her affection and compassionate tenderness for the child; and therefore, in order to distinguish between the two, his business was to make trial of them. And if we suppose, that, when he commanded the child to be divided, he spoke with a sedate countenance and seeming earnestness (as the true mother's petition to the king makes it apparent he did) then we may suppose farther, that not only the two women, but all the people present, were struck with horror, at the thoughts of the design being carried into execution, which, when it ended in so just a decision, quite contrary to what they expected, raised joy in every breast, and gave a more advantageous commendation to the judge. It is the opinion of some, that Solomon made a discovery of the truth antecedent to this experiment; that, by observing the countenance, the manner of speech, and all the motions of the quainted with their respective properties. He adapted the universal knowledge with which God had favoured him to the good of mankind, according to their particular exigencies. He composed incantations for the cure of diseases, and left behind him a prescribed method for the expelling of demons, and this method is of great force even at this day. I saw one Eleazar, in the presence of Vespasian, his son, his officers, and a multitude of his soldiers, dispossessing people of demoniacal spirits. This was his method: he put a ring, that had a root of one of those sorts prescribed by Solomon, to the nostrils of the person possessed, which, by the smell, caused the expulsion of the demon, when Eleazar, reciting the name and incantations of Solomon, adjured it never to trouble him more. Eleazar, in order to demonstrate that he had such a power, placed a cup of water a little distance from a man who was possessed, and adjured the demon, on his leaving the man, to overturn it, and thereby make it known to the spectators that he had quitted him. This proved the extraordinary abilities of Solomon, to confirm which I have inserted this narrative.

Eleazar calls out a Demon.

When Hiram, king of Tyre, who had lived in friendship with the late king of Israel, heard of Solomon's accession to the throne on the demise of his father, he sent ambassadors to congratulate him on the occasion. Solomon, on their return, sent an epistle to Hiram couched in the following terms:

A King, Hiram, ambassador to Solomon.

"Solomon to Hiram greeting,

"Be it known unto thee, O king, that David, my father, would have built a temple to God; but being, during the whole course of his reign, engaged in wars, and subduing his numerous enemies, he could not prosecute his design, and therefore left it to me to accomplish in a time of peace and tranquillity, according to the Divine prediction. That time I shall now dedicate to that solemn and important purpose. Therefore I make it my earnest request that thou wilt send some of thy subjects with mine to mount Libanus, to assist in cutting down timber, in which the Sidonians are more skilful than our people. Their wages shall be paid at such a rate as thou shalt determine."

Solomon's epistle to Hiram.

Solomon's epistle was highly approved by Hiram, who returned him this answer:

"Hiram to king Solomon greeting,

"Nothing could have been more grateful to me than to hear that the crown of your excellent father has devolved, through Divine Providence, to so wise and virtuous a successor. Your desire shall be punctually and cheerfully complied with. I will issue my command for the cutting down and exportation of such quantities of the fairest cedar and cypress trees as thou mayest require. My subjects shall bring them to the sea side, and ship them away to what port thou pleasest, in order that thy subjects may transport them to Jerusalem. In exchange thou wilt supply us with corn, of which commodity we islanders stand much in need."

women, he discerned the secrets of their heart, and penetrated to the bottom of the business; and that his commanding the children to be divided afterwards, was only to notify to the company what he before had discovered. However this be, it may not be improper, upon this occasion, to mention an instance or two of singular addresses, though much inferior to this, in discovering such secrets as seemed to be past finding out. Suetonius, in his life of Claudian, tells us, that emperor discovered a woman to be the mother of a young man, whom she would not own for her son, by commanding her to be married to him; the horror of committing incest having obliged her to declare the truth. In like manner Diodorus Siculus relates, that Ariopharnes, king of the Thracians, being appointed to arbitrate between three men, who all pretended to be sons of the king of the Cimmerians, and claimed the succession, found out the true son and heir, by ordering them to shoot each man his arrow into the king's body, which one of them refusing to do, was deemed the lawful claimant.

cords, so that, for satisfaction, any one may apply to the keeper of those records, in which will be found full confirmation of what we have advanced. I refer the reader to this proof to acquit myself of the charge of stating any thing but matters of fact, or compiling an history of subjects doubtful and unauthenticated in order to deceive and amuse at the same time. The merit of an historian centers in an undeviating adherence to facts, from which, if he swerves, no consideration can exculpate him; so that we desire nothing that we advance may be admitted, unless we appear able to demonstrate its truth by the most undeniable authority.

Solomon was highly pleased with the ingenuous and frank behaviour of the king of Tyre, in token of which he ordered him a yearly present of two thousand measures of wheat, and likewise two thousand vessels of oil, and as many of wine, containing each seventy-two quarts. This was an earnest of friendship between these two kings, which was daily more and more confirmed.

The king laid a tribute on the people in general, to provide thirty thousand workmen, including artificers and labourers, whose employ he rendered easy, by an impartial and candid distribution of time. He appointed ten thousand to cut timber upon Mount Libanus for the space of one month, who were then to be relieved by the next ten thousand, and so on throughout, by which means each ten thousand were regularly and itatedly employed, and had an equal proportion of labour and rest. Adoniram was appointed superintendant of the whole work. There were also seventy thousand strangers left by David, who were to carry stones and other materials, and eighty thousand stone-cutters or masons: of these thirty-two thousand were overseers. They were ordered to cut out large stones for the foundation of the temple, and have them wrought upon the mountain ready to be conveyed thence to Jerusalem. Hiram's people were also employed in this preparatory work.

Solomon began to build the temple in the fourth year of his reign, in the second month, which the Macedonians call Artemisius, and the Hebrews Jar, four hundred and eighty years after their exit out of Egypt. It was also in the reign of Hiram, king of Tyre, and two hundred and forty years after the building of that city. And the whole, notwithstanding its prodigious extent, and the great number of different apartments contained in it, was fully completed in less time, by upwards of 190 years, than was taken to build the famous heathen temple of Diana in the city of Ephesus.

By order of the king the foundation of the temple was laid very deep, and the materials were such as would resist the force of time and other incidents. These were so united and wedged into the rock, as to become a basis for the superstructure to be erected over it. The walls were all of white stone, from the ground to the roof. The height and length were each sixty cubits, and the breadth twenty. There was also another building, of the same dimensions, raised above it; so that the entire altitude of the temple was an hundred and twenty cubits: its front was to the east. The porch, next to the entrance, was twenty cubits in length, ten in breadth, and an hundred and twenty in height. There were also built round about the temple thirty small rooms, in the form of galleries, opening one into another: each of these rooms was five cubits in length and breadth, and in height twenty. Above these were two other floors of the same form and proportion, reaching altogether to the lower part of the fabric; for these galleries were raised no higher than the top of the first story. The roof, that covered in the whole, was of cedar; and every partition had its peculiar roof, independent of any other; but they were all fastened together by long and large beams, so that they appeared but as one piece. Under these beams were several displays of carving and gilding. Indeed, the whole fabric was so ornamented, that its transplendence dazzled the eye of the beholder. The whole structure of the temple was of polished stone, put together with such art, that no joint was to be seen, or the least sign of an instrument of architecture; but as if, without any use of them, the entire materials had naturally united together; and the agreement of one part with another, seemed rather to have been the effect of Providence and nature, than the production of art or human invention.

The king had an admirable contrivance for an ascent to the upper part, which was by winding stairs, cut through the thickness of the wall; for the second story had not a large door at the east end, as the lower had. The inside of the temple was lined with cedar, and the junction of the beams by iron-work added great strength to the building.

Solomon caused the temple to be divided into two parts; that is, the inner part, or Holy of Holies, of twenty cubits square, which was inaccessible; and the other of forty cubits, which was assigned to the use of the priests. In the partition-wall, betwixt the inner and outer part of the temple, were large cedar doors, superbly gilded and elegantly carved. There were also veils of different colours, beautifully interwoven with variegated flowers, to be drawn before those doors.

He also dedicated for the most holy place two cherubims of massy gold. They were each five cubits high, and had two wings stretched out to the same extent; so that with one wing they might touch the south side, and with the other the north. With the other two wings they overspread the ark, that was placed between them.

The very floor of the temple was overlaid with gold. In a word, there was no part, internal or external, but what was covered with gold; nor was there any thing wanting that could contribute to its splendour and magnificence.

The king sent for an eminent artificer from Tyre, whose name was Chiram. His mother was of the tribe of Naphthali, and his father, by extraction, an Israelite. This man's chief skill lay in working in gold, silver, and other metals. He was, therefore, employed in the most curious pieces of mechanism about the temple, according to the direction of Solomon. He cast two brazen hollow pillars four fingers thick in the metals, eighteen cubits in height, and twelve in circumference. Two chapiters of brass for the tops of the two pillars, five cubits each. These were covered with a kind of brass net-work; and below them were flowers, or lily-work, of the same contrivance, with two rows of pomegranates hanging down, an hundred in each row. One of these pillars was placed at the entrance of the porch on the right-hand, and called Jachin; the other on the left, and called Boaz.

Solomon also caused this artificer to make a brazen sea, the figure of which resembled an hemisphere. This vessel was also called a sea, from its largeness; for the laver was ten feet in diameter, and cast of the thickness of a palm. The middle rested on a stout pillar, that had ten spirals round it, and that pillar was a cubit in diameter. Around it were placed the figures of twelve oxen, facing, by three and three, the four cardinal points, north, east, west, and south. This brazen sea contained three thousand baths.

There were also made ten brazen bases for so many quadrangular lavers: the length of each of these bases was five cubits, and the height six cubits. The several pieces were cast apart, and then thus put together. There were four small quadrangular pillars, one of which stood at each corner. These had the sides of the base fitted to them on each quarter: there was a three-fold partition: every interval had a border fitted to support the laver, upon which was engraven in one place a lion, and in another place a bull and an eagle. The small pillars had small animals engraven on the sides. The whole work was elevated, and stood upon four wheels, which were also cast, had knaves and spokes, and were a foot and an half in diameter. It was admirable to observe with what exactness the spokes of the wheels were turned and united to the sides of the bases, and, indeed, the curious manner in which the whole was wrought. This was their structure. Certain shoulders and hands stretched out held the corners above, upon which rested a short spiral pillar, that lay under the hollow part of the laver, resting upon the forefeet of the eagle and the lion, which were adapted to them, insomuch that those who viewed them would imagine

Solomon requites the liberality of Hiram.

Above these were two other floors of the same form and proportion, reaching altogether to the lower part of the fabric; for these galleries were raised no higher than the top of the first story. The roof, that covered in the whole, was of cedar; and every partition had its peculiar roof, independent of any other; but they were all fastened together by long and large beams, so that they appeared but as one piece. Under these beams were several displays of carving and gilding. Indeed, the whole fabric was so ornamented, that its transplendence dazzled the eye of the beholder. The whole structure of the temple was of polished stone, put together with such art, that no joint was to be seen, or the least sign of an instrument of architecture; but as if, without any use of them, the entire materials had naturally united together; and the agreement of one part with another, seemed rather to have been the effect of Providence and nature, than the production of art or human invention.

The king had an admirable contrivance for an ascent to the upper part, which was by winding stairs, cut through the thickness of the wall; for the second story had not a large door at the east end, as the lower had. The inside of the temple was lined with cedar, and the junction of the beams by iron-work added great strength to the building.

Solomon caused the temple to be divided into two parts; that is, the inner part, or Holy of Holies, of twenty cubits square, which was inaccessible; and the other of forty cubits, which was assigned to the use of the priests. In the partition-wall, betwixt the inner and outer part of the temple, were large cedar doors, superbly gilded and elegantly carved. There were also veils of different colours, beautifully interwoven with variegated flowers, to be drawn before those doors.

The temple divided into the sanctuary and the most holy places.

He also dedicated for the most holy place two cherubims of massy gold. They were each five cubits high, and had two wings stretched out to the same extent; so that with one wing they might touch the south side, and with the other the north. With the other two wings they overspread the ark, that was placed between them.

The golden cherubims.

The very floor of the temple was overlaid with gold. In a word, there was no part, internal or external, but what was covered with gold; nor was there any thing wanting that could contribute to its splendour and magnificence.

The whole work sumptuous and magnificent beyond description.

The king sent for an eminent artificer from Tyre, whose name was Chiram. His mother was of the tribe of Naphthali, and his father, by extraction, an Israelite. This man's chief skill lay in working in gold, silver, and other metals. He was, therefore, employed in the most curious pieces of mechanism about the temple, according to the direction of Solomon. He cast two brazen hollow pillars four fingers thick in the metals, eighteen cubits in height, and twelve in circumference. Two chapiters of brass for the tops of the two pillars, five cubits each. These were covered with a kind of brass net-work; and below them were flowers, or lily-work, of the same contrivance, with two rows of pomegranates hanging down, an hundred in each row. One of these pillars was placed at the entrance of the porch on the right-hand, and called Jachin; the other on the left, and called Boaz.

Chiram the principal artificer.

1 Kings vii. Two pillars of brass.

Divers curious pieces of workmanship.

Solomon also caused this artificer to make a brazen sea, the figure of which resembled an hemisphere. This vessel was also called a sea, from its largeness; for the laver was ten feet in diameter, and cast of the thickness of a palm. The middle rested on a stout pillar, that had ten spirals round it, and that pillar was a cubit in diameter. Around it were placed the figures of twelve oxen, facing, by three and three, the four cardinal points, north, east, west, and south. This brazen sea contained three thousand baths.

The brazen sea.

There were also made ten brazen bases for so many quadrangular lavers: the length of each of these bases was five cubits, and the height six cubits. The several pieces were cast apart, and then thus put together. There were four small quadrangular pillars, one of which stood at each corner. These had the sides of the base fitted to them on each quarter: there was a three-fold partition: every interval had a border fitted to support the laver, upon which was engraven in one place a lion, and in another place a bull and an eagle. The small pillars had small animals engraven on the sides. The whole work was elevated, and stood upon four wheels, which were also cast, had knaves and spokes, and were a foot and an half in diameter. It was admirable to observe with what exactness the spokes of the wheels were turned and united to the sides of the bases, and, indeed, the curious manner in which the whole was wrought. This was their structure. Certain shoulders and hands stretched out held the corners above, upon which rested a short spiral pillar, that lay under the hollow part of the laver, resting upon the forefeet of the eagle and the lion, which were adapted to them, inasmuch that those who viewed them would imagine imagine they were of one piece. Between these were engravings of palm-trees. This was the construction of the ten bases.

lavars.

To these bases he made ten lavars of the same metal, each containing forty baths, the height four cubits, and the diameter the same. These ten lavars were set upon as many bases, that were called mechenoth. They were all placed in the temple; five of them on the left hand, on the north side; and the other five at the south side, on the right, looking towards the east. In the same place also was the brazen sea. They were all filled with water. The sea, for washing the hands and feet of the priests, upon entering the sanctuary, and ascending the altar; and the lavars for cleansing the entrails of the beasts, and other parts of the burnt-offering,

He erected also a brazen altar, of twelve cubits in length and breadth, and ten in depth, for the service of the Holycausts, providing the same with all the necessary vessels, made of the purest brass.

Divers tables.

The king likewise dedicated a great number of tables, and one of pure gold for the shew-bread, larger than the rest. There were many others not much inferior to that for the shew-bread, sufficient to hold twenty thousand golden vessels, and forty thousand silver ones,

The golden

He also provided twelve thousand candlesticks, according to the appointment of Moses. One of them was peculiarly dedicated to the service of the temple, to be kept burning in the day time, according to the law. The table for the shew-bread was placed on the north side, over against the candlestick, which stood on the south: but the golden altar stood between them. All these vessels were contained in the fore part of the temple, which was forty cubits long, and were before the veil of the Holy of Holies, where the ark of the covenant was to be kept.

There were also made pouring cups, in number eighty thousand, and ten thousand golden vessels, with twice as many of silver. There were eighty thousand golden dishes, and twice as many of silver, for the purpose of offering kneaded fine flour at the altar. Golden measures, such as the mosaical hin and assaron, twenty thousand, and as many of silver. The golden censers, in which they carried the incense to the altar, were in number twenty thousand. The other censers, in which they carried fire from the great altar to the smaller one within the temple, were fifty thousand.

The sacerdotal garments, which belonged to the high priests, with the long robes, and the oracle, and the precious stones, were a thousand. But there was but one crown, upon which Moses inscribed the venerable name of one Supreme, and that hath remained to this day. There were also made ten thousand sacerdotal garments of fine linen, with purple girdles, for priests in ordinary; and two hundred thousand trumpets, according to the institution of Moses: also two hundred thousand garments for the Levites, who composed the choir. These were furnished with four hundred thousand musical instruments, as harps, psalteries, and the like, made of a mixed metal, between gold and silver, to accompany the voices.

These expensive and magnificent preparations were made towards the advancement of this mighty work, undertaken for the honour of the Divine Being; nor was there any thing wanting that could express the pious zeal of the Founder, or tend to animate that of the people in general. When the preparatory part was executed, the church-articles were deposited in the sacred treasury, and set apart for religious uses.

Round about the temple was a partition, called in the Hebrew, Gifon: it was raised to the height of three cubits, in order to exclude the multitude from the place into which the priests only were to be admitted. Beyond this partition was another building, with large galleries about it, and four stately gates, that opened each towards one of the four quarters. The doors were plated and inlaid with gold. Into this place people entered in common, provided they were duly observant of the laws.

The erecting of this outward building was an undertaking stupendous beyond description. There were such depths to be filled up as must strike the inclining gazer with horror. Ten hundred cubits to be brought up to a level with the top of the mountain, to make the work regular, and the ground even. This was encompassed with a double row of cloisters, supported by pillars of native stone. The doors were of silver work, and the roof and wainscots of cedars highly polished.

When king Solomon had finished this stupendous fabric in the short interval of seven years, which, considering its magnitude and numberless ornaments, well almost infinite appurtenances, seems to require the extent of ages to accomplish, he wrote to the elders, and heads of the tribes, to summon the people up to Jerusalem, to see the temple, and to assist in removing thither the ark of the covenant. The resolution was duly notified; and, in the seventh month, which the Hebrews call Thuri, and the Macedonians, Hyperberetæus, they were, with much difficulty, assembled. The feast of tabernacles happened to fall at the same time, which, by the Hebrews, is accounted the most solemn of their festivals; so the priests carried the ark, and the tabernacle which Moses had pitched, together with the vessels appertaining to the altar, and lodged them in the temple. The king himself, and the whole congregation, with the Levites, proceeded then with their sacrifices and oblations, sprinkling the ground as they passed with blood, and burning an immense quantity of incense, till the very air itself seemed to have imbibed the most fragrant odours, and, as it were, transfused them throughout the multitude, who inferred, from so pleasing a circumstance, that it was an indication of the Divine Presence, vouchsafing to honour the temple thus newly built and dedicated unto himself; for the whole congregation expressed tokens of joy and exultation, during the course of the time in which they were transporting the ark into the temple.

When they were come to the most sacred place, where it was to be deposited, the multitude withdrew, and the priests, who brought it, placed it under the two cherubims, which, environing it with their wings, as framed by the artificer, covered it as under a tent or copul. It contained nothing else but the two tables of stone with the ten commandments graven upon them, as delivered to Moses upon mount Sinai. The candlestick, table, and golden altar, were placed in the same order now in the sanctuary, as they were at first in the tabernacle, when they offered their daily sacrifices. The brazen altar, by order of Solomon, was placed directly against the door, that when it was opened, a full view might be exhibited of the magnificence of the sacred solemnities. The rest of the vessels were collected and deposited in the temple.

When the ark was properly disposed, and the priests had withdrawn, a thick cloud hovered over the place, not resembling that which portends rain and storms, but of a more temperate kind, and such as had, upon former occasions, indicated the Divine Presence and approbation, so that the present was looked upon as a token of the same, and that the grand object of their worship would deign to dwell amongst them in the temple they had dedicated to his service.

While the people were intent upon the awful solemnity before them, the king arose and addressed the Almighty, in a stile and manner suitable to the importance of the occasion. His prayer was to this effect: "Father of all, thou that inhabitest eternity, and hast raised out of nothing the stupendous fabric of this universe, the heavens, the air, the earth, and the sea; thou that fillest the whole, and every thing that is in it, and art thyself unbounded and incomprehensible; look down in mercy upon thy servants, who have presumed to erect a temple to the honour of thy sacred Majesty. Vouchsafe then, Lord, to hear our prayers, and accept our oblations. Thou that seest and hearest all things, look down from thy exalted throne, and deign to give ear to the supplications of thy people in this place. Thou that never failest to assist them who call upon thee, grant us thy aid, and afford us thy gracious favour."

After this solemn address to the Supreme Being, Solomon directed his attention to the multitude, and in a pathetic speech, represented to them the many instances in which the Divine Power and Providence had been exerted in their behalf. He laid before them the important things that had been revealed to his father David (some of which were past, and others were to come) concerning himself, his succession to the throne, his building of the temple, the establishment of the family, and the prosperity of the nation. The use he made of these remarks was, to admonish them to bless God for mercies received, in consequence of his gracious promises, and to rely on the same infallible word for the fulfilment of what had been predicted concerning greater blessings.

After this brief, but significant, discourse to the multitude, the king again turned toward the temple, and, with his right hand uplifted, thus again, in humble address, applied himself to the Almighty. "Lord, what are all the returns of which man is capable, compared even with the least of thy mercies? O! how can we requite the smallest of thy bounties? All that we can do is to render thee praise, acknowledgment and thanksgiving. This is, indeed, an honour conferred upon mankind, in distinction from all other creatures; so that it becomes my bounden duty to adore and praise thy holy name for the singular favours bestowed on our house, and thine infinite goodness towards the whole people of Israel. Be pleased, therefore, to accept our most grateful acknowledgments in the only way we are capable of expressing them: First, for thy singular goodness to my deceased father, in raising him from a state of obscurity to the highest pitch of glory; and next for making good to thy servant before thee, all thy gracious promises in his favour. Continue thy bounty to us, as to thy chosen people. Preserve, prosper, and perpetuate the government in our house, according to thy gracious promises to my father, living and dying. Let thy holy spirit descend upon this temple, and though heaven and earth cannot contain thy glorious Majesty, much less a fabric wrought by the hands of mortals, deign to afford it thy Divine presence and protection: Preserve it from the power of enemies as thine own, and set apart for thy peculiar service. If this people, by their offences, should at any time provoke thee, in just displeasure, to visit them with famine, pestilence, or any other judgment, be pleased, O Lord, upon their humble supplications to thee in thine own house, to accept of their repentance, and deliver them from their afflictions. This I most humbly implore, not only for the Hebrews, but for all people in general, who shall offer up their prayers to thee in this holy place. Hereby it will appear to the whole world, that this is thy house, and that we are thy people; and further, that such is our good-will to mankind, as to desire that they may all participate of the blessings of thy providence."

After this humble address to the Father of Mercies, Solomon cast himself on the ground, and worshipped in the most lowly posture, then arose and offered sacrifices upon the altar, having the satisfaction of being assured, by an evident token, that his oblations were acceptable to the Almighty: for a flash of fire from above rushed with violence upon the altar, and instantly consumed the offerings. The whole multitude looked upon this prodigy as a demonstration of the Divine Presence, and therefore fell prostrate in humble adoration of God's goodness, in thus owning both the worship and the temple. Upon this the king proceeded to offer praises and thanksgivings, and exhorted the multitude to do the same, as now having sufficient indications of God's special favour towards them. He enjoined them to pray for the continuance of his mercies, and especially his Divine grace, that they might live in holiness and righteousness, and the strictest observance of those precepts which God had given them by Moses. This he recommended as the only means of securing the happiness of the Hebrew nation, and, indeed, rendering them blessed above all nations upon the face of the earth: observing furthermore, that the best way to secure their felicity, was to persevere in the paths by which it was obtained.

When the king had thus spoken he dismissed the assembly, having first compleated his oblations for himself and his people: they consisted of twelve thousand calves, and one hundred and twenty thousand lambs. This was the first blood that was spilt in the temple, and the Hebrews, with their wives and children, feasted thereon. There was also celebrated, at the same time, with great solemnity, the feast of tabernacles, which lasted fourteen days, at the king's expence.

The feast of tabernacles.

After these solemnities were duly performed, and nothing omitted that related to the Divine worship, the people returned to their respective habitations, warmly acknowledging the wisdom, care, and bounty of the king, and adding their prayers to God for the continuance of his life, and the prosperity of his reign. They also joined in hymns and psalms of thanksgiving to the Fountain of all their mercies, and expressed, in every instance, tokens of joy and gratitude.

The ark being brought into, and deposited in, the temple, and the beauty and magnificence of that glorious structure exposed to view, the congregation dispersed. The king, in a dream, was assured that his sacrifices had been accepted, and his prayers heard by the Almighty; that he would preserve the temple, and make it the place of his abode; that is, so long as he himself, his people, and posterity, should continue to walk before him in pureness of heart, according to the example of David, his father. Upon that condition he was promised to be advanced to the summit of earthly glory, and that a prince should never be wanting of that line, of the tribe of Judah, to sway the sceptre of the throne of Israel. But that, on the contrary, if ever they should depart from the Divine ordinances, and fall into idolatry, they should be extirpated from the face of the earth, and Israel be no more a people; but, after having sustained all the ravages and calamities of war at home, be turned into the wide world as vagabonds and exiles. He was further assured, that, in case of such apostacy, the temple, lately erected by the Divine permission, should be ransacked by the hands of barbarians, and the city of Jerusalem itself laid in ashes by an inveterate and inexorable enemy. Nay, such should be the devastation as to excite the wonder of mankind, that a people, so lately the envy of nations, for their power, opulence, and renown, should so suddenly be reduced to the most abject state, by the very hand which had exalted them. Then should they, too late, under the sharpest stings of conscience, exclaim "We have forsaken our God, abandoned the laws and religion handed down by our forefathers, and thus are we punished for our sins and transgressions." This was the purport of what was communicated to Solomon in the vision, as we have transmitted in the sacred records.

After finishing the temple, as before observed, in the course of seven years, the king laid the foundation of his palace, in the perfecting of which he was thirteen years; for he was not so zealous for the accomplishment of this undertaking, as he had been for that of the temple. The building of the temple, a work of vast extent and importance, was greatly furthered by the Divine blessing and assistance, or it could not have been compleated in so short a space of time. But the palace, which was a building much inferior in dignity to the temple, both on account that its materials had not been so long beforehand prepared, and also as it was an habitation for kings only, and not for the One Supreme God, was longer in finishing. It was, however, a very magnificent structure, and did honour both to the prince and people. But to form an adequate idea, and gratify the curiosity of the reader, it will be necessary to enter upon a description.

This palace was an extensive and curious building, supported by many pillars, after the manner of a common hall, for the purpose of hearing causes and determining suits. It was an hundred cubits long, fifty broad, and thirty high: nor could it be less capacious, to contain the vast multitudes that thronged thither from all quarters to obtain justice. It was supported by sixteen square columns of cedar. Its roof was of the Corinthian order; and it had folding doors curiously wrought, and so as to render it at once firm and ornamental. In this hall was another edifice of thirty cubits square, raised upon massy pillars. In one of the apartments was a throne of state, whereon the king himself sat personally in judgement. Next to this was the queen's house, and other buildings adapted for the purpose of retirement and recreation. These were fitted up with cedar, and raised upon stones of ten cubits square, which were partly plain, and partly overlaid with the most precious marble, after the manner of magnificent palaces or temples. The rooms were hung with three depths of the richest hangings, and ornamented with images in sculpture, representing trees, plants, branches, and leaves, all so curiously wrought as to appear to the eye as if they were in motion. The remainder of the space, up to the ceiling, was embellished with delicate party-coloured figures, upon a ground of white. Besides these there was a great variety of other chambers, long and spacious galleries, superb rooms of state, and others for feasting and entertainment, adorned and furnished with services of plate of massy gold. Indeed the variety and extent of the royal palace may be said to surpass description, as they exceeded every thing of the kind in the known world, and exhibited a magnificence almost beyond conception.

Solomon's throne.
Kings x.

To complete the dignity of his character, Solomon erected a large ivory throne, with curious and carved engraved work upon it, after the fashion of a tribunal. There were six steps upon the ascent, and at each end of every step was the figure of a lion. There were also two lions more above; that is, one on either hand of the seat of state. As the king rested on his throne, there were arms put forth in order to receive him; and the figure of a bullock placed in a proper posture under him for his support. The whole piece was covered with gold.

Solomon acknowledges the liberality of Hiram.

When Solomon had completed these magnificent structures in the course of twenty years, through the assistance of Hiram, king of Tyre, who had contributed a great deal of gold, and more of silver, besides a vast store of cedar and cypress wood, he sent him annually, as an acknowledgement, great quantities of corn, wine, and oil, commodities of which, as an islander, he stood much in need. He also offered him twenty cities in the land of Galilee, adjoining to his own country; but Hiram, with a respectful excuse, declined acceptance. From this refusal, that part of the country was called Chabalm, which, in the Phœnician language, signifies, It does not please me.

Friendship between Hiram and Solomon, who solves all difficult and intricate points.

So great a veneration had Hiram for the sagacity of Solomon, that whenever any difficult case or mysterious question was propounded to him, he applied to him for a solution; nor was that wise prince deficient in explaining the most ambiguous matters, or intricate problems. Menander, the historian, who translated the Tyrian annals from the Phœnician into the Greek language, makes mention of these two princes as follows: "On the demise of Abibalus, Hiram, his son, succeeded him in the kingdom of Tyre. He lived three and fifty years, and reigned four and thirty. He raised a bank in a large space called the Great Field, and dedicated the golden pillar in Jupiter's temple. He cut down abundance of timber upon the Mount Libanus for the roof of temples, and demolishing ancient buildings, he erected new ones to Hercules and Astarte. He built a statue for Hercules in the month of Peritius. He made an expedition against the Eyceans for neglect of the payment of tribute, and having overcome them, returned home. In his reign there was one Abdemonus, a young man, who undertook to give Solomon, the king of Jerusalem, a solution of all mysterious questions that were put to him."

Testimony of Menander.

Testimony of Dios, the historian.

Dios also writes to this effect: "Abibalus, being dead, was succeeded by his son Hiram, who raised the east quarter of the city, enlarged the borders, and brought the temple of Jupiter, that before stood apart, within its compass, as well as enriched and adorned it with most valuable presents. He ordered cedar wood to be cut down on Mount Libanus for the building of the temple." He further writes, "That Solomon, the king of Jerusalem, sent problems and riddles to Hiram, upon the forfeiture of a considerable sum if he failed to expound them. That such problems and riddles were not only solved by means of Abdemonus, a "Tyrian, but that other cases were propounded by him to Solomon, who was to pay a great forfeit upon failure of explanation." Thus far goes the testimony of Dios, respecting the intercourse between those princes.

The fortifications of Jerusalem being deemed insufficient for the defence of that spacious and opulent city, Solomon applied himself to the erecting of such towers, and the completion of such repairs, as he found requisite for the security of the place. He also rebuilt and fortified several cities of considerable note, as Asor, Magedon, and Gazara, in the land of the Philistines; the latter of which king Pharaoh had taken by assault; and having levelled and slain all the inhabitants, gave it as a present to his daughter upon her marriage with Solomon. This city the king rebuilt, as it was naturally very strong, and equally useful to government in peace and in war. He also built not far distant, Betachora and Baeth, besides other places for the purposes of health and pastime, from the temperature of climate, delicacy of fruits, and conveniencies of air and water. When he had built this city, and encompassed it with strong walls, he called it Thadamora, which name it bears among the Syrians to this day. The Greeks call it Palmyra.

If any should enquire wherefore all the kings of Egypt, from Minæas, the founder of Memphis, many years before our forefather Abraham, until the days of Solomon, being an interval of thirteen hundred years, should be called by the name of Pharaoh, it is deemed expedient to give them this information: Pharaoh, in the Egyptian language, signifies king. I apprehend, that they went by other names from their childhood, but, on coming to the exercise of the regal dignity, they exchanged the distinction of the family into that which denoted their authority. Thus it was that the kings of Alexandria, who were called formerly by other names, when they assumed the reins of government, were all called by the name of Ptolemy, from the first of their kings. Thus it is with the Roman emperors also, who, upon their elevations to that dignity, are styled Cæsars, in consequence of their assumption to the sovereign power. Perhaps this was the cause that occasioned Herodotus, of Halicarnassus, in his account of the successors of Minæas, the first king of Memphis, to call them in general by the name of Pharaoh, though they amounted in number to three hundred and thirty. When a woman succeeded to the government she was called by her proper name Nicaulis, the appellation of Pharaoh being peculiar to the other sex. Nor can I discover from our own history, that after Pharaoh, the father-in-law of Solomon, there was ever any other king called by that name. I am also well assured, that this Nicaulis was the queen of Egypt and Ethiopia, that came afterwards to Solomon; but of this more hereafter. I have rather dwelt upon these particulars to prove the agreement of our history and that of the Egyptians.

In process of time Solomon subdued to himself the remnant of the Canaanites betwixt Mount Libanus and the city Amathe, who, for some time, disputed their allegiance to the kings of Israel, till Solomon at last made them tributaries, upon condition of furnishing him yearly with such a certain number of slaves, as was agreed upon to be employed in tilling the land, and other sorts of servility; for none of the Hebrews were subject to servile employments; nor would it have been proper for conquerors to descend to do the business of their captives. With respect to the Israelites, their genius lay more towards arms and military exploits. The Canaanites, in the mean time, were kept to their labour; and six hundred officers were appointed to superintend them in their respective employments.

The king fitted out many ships in Ezon-Geber, an Egyptian bay upon the Red Sea. It is now called Bernico, not far from the city of Elan. This place formerly belonged to the Hebrews, and became useful for shipping from the donations of Hiram, king of Tyre, who also sent him a number of skilful navigators and expert pilots. These served the king's officers for guides to the land of Ophir, which belongs to India, where they went for four hundred talents of gold, and brought them to the king.

the ears of Nicaulis, queen of Egypt and Ethiopia, excited in that princely, who possessed a great share of understanding, much desire to see our celebrated monarch. She wished to be satisfied by her own experience, and not trust to report alone, respecting his magnificence and wonderful qualifications. With this view she set forward towards Jerusalem with a train and equipage suited to her royal dignity, taking with her a number of camels, laden with gold, variety of rich perfumes, and of precious stones. The king, upon her arrival, received her with all possible honour, courtesy, and respect, solved all the difficult questions she proposed, inasmuch that she was struck with wonder at his various excellencies. She could not but admire the magnificence of his palace, the discipline and oeconomy of his household, and the peculiar grace and propriety with which he conducted his affairs in general. But nothing gave her so much satisfaction as that masterly fabric called the Grove of Lebanon, which displayed such singular beauties. She was likewise infinitely pleased with the daily sacrifices, and the application, care, and veneration with which the priests and Levites performed their parts in the worship. The whole she beheld impressed her mind so sensibly, that, in the height of her amazement, she addressed the king in words to this effect:

"Great prince, report is so doubtful and uncertain, that, without an experimental and demonstrative confirmation of the truth of what we hear, we are forced to suspend our judgment, especially when the fame of things relates either to extreme good or evil. But with respect to your incomparable faculties, that is to the advantages of the mind in a superlative degree of knowledge and understanding, and the glory of your outward state, the rumour has been so far from partial, that it falls short even of common justice. For tho' report conveyed as much to your honour as words could express, I have yet the happiness at this present time to see much more than I heard. Blessed are the Israelites; blessed are the friends and people of Solomon, that stand even before him and hear his wisdom; and blessed be God for his goodness to this land and nation, in placing them under the government of so excellent a prince."

Nor did this great princess testify her admiration of the wisdom and magnificence of Solomon by words alone as mere professions; but, as a farther instance of the high respect she entertained for the king, she presented him with twenty talents of gold, together with a great quantity of aromatic spices, rich perfumes, and precious stones to a considerable value. They speak also of a root of balsam that she brought with her, which, according to tradition, was the first plant of the kind that ever came into our country, where it has been extensively propagated ever since.

Solomon, on his part, was not wanting in making a suitable acknowledgement of the favours conferred upon him; for he not only presented the queen with whatever she asked, but added several articles which he thought attracted her fancy. After this reciprocal interchange of presents, the queen of Egypt and Ethiopia returned, highly gratified, to her own country.

About the same time the king's fleet returned from Ophir (otherwise called the land of gold) bringing precious stones and pine wood in abundance. The latter was made use of for pillars and supporters to the temple and palace, and partly for the construction of musical instruments, such as psalteries, harps, and cymbals, which the Levites use in their hymns during the course of divine worship. The wood that was brought upon this occasion, was larger and finer than any that had ever been brought before. Let it not, therefore, be imagined, that this pine wood was like that which is so named by the merchants in order to enhance its value in the esteem of the purchaser. It has somewhat of the grain of the fig-tree, but is more white and glossy. It is deemed proper to make this remark, that the reader may form a just estimate of so valuable a commodity.

Solomon received by this fleet six hundred and sixty-six talents of gold, exclusive of the merchants' adventure, and what the governors and princes of Arabia sent him for presents. Of this gold he caused to be cast two hundred targets, weighing each six hundred shekels of gold, and these were hung up in the great hall of the Grove of Lebanon. He also made cups of gold and of precious stones for the purpose of entertainments, and had them embellished with exquisite art. Indeed his utensils in general were made of this rich metal. No money passed in the carrying on of this traffic; for the king had many ships in the sea of Tarsus which carried out all kinds of merchandize to the remotest parts; so that his subjects exchanged their commodities for gold, silver, ivory, negroes, apes, &c. They finished their voyage usually in the course of three years.

The fame of Solomon's wisdom, power, and riches, having by this time extended to the remotest parts, several of the most potent princes were desirous of being witnesses of the same, and embraced every opportunity of testifying their veneration for his character by their submission and munificence. They sent him gold and silver plate, purple robes, spices and perfumes of all sorts; horses, chariots, and mules for burthen, such as they thought for strength and beauty would be most acceptable to the king. In short, the richest presents were sent him from every quarter; and it was the prevailing ambition of the princes of that time to behold the magnificence, and attend to the instruction, of the renowned king of Israel.

By the presents last-mentioned, Solomon had an addition of four hundred chariots to what he had before; that is, he now had a thousand chariots, and twenty thousand horses, which, in beauty and speed, excelled all others. Their riders were also a further ornament to them, being men in the flower of their age, compleatly disciplined, and elegantly arrayed, with the advantage of an intermixture of golden threads with their locks, which, irradiated by the sun, exhibited a most splendid view to the spectators. This was the guard which, with their accoutrements, attended the king, mounted in his chariot, and clothed in white on particular occasions, and especially in his morning excursions to a seat he had at Ethan, which, from its situation, gardens, and fountains, became his favourite spot.

The king's sagacity and providential care appeared in the minutest instances. He did not neglect the superintendence of the high-ways that led to his palace at Jerusalem; but ordered them to be paved, as well for the ease and convenience of passengers, as the support of his own regal dignity. He also disposed his chariots in regular order, so that a certain number should be kept in a town upon free quarter, and these places were called his chariot towns. Silver was as plentiful in Jerusalem in these days as stones; and cedars, which had never been seen in Judea before, were now as common as sycamore trees. He gave commission to his Egyptian merchants to procure him a chariot, with a pair of horses at the price of six hundred silver drachmæ each; and these were sent to the kings of Syria and beyond Euphrates.

But though Solomon was become the most glorious of kings, the most favoured of heaven, and exceeded, in wisdom and riches, all his predecessors, and indeed all monarchs upon the face of the earth, he did not preserve in this happy state to the time of his death. The latter actions of his life greatly sullied the glories of the former. It is a melancholy truth, that he departed from the laws of Moses, and the religion of his forefathers; and that, prompted by inordinate desires, and not satisfied with women of his own country, he cohabited promiscuously with those of various nations, such as Sidonians, Tyrians, Ammonites, Idumæans, &c. in violation of the law expressly forbidding any Hebrew intercourse of that kind with strangers; it being natural to conclude, that strange women would allure men to the worship of strange gods. This was the true cause of the precaution against such marriages; for the transgression of one law is but a step towards the breaking of another; and the taking of a prohibited wife would produce, of course, the embracing of a prohibited religion.

It soon appeared that Solomon's inordinate desires were beyond the controul of sobriety and reason. He had no less than seven hundred wives, who were princesses, princesses, and three hundred concubines; and the passion he had for the personal charms of some, and the captivating demeanour of others, transported him into compliances with them in the impiety of their practices and opinions, as the most effectual proof he could give them of his affection. As he grew more advanced in years, he experienced a decay both of his mental and corporeal powers; and as he became more remiss in the exercise of the true worship, he was the more easily prevailed on to join with these strange women in a false one (a): though he had been guilty of a flagrant transgression of the law before, in the very figures of the bulls under his brazen sea, and in the lions afterwards, that were set as a guard upon his throne, which were directly in breach of a positive commandment. He had, at the same time, a most glorious precedent in his pious father, whose steps were recommended to his example in a vision from on high, upon pain of the Divine displeasure, and the infliction of the direst calamities on himself and people.

This sad apostacy highly offended the Almighty, who was pleased to send a prophet to him with a message to this effect: "That his wickedness could not be hid from God's all-seeing eye, and that he should not long go unpunished." With respect to the promise made to his father, the prophet told him his government should not be taken from him while he was living; but that, after his death, his son should suffer for the iniquities of his father; not that there should be an universal defection, but that ten tribes only should revolt, and the other two continue in their allegiance to the son of Solomon, for the sake of his grand-father David, and for the sake of the temple of Jerusalem, which God had chosen for his peculiar habitation on earth.

This severe chastisement, which foretold the removal of Solomon from the summit of human glory to the contrary extreme, wounded him to the very soul; and, to add to its poignancy, he could not but acknowledge the justice of the sentence.

Soon after this prediction by means of the prophet, God raised up a bitter enemy against him. His name was Adad, an Idumæan by birth, and of the blood royal. His animosity to Solomon arose from the following circumstance. When the Hebrews over-ran the country of Idumæa, under the command of Joab, who at that time was David's general, this Joab, having subdued the people, put to the sword all the males he could find in the province, that were able to bear arms; and this massacre continued for the space of six months. Adad, who was then in his youthful state, happening to make his escape, fled to Pharaoh, king of Egypt, who not only received him with great humanity, but generously gave him houses, lands, and revenues for his support; nay, such was his affection for him, that, on his arriving to years of maturity, he gave him his own wife's sister in marriage, who bore him a son, that was trained up with the children of Pharaoh.

In process of time news was brought to Egypt of the death of David and Joab; and Adad, upon these tidings, asked permission of Pharaoh to return to his own country. The king, not being pleased with this request, asked him what was the cause of his so earnestly desiring to leave the best friend he had in the world? Adad repeated his solicitations for some time, but could not prevail.

But when Solomon's affairs began to decline, on account of his fore-mentioned transgressions, and the Divine indignation for the same, Adad, with Pharaoh's permission, returned to Idumæa, with a design of stirring up the people to a rebellion against Solomon. On his arrival at the place he found the garri-son so strong, and the country in such a posture of defence, that nothing could be done effectually by surprize. He therefore adopted another plan, and went from thence into Syria, where he joined interests with one Rezon, a fugitive from his master Adadezer, the king of Zobah, and a famous leader of a body of banditti, who pillaged up and down at pleasure. Adad struck a league with this man, and, with his assistance, subdued that part of Syria, where he was declared king, and made such inroads upon the territories of Solomon, as perplexed him greatly in the declining part of his reign.

But, besides these indignities from a stranger and a fugitive, Solomon found a more dangerous enemy in his own nation. This was Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, a man of turbulent and ambitious spirit, who had an expectation of rising from a prophecy that had been made to him long before. Jeroboam being left by his father, when very young, to the care of his mother, and Solomon observing that, as he grew up, he became of a bold and enterprising disposition, made him overseer of his works, being at that time rebuilding the walls of Jerusalem. He executed that office with such care and attention, that Solomon gave him, as a reward, the military command over the tribe of Joseph.

As Jeroboam was one day going out of Jerusalem, he was met on the way by the prophet Ahijah, who having saluted and taken him aside, laid hold of his garment, that was new, and rent it into twelve pieces, bidding him take ten of them to himself, as it was the Divine pleasure and will it should be so. The prophet added, that the government should be wrested from Solomon; but that, for the sake of the Divine promise, the two contiguous tribes should be given to his son; but the other ten to Jeroboam, as a punishment for giving himself up to strange women, and, through their influence, to strange gods. He concluded with admonishing him to take warning from Solomon's miserable case, and observe the statutes and commandments according to the example of pious king David, as the only security of the continuance of the Divine favour and protection.

Jeroboam was much elated at the words of the prophet, and being naturally of an haughty and aspiring temper, whatever conduced to gratify his ambition, rendered him turbulent and restless. The prediction of the prophet was strongly impressed on his mind; and therefore the first step he took, after he came to the army, was to tamper with the people he commanded, and instil in their minds the spirit of disaffection to their sovereign.

The malicious designs of Jeroboam were soon made known to Solomon, who concerted a plan to surprize and dispatch him; but the plot being discovered, he made his escape, and fled to Shishack, king of Egypt, and there resided till the death of Solomon furnished him with an opportunity of prosecuting his intentions.

C H A P. III.

On the demise of Solomon, Rehoboam ascends the throne. Becomes obnoxious to the people. Ten tribes revolt; and Jeroboam, made king, introduces idolatry. He is reproved by a prophet. Jeroboam and Rehoboam equally wicked and idolatrous.

SOLOMON, after a reign of eighty years over Israel, departed this life in the ninety-fourth year of his age, and was interred with great funeral pomp at Jerusalem. He was superior to all his predecessors in wisdom and opulence; and might have been deemed so in happiness, had not an inordinate attachment to women, in the decline of life, precipitated him into actions that sullied the glories he had acquired. But of these, with their consequent punishments, we shall treat in the sequel.

On the death of Solomon, the government of course devolved to his son Rehoboam, who was born of an Ammonite, called Naama. He repaired immediately to Shechem to declare his succession, and obtain the suffrages of the people. Jeroboam, who

(a) It is astonishing that a person of Solomon's wisdom should have been persuaded by his wives to forsake a religion in which he had been so well instructed, and which he was so fully convinced to have been delivered to Moses by that Omnipotent Being who had brought the Israelites from a land of bondage, placed him on the throne of David, and inspired him with that wisdom which rendered him famous throughout the earth. It affords, however, a striking lesson to all mankind to beware of the insatiation of vice, since even a Solomon was not secure from its delusions, and, when once unhappily immersed in it, seems never to have disengaged himself from it.

The IDOLATRY and APOSTACY of JEROBOAM, King of Israel, which was followed by the death of his favourite Son, and the dreadful Calamities of his Subjects. — Published as the Act directs by J. Cooke N^o 17 Paternoster Row, Jan. 2. 1780.

was then in Egypt, being urged by some of the rulers, hastened thither also on the same errand.

On his arrival he applied, together with many of the heads of the tribes, to Rehoboam, and advised him to adopt a mild form of government, (observing that, in some instances, his father was oppressive;) and, instead of rendering himself an object of terror to his subjects, his safety and happiness required him to regulate his conduct in such a manner, as to obtain an acquiescence with the measures he pursued from an affection to his person, rather than a dread of his power.

This they humbly recommended to his consideration; and Rehoboam desired them to return in three days, when he would give them an answer. The delay raised some jealousy in the minds of the people as to the result; for they considered that so reasonable a request could not be denied, especially by a young prince, if disposed to promote the interest and happiness of his subjects. However, as suspension by no means implied a denial, they waited the event with hopes of success.

In consequence of this general application, Rehoboam called together the friends and counsellors of his late father, and requested of them their advice respecting the answer he should give to their request. Being well affected to the public cause, and acquainted with the disposition of the people, they recommended to him, by all means, to treat them with courtesy and condescension; assuring him that he would gain much more upon them by a popular freedom, than by assuring the formalities of majesty and state; nothing being so conducive to gain and preserve the loyalty of a people, as the condescension and affability of their prince.

More sage counsel could not have been given on a general or particular occasion: indeed it was peculiarly applicative to Rehoboam's present situation, having a kingdom in immediate view. But so infatuated was this young prince with the thoughts of his elevation, that he not only rejected it, but applied to persons of his own age and disposition, determined to abide by their opinion. They debated on the point, and, through want of experience, and heat of passion, advised him to return the people an answer to this effect; "That since they complained of his predecessor, they should feel more weight from his little finger than they had done from the loins of his father: that if they thought themselves oppressed before, they must expect more oppression now: and that if his father had chastised them with whips, he was determined to chastise them with scorpions."

The weak king was highly pleased with this pertinacious reply, suggested by counsellors as weak as himself, thinking it consonant with his false ideas of majesty: so that upon the third day, when the people assembled in the utmost anxiety of hope and fear, he appeared, and delivered his answer to them precisely in the words which the young men had recommended. It seems as if it had been so ordered by Divine Providence, that the prophecy of Ahijah might be fulfilled; for these words, uttered with all the pomp of state, so enraged the multitude, that they exclaimed, as with one voice, "What have we to do with the house of David? Let him take to himself the temple that his father built." And this seemed to forebode a general revolt.

When Rehoboam understood this, he sent Adoram, one of his officers in the treasury, to pacify them, by laying the blame upon some rash and vehement young men: but the people, deaf to all his exculpatory arguments, instantly stoned him to death. The king, thinking this violence pointed at himself rather than his officer, thought it high time to consult his own safety; so that he hastened to his chariot, and fled to Jerusalem. The tribes of Judah and Benjamin abided by him, and proclaimed him king; but the rest of the Israelites made choice of Jeroboam, declaring they would never again acknowledge the sovereignty of a descendant of David. Thus was this great kingdom divided into two parts, and ever after went under different denominations, namely, the kingdom of Judah, and the kingdom of Israel; though the latter included the whole before.

Rehoboam, fired with indignation at this revolt, summoned a full convention of the two tribes that stood firm to their allegiance, and drew out 180,000 soldiers, proposing to himself, with this body of men, to march against the other ten tribes, and, by force, reduce them to obedience.

While he was preparing for this enterprize, he received a visit from a prophet, who, by the Divine direction, advised him to desist from prosecuting a civil war; because it was the will of God that the division of the kingdom should come to pass, that the prediction of Ahijah might be fulfilled.

We shall now advert to some of the actions of Jeroboam, king of the Israelites; and thence proceed to the history of Rehoboam, and the two tribes, in due order.

Jeroboam enlarged and beautified Shechem, built him a palace, and made it a royal city. He likewise repaired Penuel, a fortified place on the other side the river Jordan, where he likewise built a palace, to which he frequently resorted, in hopes of gaining over the affections of the two tribes that were attached to Rehoboam.

The time was now near for celebrating the feast of tabernacles; upon which Jeroboam reflected, that if his people should repair to Jerusalem to celebrate that festival, the ceremonies of religion might so far operate on their minds, as to induce them to acknowledge allegiance to his antagonist, whereby both his life and government would be in imminent danger. For prevention, he bethought himself of this expedient. He caused two golden calves and two temples to be formed; the one at Bethel, and the other at Dan, which is a town situated at the head of the Lesser Jordan. These images were consecrated in both places; after which he summoned the ten tribes under his command, and thus addressed them:

"It is unnecessary, my friends and countrymen, to mention the omnipresence of the Deity: in whatever place we are, he hears and accepts the prayers we offer him. I therefore conceive, that, for the exercise of your religion, it will be totally needless to undertake a tedious journey to Jerusalem. You will be at no loss for the want of priests or Levites. The builder of the temple was but a mortal like ourselves. The golden calves, which are placed in the temples at Bethel and Dan, have been consecrated as well as the temple at Jerusalem. Therefore let such as are inclined to execute the sacerdotal function, qualify themselves by sacrificing a calf and a ram; by which ceremony alone, Aaron, the first of that order, was initiated into the priesthood."

By these plausible means the people were seduced into apostacy from the true worship of their God, and the established laws of their country; and Jeroboam was of course the author of all the calamities that afterwards befel them, as we shall shew in due time and order.

The festival of the seventh month, or the feast of tabernacles, was now approaching; and Jeroboam formed a resolution of worshipping the same way at Bethel, that the two tribes did at Jerusalem. To give countenance to this innovation in religion, he erected an altar before the golden calf, assumed to himself the character and office of high-priest, and, having gone through the different ceremonies, according to the form of the temple worship, proceeded at length to that of the sacrifices. But, as he was preparing to put fire to the victim, in the sight of all the people, there came a prophet from Jerusalem, named Jadon, at that very crisis, and interrupted him. Having made his way through the multitude, he advanced to the altar, and thus exclaimed; "O altar! altar! there shall raise one out of the house of Judah, Josiah by name, who upon thee shall destroy the false prophets, seducers, and impostors of these times, and upon thee shall burn their bones. That there may be no doubt of this prediction being fulfilled, its authority shall now be confirmed by a sign. Behold the altar shall be rent, and the fat of the sacrifices that are upon it shall be poured forth upon the ground."

The king was so incensed at this speech from the prophet, that, stretching out his hand, he commanded the people who stood by to seize him; but, at the very instant, his hand became so benumbed, that he could not draw it back again. At the same time the altar fell to pieces, as was presaged; and the fat of the sacrifices was spilt upon the ground. Jeroboam, convinced, at length, that the prophet was vested with a Divine commission, perceived his own impiety, and earnestly requested him to supplicate the Almighty for the restoration of his withered hand. The prophet readily complied with this request; and Jeroboam, having received the use of his limb, gratefully acknowledged the benefit of the cure, and earnestly pressed his benefactor to stay and take some refreshment with him. But the prophet declined the invitation, in consequence of a Divine injunction, not to taste bread or wine in that city, nor to return the same way he came. His abstinence and reserve induced the king to be more attentive to what he predicted, than he otherwise would have been; and his anxiety increased as he continued to reflect upon the event.

There was at this time, in Bethel, a certain false prophet, who, by the flattering events which he pretended would come to pass, had highly ingratiated himself with Jeroboam. He was far advanced in years; and being informed, by his sons, of the famous prophet who was come from Jerusalem, and the miracles he had wrought in the sight of the people, notwithstanding he was oppressed with many and great infirmities, he arose from his bed, and being mounted on his ass, went immediately in quest of the stranger. This rapid motion was the result of the false prophet's apprehension of being supplanted in the king's favour. He came up with Jadon as he was resting himself under the shade of a spreading oak. The formality of salutation having passed between them, the false prophet complained of the unkindness of the stranger in not having called at his habitation, and partaking of the fare which it afforded, strongly urging him, at the same time, to return and take some refreshment. The stranger refused his request, assigning the same reason for it as he had done to the king. The old man replied, that the prohibition did not extend to him, for that he himself was a prophet, and sent expressly by the Divine command to eat with him. Jadon was at length prevailed on by the false prophet to return; and while they were seated at table, and engaged in familiar converse, a vision suddenly appeared, and not only gave him to understand that he should be punished for his disobedience, but informed him in what manner the punishment should be inflicted, which was, that he should be torn in pieces upon the way by a lion, and that his body should not be laid in the tomb of his ancestors.

Nor was it long before this awful sentence was put in execution; for as Jadon was on his return to Jerusalem, he was suddenly attacked by a lion, and instantly dispatched. But the beast neither tore his body, nor did the least injury to the ass on which he rode. An account of this disaster being brought to the false prophet by some travellers who passed that way, he appointed his sons to fetch the body into the city, which being done, he caused it to be magnificently interred in his own sepulchre, strictly charging his sons, whenever he died, to lay his body as near that of this prophet as possible. He declared at the same time, that he was confident that what he had foretold concerning the altar of Bethel, the priests, and the false prophets, would most certainly come to pass.

The funeral obsequies were no sooner performed, and this charge given to his sons, than the false prophet, with his usual impiety and perfidy, went to Jeroboam, and, finding him much agitated in his mind, asked him why he should be thus affected by the words of a frantic madman? The king then adverted to the miraculous signs of the altar, and the withering and restoration of his own hand, as the awful cause of his perturbation; adding, that had he not been a prophet from on high, he could not have given such proofs of a Divine commission.

The false prophet used every effort to invalidate that conviction by which the king was so apparently impressed, and attempted to persuade him that his hand was enfeebled by the labour it had undergone in supporting the victims, and that upon its resting a short time, it returned to its former state: That the altar was newly erected, and crushed by the weight of the sacrifices laid upon it. He then artfully introduced the manner in which the prophet, who had foretold the things that so much alarmed him, was taken off, and had recourse to every means of working the king into a disbelief of the predictions.

Nor were his efforts in vain; for Jeroboam, blinded by his arts, and seduced by his insinuations, became totally alienated from God and his true worship, and abandoned to impiety and profligacy in the highest degree. He seemed to have bidden defiance to every thing sacred either in heaven or earth, and to have added presumption to idolatry. But we pass on from the acts of Jeroboam to those of Rehoboam.

This king, who was of the two tribes which maintained their allegiance to him, as the son and successor of David, was as little deserving of his station as his rival. He built and fortified several considerable cities, as Bethlehem, Etan, Tekoa, Bethzar, Shoco, Adullam, Ipa, Maresha, Ziph, Adoraim, Lachish, Asekah, Zorah, Ajalon, and Hebron, all in the tribe of Judah, besides several places no less considerable in that of Benjamin. These he provided with garrisons, governors, corn, wine and oil, with all necessaries in abundance, for their maintenance and defence. During his residence at Jerusalem, the priests and Levites that were in all Israel, and such of the people in general as were attached to the true religion, left their respective places of abode, that they might enjoy the privilege of worshipping God in the manner of their forefathers. They were disgusted with the tyrannical and idolatrous practices of Jeroboam, in forcing them to the adoration of images, to the dishonour of the one only and true God, and in violation of his positive command. So general, indeed, was the revolt, that, in the course of three years, the power and interest of Rehoboam were greatly augmented. The first wife this prince espoused was his kinswoman, by whom he had three children. He afterwards married Maacah, the daughter of Thamar, who was the daughter of Absalom, by whom he had Abijah. He had many other children by other wives, but he loved Maacah above them all. He had, upon the whole, eighteen wives and thirty concubines, by whom he had twenty-eight sons and sixty daughters: but he appointed Abijah his successor in the kingdom, and entrusted him with his treasures, and the command of his fortified cities.

It appeared in the instance of Rehoboam, as in many others, that grandeur and prosperity has led men into impiety and irreligion. For, elated with his pre-eminence, his son threw off the mask, and discovered his inclination towards idolatry; and, as his example was followed by his subjects, they soon forsook the worship of the true God, and carried their idolatrous practices to a most extravagant height. Indeed it is evident, from observation, that the lower class of mankind become depraved through the pernicious example of their superiors; for the immorality of a prince has a baneful influence on the conduct of the subjects: nay, some falsely imagine it laudable to imitate even the vices of those who are called the great. Thus it was at this time, when the people became idolatrous in their worship, and immoral in their practice, in conformity with the pleasure and example of their king.

Shishak besieges Jerusalem, and plunders the temple. Death of Rehoboam. He is succeeded by his son Abijah. Prediction of a prophet to Jeroboam of the destruction of himself and family.

AS a punishment for this defection, the Almighty was pleased, in the fifth year of Rehoboam's reign, to avenge himself on him and his people, by the means of Shishak, king of Egypt; not Sesostris, as related, through error, by Herodotus. This prince invaded his dominions with a most formidable force, amounting to one thousand two hundred chariots, sixty thousand horse, and four hundred thousand foot; the army being chiefly composed of Africans and Ethiopians. With this powerful armament he fell upon upon the Hebrews, made himself master of their strongest cities without opposition, and having left garrisons in them, proceeded to Jerusalem, where Rehoboam and his people were blocked up in the town. In this dilemma the Hebrews besought the Almighty, by prayer and supplication, for victory over, and deliverance from, their enemies: but so flagrant had been their impiety, that they could not obtain the interposition of Divine Providence. When Sameas, the prophet, told them, that God would forsake them as they had forsaken his worship, they were in great consternation; and seeing no prospect of deliverance, they most humbly acknowledged their apostacy from his laws, and the just judgement which had ensued. Being thus disposed to confess their sins, and implore the Divine forgiveness, when brought to the very brink of despair, the prophet told the king, that the Almighty was pleased so far to accept of their humiliation and repentance, that they should not be utterly cut off; but that, however, they should become subject to the Egyptians, that they might learn, by experience, their duty to God, in preference to all human authority. Alarmed at this report of the prophet, Rehoboam delivered up Jerusalem to Shishak, upon certain conditions: but the Egyptians, without regard to faith or honour, violated the treaty, pillaged the temple, and carried away plate and treasure belonging to the temple, as well as the king, to an immense value. He took with him Solomon's golden shields and bucklers, together with the golden quivers that David had taken from the king of Sophera, and dedicated to the purpose of adorning the temple. When he had thus done, he returned to his own country. Herodotus, of Halicarnassus, makes mention of this expedition, mistaking only the king's name, where he speaks of his march through several other countries, and of his reducing Syria of Palestine without opposition. Now it is manifest that the historian intended to record the subjection of our nation by the Egyptians; for he mentions, "That he left behind him pillars in the land of those who submitted to him without opposition, and engraved upon them images, emblematical of the pusillanimity of the men, in giving up the country without one effort to defend it." It is evident that Rehoboam, our king, surrendered without opposition. He likewise says, "That the Ethiopians took the custom of circumcising from the Egyptians." It is also universally agreed that the Philistines, and the people of Syria of Palestine, had it from thence; nor are there any other people of that country circumcised but the Hebrews. Upon the return of Shishak to his own country, after this depredation, Rehoboam was reduced so low, as to be under the necessity of repairing the loss of the golden shields and bucklers with the same number of brazen ones, for the use and ornament of his guards. After this transaction there is nothing of importance to be related concerning Rehoboam; his fear being a constant check upon him, with respect to the animosity that subsisted between him and his formidable rival, Jeroboam. He lived fifty-seven years, and died in the eighteenth year of his reign. He was a prince weak and arrogant, and sacrificed himself, his government, and expectation, to his vanity and obstinacy, in refusing the wise counsel of sage and upright men. He was buried in the city of David at Jerusalem, amongst the kings of Israel. He was succeeded by his son Abijah, in the eighteenth year of Jeroboam's reign over the ten tribes. Having brought the reign of Rehoboam to a conclusion, we shall revert to the history of Jeroboam. This prince persisted in his idolatry and immorality. He daily multiplied altars in the high places, and appointed priests to officiate unworthy of the sacred functions. The Almighty, in righteous judgement, soon avenged the indignation offered his sacred name, upon himself and his family. It soon happened that Obimes, his son, fell sick; upon which he ordered his wife to dress herself as a private person, and go to the prophet Ahijah, at Shiloh, (who had formerly predicted that he himself should obtain the royal dignity), and enquire of him the fate of the child. The prophet was now dim-sighted with age; therefore Jeroboam thought it might be easy to impose upon him, and that he would imagine the queen to be no more than a common person. In conformity to the order of her royal husband, his wife, having disguised herself, set out on her journey to Shiloh, to make enquiry of the prophet concerning the life of their darling son. Before she arrived at the place, Ahijah was addressed by a voice from heaven, informing him that the woman was coming to apply to him, and upon what occasion, together with the answer he should return to the questions she should propose. Upon her approaching his habitation he thus addressed her. "Come in, and pretend not to disguise yourself; for I have derived information of your character and business, together with the speech I am to deliver to you, from one who is not to be deceived. Return, therefore, to your husband, and deliver him this message, with which I am charged from on high. As I deprived the house of David of the regal authority, (saith the Lord), and, from a mean station in life, exalted thee to the dignity of a throne, and as thou hast, with the greatest ingratitude, deserted my worship, and impiously set up gods of thine own invention, made by the hands of men, and preferred them to the Creator of the universe, I will therefore extirpate thee and thy house from the earth, and give the carcases of thy people to be consumed by dogs and the birds of the air. Another king shall be in thy stead, who shall not suffer one man of this family to remain alive. Nor shall the people themselves avoid punishment; for they shall be driven out of the land they inhabit, and be scattered beyond the Euphrates, for imitating thy wickedness, and worshipping thy gods, in contempt of me and my commandments."

The prophet predicts the calamities that should befall Jeroboam and his family.

The prophet, having given the queen this message, bid her hasten home, and inform her husband of it as soon as possible; but not till he had assured her that the child should expire the very instant she entered the city.

With this doleful message, and these melancholy tidings, the queen left Ahijah; and no sooner did she arrive home than she found his prediction verified for the child, a very short time before, had given up the ghost. After her first grief had a little subsided, she delivered the message to the king as she received it from the prophet, and related every particular that had passed between them.

CHAP. V.

Jeroboam is vanquished by Abijah, son and successor to Rehoboam on the throne of Judah. Death of Abijah. He is succeeded by Asa, a pious and virtuous prince. Death of Jeroboam, and extirpation of his whole race.

NOTWITHSTANDING the late awful and intimidating event, Jeroboam did not appear dismayed, but levied a formidable army, and undertook an expedition against Abijah, son of Rehoboam, who now succeeded to the throne of Judah. Abijah, though young, was a prince of a martial spirit, and so far from being alarmed at this preparation, that, determined to put an end to the dispute which had so long subsisted between the kingdoms of Judah and Israel, he immediately raised an army out of the two tribes, and marched against Jeroboam, whose forces were double the number of those of the king of Judah, though they amounted to four hundred thousand men.

Abijah prepares to meet him.

When the two armies were drawn up in order of battle, Abijah advanced to an eminence, and holding up his hand to bespeak silence, spoke to this effect in the hearing of them all.

"You cannot have forgotten that God has promised that David and his posterity shall rule this kingdom. I am therefore surprized to find my father forsaken, and his subject, Jeroboam, put in his stead; as well as to see that you have taken up arms against a government which God has established, and that you cannot be satisfied without driving the legal possessor from what small portion is still remaining under his jurisdiction: for Jeroboam has already usurped authority over the greatest greatest part of the kingdom. The Almighty, however, will not suffer him long to possess what he has so iniquitously obtained, but will severely punish him for his crimes, and cause those rapacious and oppressive measures to cease, which, instead of endeavouring to terminate, he employs his constant attention to aggravate. What cause can be assigned for this falling off? You never received any injurious treatment from my father. Once, indeed, incited by evil counsel, (of which Jeroboam was the principal cause), he unhappily made use of an improper expression, upon which every one of you departed in a rage, not only relinquishing allegiance to your sovereign; but your duty to your God. You ought to have proceeded with deliberation, and have judged more favourably of that weakness which is incidental to all mankind. You should also have reflected on my father's youth, and that he did not affect to be endowed with the powers of oratory. You should also have considered him as the son of Solomon, from whom you had received such signal obligations. I should have supposed that all these considerations might have induced you to excuse an hasty expression; and on the father's account, it would have been no more than an act of justice to have made some small allowance for the son. But it is evident you never considered these things, nor is it probable, if I may form my judgement from the forces now before us. In what is your ultimate resource fixed? It cannot surely be in your golden figures of calves, your altars and high places. You confide in your evil deeds, and not in your religious practices. You act in opposition to every law, Divine and human: against both you militate in taking up arms against us, who have always worshipped the true God; not an idol carved from stone or wood, and imposed upon a weak and credulous multitude, by the impiety of their prince; but God, the Creator of heaven and earth, who is the primary and ultimate cause of all things. Repent, therefore, of the wickedness you have committed, and follow better courses hereafter; or, if you are determined to contend, let it be for the protection of those laws from which you derive your present greatness and felicity."

Death of Abijah.

Death of Jeroboam. Retrospect of his reign.

This expostulation from the mouth of Abijah, had not the least effect upon the mind of Jeroboam, who, during the time he was speaking, ordered a detachment to march round, and intercept his retreat. The troops of Abijah were greatly alarmed at this unexpected manœuvre; but their leader encouraged them to preserve their fortitude, exhorting them to depend upon the protection of the Almighty, who would render abortive the most consummate treachery levelled against the righteous cause they were engaged to support. These words from the king revived the courage of his troops, and they addressed themselves in humble supplication to the Almighty for success; till at length the charge being sounded by the priest, they fell on with a mighty clamour, attacked the enemy with such vigour, that they were soon defeated, with a slaughter, that is not paralleled in the history of any war either of the Greeks or barbarians. Five hundred thousand men fell upon the spot, and their strongest places were taken and rifled. After this defeat Jeroboam was never able to make head against his adversary. Abijah, however, did not long survive this memorable event, but, after a short reign of hardly three years, paid the debt of nature, and was buried at Jerusalem in the sepulchre of his ancestors. He left behind him twenty-two sons and sixteen daughters, which he had by fourteen women. Afa, his son, whose mother's name was Maacha, succeeded him on the throne; and, under his government, the Israelites enjoyed the blessings of peace for a term of ten years.

In the second year of Afa's reign, and the twenty-second of his own, died Jeroboam, the king of the ten tribes. His reign was famous (or rather infamous) for the revolt of those ten tribes, the public institution of idolatry, and the victory obtained over him by Abijah, king of the two tribes of Judah.

Jeroboam was succeeded by his son Nadab, who followed the impious example of his father. His reign was but short; for, at the close of about two years, leading forth an army against Gabathon, a city of the Philistines, thinking it might be taken by assault, he was cut off by the treachery of a professed friend, called Baasha, who seized upon the government, and destroyed the whole house of Jeroboam, according to the prophecy denounced by Ahijah, "That the dogs should eat of Jeroboam's stock that died in the city, and that the fowls of the air should eat him that died in the fields." This was the result of their impious apostacy, and most flagitious conduct.

ASA, king of Jerusalem, was a prince of a most excellent disposition, and laudably employed the interval of peace, for the first ten years of his reign, in removing the abominable vices which had been introduced among the people. He was, in fact, a man of pure religion and morals, and lived in strict conformity to the laws of God, as handed down by his forefathers. He rectified the errors of government, and purged his dominions from the abominations of idolatry, and the corruption of dissolute manners.

King's reformation of religion and morals.

During this interval of peace, he also fortified several places on the frontiers of his kingdom. He likewise trained up the greater part of his subjects to the art of war; insomuch that, in a short time, he had an army of three hundred thousand men of the tribe of Judah, armed with shields and spikes; and two hundred and fifty thousand of the tribe of Benjamin, with shields and arrows.

Makes military preparations.

Towards the latter end of the tenth year of his reign, Zareus, king of Ethiopia, invaded Judea with an army of nine hundred thousand foot, one hundred thousand horse, and three hundred chariots. When he was advanced as far as Maresa, a city in the dependency of Judah, Afa marched with his army against him, and encamped in a certain valley called Saphatha, at a small distance from the enemy. When he saw their very formidable power, he invoked the Divine aid, declaring that he had taken up arms only through the confidence he reposed in the protection of the Almighty, and that his assistance would more than compensate for the inferiority of numbers, and every other apparent disadvantage. Upon this humble application, he was encouraged with tokens and assurances of victory.

Zareus makes an expedition against him.

Nor was it long before they were made good; for, elated thereby, Afa charged the enemy with such invincible fortitude, that they immediately gave way, and a total rout ensued, attended with prodigious slaughter. He pursued them to the plain of Gerar, and there quitting the pursuit, took and rifled the city itself, and likewise the camp of the enemy, carrying off with him an immense booty in gold and cattle.

The Ethiopians are defeated.

Having, through the interposition of Divine Providence, gained this signal victory, the king returned in triumph with his army to Jerusalem. When they had got within a small distance of the city, he was met by Azariah, the prophet, who having commanded him to halt, addressed him in words to this effect:

"It hath pleased the Almighty, on account of your piety and virtue, to give you this signal victory; and if you proceed in the like discharge of your duty in future, you may be assured that success will attend all your undertakings. But if ever you deviate from the religion and laws of your forefathers, you will suffer the most dreadful calamities; and the time will come in which there shall not be a true prophet among ye, nor a priest worthy the dignity of his functions. Your cities shall be razed, and your people dispersed like vagrants throughout the earth. Exercise, therefore, yourselves in acts of piety and virtue, and unanimously offer your acknowledgement and thanksgiving to God for the blessings you at present enjoy."

The words of the prophet were extremely grateful to the king in particular, and the people in general; and it became their study and practice, both in public and private life, to maintain inviolate the religion and laws of their country; to promote which laudable purpose, the king appointed commissioners throughout his dominions, to superintend both civil and ecclesiastical concerns. Such was the present situation of Afa, king of the two tribes. We now return to Baasha, king of the Israelites, who, having taken off Nadab, the son of Jeroboam, usurped the government of the ten tribes.

This usurper reigned four years, during which he resided at his palace in Tarsish. He exceeded Jeroboam and his son in impiety and immorality, was oppressive to his people, and contumacious towards his God, inasmuch that a prophet was commissioned to tell him, that "The Almighty would extirpate him and his house from the face of the earth, as he had done that of Jeroboam before him, for his ingratitude and disobedience to that power which had exalted him to the throne, and not paying regard to righteousness and justice; two qualities most acceptable to God, and profitable to the people." The prophet added, that, "As he had followed the example of Jeroboam in every instance of iniquity, he should be rendered as exemplary in his punishment." Baasha remained inflexible, notwithstanding the judgement denounced against him by the prophet, at the Divine command; continuing daily to add to the measure of his iniquities, regardless of every tie, civil or sacred, and, as it were, setting the Almighty at defiance. Some of his people, having renounced idolatrous tenets, and gone over to Jerusalem, for the sake of engaging in the true worship, he marched with an army to Ramah, a town belonging to the tribe of Judah, situated about forty furlongs from Jerusalem. This place he fortified, in order to make it the seat of war, and an advantageous situation for making inroads into the territories of Afa, as well as preventing the people from passing to and fro without permission, and thereby cutting off all communication between his tribes and those of Judah.

Afa, apprehensive of his designs, and the danger to which his country would be exposed, from the adjacent situation of so inveterate a foe, dispatched ambassadors to the king of Damascus, with presents, soliciting his alliance upon a principle of friendship that had subsisted between the two houses. The application of Afa had the desired effect; for the king of Damascus instantly broke off with Baasha, suddenly attacked his fortified places, as Achion, Dan, and Abelmaen, burning some, and rasing others. Baasha, by these means, was compelled to abandon his designs of fortifying his frontier towns towards Judah, in order to defend other parts of his territories thus vigorously attacked. Afa availed himself of this opportunity, by demolishing the works raised at Ramah, with the materials of which he erected strong garrisons in the towns called Gaba and Mafpha. This was the last of Baasha's military exploits; for he was cut off in his own career by death, and buried in the city of Arsan. He was succeeded, on the throne of Israel, by his son Elah, who was as profligate a character as his father. His reign, however, was short; for, in the second year, while he was carousing in the house of one of his principal officers of state, he was assassinated by Zimri, one of his grandees; a troop of horse breaking in upon him, in the absence of his guards, who were then upon a military exploit.

dition. The news of Elah's death, and the assassin's usurping the crown, reaching Gabathon, while the army was before the town, they declared for Omri, their general, who immediately raised the siege of that place, marched to Tirzah, and took it by storm. This so alarmed Zimri, that seeing all lost, and despairing of any quarter from the enemy, he retired into a private apartment of the palace, to which he set fire, and the whole building was consumed, himself perishing in the flames, after a reign of only seven days.

Every thing was now in a most embarrassed state, and the people divided into two factions. The one supported the interest of Omri, and the other that of Thaman; but the former carried it; for the latter being slain, Omri enjoyed the government without interruption. This event happened in the thirtieth year of the reign of Afa. Omri reigned twelve years; six at Tirzah, and six at Marcon, which the Greeks call Samaria. He introduced more abominable practices, if possible, than any of his predecessors. Indeed, it was their general custom to alienate the minds of the people from the love and service of the true God, and lead them to the commission of every enormity. Therefore the Almighty, in his vengeance, rendered them successively instrumental to the destruction of one another, till, in the end, the whole race became extinct. Omri died at Samaria, and was succeeded in the government by his son Ahab.

It is worthy of observation, that, during the reign of Afa over Judah, Israel was subject to seven or eight different princes; as Jeroboam, Nadab, Baasha, Elah, Zimri, Thaman, Omri, and Ahab; yet such was their hardness in idolatry, that, in all these changes, not one of them ever thought of returning to the house of David, or paying attention to the worship of the true God at Jerusalem. In the course of these occurrences, we are given to understand how the Divine Providence interposes in human affairs, in showering down blessings on the righteous, and in the extirpation of the wicked.

Afa, king of Jerusalem, and of the two tribes, lived happily in the Divine favour to a great age, in consideration of his piety and virtue, and departed this life in peace, after a reign of forty-one years. His son Jehoshaphat, whom he had by Abida, succeeded him on the throne of Judah. This prince inherited his father's virtues, and walked according to the example of his illustrious ancestor David, that most eminent king of Israel.

Ahab, king of Israel, took up his residence at Samaria, where he reigned two and twenty years; and was one of the most wicked princes, and abominable idolaters, that ever sat on a throne. He followed the example of the most impious of his predecessors in their most abandoned practices, and more particularly those of Jeroboam. He not only continued the worship of the calves which Jeroboam had set up, but having married Jezebel, the daughter of Ethbaal, king of Tyre and Sidon, was by her seduced to the idolatry of worshipping her country gods. To indulge her rash and impetuous disposition, he erected a temple in Samaria, to Baal, the idol of the Tyrians, planted groves for the exercise of superstitious ceremonies, and appointed priests for that impious service. Indeed, Ahab was surrounded with idolaters and profligates, being of a similar disposition, averse to whatever was good, and prone to every kind of evil.

In order to render the abandoned Israelites, in general, and their impious king, in particular, sensible of the enormities they daily committed, there came to Ahab a prophet, who was a Tishbite, and born in the city of Gilead. The purport of his message was to tell the king that, from the time of his departure there should not fall a single drop of rain, nor should there be the least sign of dew in all that province, till the time of his return. This prediction he confirmed with the strongest assurances.

After the prophet had executed the Divine commission, he proceeded to the southward, till he came to a brook, where he stopped for the present, in order to refresh himself with water; the ravens, day by day, duly supplying him with food. Through the continuance of the drought the water of the brook began to fail, upon which the prophet moved, by Divine direction, to Sareptha, a town between Tyre and and Sidon; for he had been foretold by a voice from on high, that he should there find a widow woman to receive and furnish him with every necessary refreshment.

In obedience therefore to the Divine command, the prophet set out, and having nearly reached the end of his journey, he observed a woman gathering sticks not far from the spot, whom he concluded to be the widow to whom he had been directed. This induced him to call to her, requesting that she would fetch him a little water to quench his thirst. He also, as she was going for the water, desired she would bring with her a morsel of bread. The woman solemnly protested, that an handful of meal, and a little oil, were all she had to keep herself and son from starving, and that she was gathering sticks to bake it into a cake. But the prophet encouraged her to do as he requested, soon as the cake was prepared, assuring her, at the same time, that neither her meal or oil should fail during the time of the famine. The woman did as the prophet directed, and found his words proved strictly true; for though she and her son, together with her guest, constantly had recourse to the barrel of meal and cruse of oil for food, they were no sooner diminished, than an immediate supply took place; nor did it fail until the drought ceased.

Menander mentions this drought in his history of Ethbaal, king of the Tyrians. "In his time (says he) there was an extreme drought for want of rain, that continued from the month of Hyperberetæus till the same month next year. Prayers were, indeed, put up for the averting of the judgement, which were followed with mighty claps of thunder." This prince built Botrys, in Phœnicia, and Auzates, in Africa; and to this drought under Ahab, Menander evidently refers in his Commentaries; for it was in the reign of Ahab that Ethbaal was king of Tyre and Sidon. But to return.

When the prophet had sojourned with the widow some time, her son fell desperately sick; and the mother, in the violence of her grief, and in a rhapsody of exclamation, seemed to impute the cause to him; as if he came to reproach her with her sins, and bring this malady as a judgement upon her. The child being given over for dead, the prophet bid her be of good cheer, and deliver up her son to him, with an assurance that he would restore him to her alive. He then took him into his own chamber, where he earnestly supplicated the Almighty to restore the child to life. His prayer being granted, the child revived, and was delivered by him to the mother, who received him with unfeigned gratitude, and acknowledged her belief of the Divine mission of the prophetic guest (a).

Some time after this the prophet was commanded to return to the land of Israel, present himself before Ahab, and inform him that, in a short time, rain would descend on the earth. The famine at this time raged with so much violence throughout the whole country of Samaria, that the people were near being starved to death. The king was so distressed for want of provender for his cattle, that he sent for Obadiah, who was superintendant of his flocks, charging him to go in quest of the prophet, and by all means bring him to him. Having searched for him every where in vain, he commanded Obadiah to accompany him; and when they had proceeded awhile together, the king took one way, and the overseer another. Obadiah was a man of pure religion; and at the time when the cruel queen Jezebel had given orders for persecuting all the prophets, he concealed and protected an hundred of them in a cave, and there provided them with necessary sustenance.

The king and Obadiah were no sooner parted, than the latter met Elias upon the way, and saluted him with the greatest respect. The prophet desired him to go to the king, and inform him that he was ready to wait on him. Obadiah, apprehensive that Elias might depart before his return, replied, "In what have I sinned, that thou wouldest deliver thy servant into the hand of Ahab to slay me? As the Lord thy God liveth, there is no nation or kingdom whither the king hath not sent to seek thee; and when they said, He is not here, he took an oath of the inhabitants that they found thee not: and now thou sayest, Go, tell thy king, behold, Elias is here. As soon as I am gone from thee, thou mayest be carried whither I know not; so when I tell Ahab, and he cannot find thee, he will slay me. I thy servant feared the Lord from my youth. Was it not told my lord what I did, when Jezebel slew the prophets, that I hid an hundred of them in a cave, and provided them with sustenance?" Elias bid him fear nothing, but go to the king, solemnly assuring him that he would present himself to Ahab that very day.

Thus assured, Obadiah went in search of the king, whom having found he afterwards introduced Elias. At the first interview the king began to upbraid him with being the cause of the calamity under which the nation had so long laboured. The prophet boldly returned the charge, and, after having taxed him with the worship of false gods, and suppressing the true religion, desired him to summon the multitude to meet upon Mount Carmel, together with his priests and prophets, and those of his wife. The king summoned them, and they accordingly met. Elias then addressed them in words to the following purport: "How long will you live thus in uncertainty of mind and opinion? If you believe the God we worship to be the only living and true God, obey him, and keep his commandments; if otherwise, pursue your own courses." To put the matter to the test, he proposed an experiment. "Since (said he) there certainly can be no more than one Infinite, Supreme, and Almighty Being, let us at this time make the experiment who this Being is. You, who are the worshippers of Baal, have all the advantages on your side; the favour and protection of the court, four hundred and fifty priests of one sect, and four hundred of another; whereas I stand here, a single prophet, to defend the cause of that power from whom I derive my commission. Let the priests of Baal choose their ox, and lay it on the altar; but let there be no fire thereon: I will then choose my ox; let them pray to their gods, and I will call on the name of Jehovah; and then let the God who, by consuming the sacrifice with a sudden flash of fire, shall make it appear that he hath heard the invocations, be declared by this whole assembly the One, the True, and the Supreme Being."

This mode of determination being approved by the multitude, Elias bade Ahab's prophets take an ox, and invoke their gods by their names, giving them the precedence, in point of offering sacrifice. When they had invoked their gods a considerable time without effect, Elias ridiculed their superstition, and bade them exalt their voices, as perhaps they might be at a greater distance than they imagined. They then went on with hideous outcries and boisterous exclamations, scarifying themselves with lances after the manner of their country, but all without the least effect.

When Elias proceeded to sacrifice, he desired the multitude to draw nearer, and make diligent search in order to discover if any fire was secretly conveyed to the spot on which he was about to give proof of the Divine authority of his mission. Upon the approach of the multitude, Elias took twelve stones, to answer the number of the twelve tribes, and erected an altar out of them, making a deep trench around it. The wood being fitted, and the sacrifice laid upon the pile, five vessels of spring water were cast upon the altar, so that it ran off and filled the trenches. After every thing was duly prepared, Elias approached the altar, and implored the true God "to manifest his power by some circumstance that might convince a misguided people of their error." Upon this supplication fire descended, as if from above, upon the altar, and, in the light of the multitude, consumed not only the burnt-offering, but likewise the wood and stones, and even dried up the water in the trenches.

(a) The woman certainly had sufficient reason to believe that Elias was a prophet, or a person sent from God, when she saw the miraculous increase of the meal and oil. However, his not curing her son when he lay sick, but rather suffering him lay, her faith began to droop; whereas, upon seeing him revive, her faith revived with him, and, through the joy of having him again restored to her, she accounted this latter miracle much greater than the former.

This extraordinary display of the Divine power so astonished the people, that they fell prostrate, and acknowledged that the God of Elias was the only living and true God, declaring, at the same time, that they looked upon all others as the productions of human inventions. When the people had a little recovered from their surprize, Elias commanded all the prophets and priests of Baal to be put to death; and his command was immediately executed. He then desired the king to compose his mind, as he might be assured the earth would be refreshed with rain in a very short time.

Justice having thus taken place of the false prophets, Elias ascended the mount, where, having prayed for some time, he sent his servant to see if he could discover any signs of rain. He went up again and again, but with no success. At length, after the seventh time, he brought his master word that he saw a small cloud rising out of the sea, about the size of a man's hand. In consequence of this intelligence, he dispatched his servant to Ahab to advise him to hasten to his chariot, and make the best of his way to the city, lest he should be taken in a very great shower. Ahab followed the advice of the prophet, who, having girded his vest about him, ran before the chariot till he came to the city of Jezreel; during which time the clouds gathered very thick, and discharged abundance of water.

When Jezebel was informed, by Ahab, of all the wonders that had passed, and that her prophets had been put to death at the special command of Elias, she immediately vowed revenge, and dispatched messengers to inform him, that his life should certainly pay for theirs. On these menaces the prophet immediately withdrew to Beersheba, a town in the southern part of Judea, and bordering upon Idumæa. In this place he left his servant, and pursued his journey into the wilderness, when he laid himself down as a man weary of the world, and desirous to leave it. "Lord (said he) I act not better than those who have gone before me, and life is no longer desirable." After this he fell asleep; but it was not long before he awoke, and, upon rising, found food and drink set before him; upon which he fed heartily, and, by the strength of that repast, went forward to Mount Sinai, the place where God first delivered the law to Moses. He then betook himself to a large cave, intending, probably, to spend the remainder of his days in that obscure situation.

After he had passed some little time in this habitation, he heard a voice interrogating him wherefore he left the city to wander thus in the desert? Though he heard the voice distinctly, he knew not whence it came. His reply, however, was, that the queen threatened his life for having been instrumental to the deaths of the false prophets, and enforcing the belief and worship of the one only and true God. The same voice commanded him to leave his place of retirement the next day, and attend to the Divine instructions as to his future conduct. He accordingly left his retreat, when he heard the noise of an earthquake, and saw in the air an appearance of blazing fire. The fire was followed by a short pause of silence; after which he heard a voice exhorting him not to be intimidated at his then situation, for his enemies should not prevail against him. He was commanded to return home by way of Damascus, and there anoint Hazael king of Syria, and Jehu, the son of Nimshi, king over Israel; and also to appoint Elisha his successor in the prophetic office; the voice intimating that these men would be proper instruments in the hand of Divine vengeance, to punish the idolators of the land, and extirpate those who encouraged and practised it.

Elias, duly impressed with what he had seen and heard, returned according to the instructions given him; and finding Elisha, the son of Shaphat, ploughing with others, threw his mantle (a) over him as he passed. Elisha immediately upon this began to prophecy, quitted the plough, and declared himself ready to follow Elias, only desiring to take leave of his father and mother before his departure. This being granted him, he returned, and thenceforward became the disciple and companion of Elias during life.

Ahab, notwithstanding so many repeated tokens of the divine displeasure, still remained inflexible, and, to aggravate his many former instances of injustice, was guilty of an action of the most unjustifiable nature. It happened that one Naboth, a citizen of Jezreel, had a vineyard adjoining to the royal gardens, which the king was desirous of obtaining, in order to enlarge his own premises. To accomplish his desire, he offered Naboth an equivalent, either in land or money; but the possessor, as it was his paternal inheritance, refused to part with it on any terms whatever. This so much disgusted Ahab, that he could neither sleep, nor take any convivial or social pleasures.

When Jezebel, after many enquiries, became acquainted with the real cause of her husband's complaint, and that, notwithstanding he had treated Naboth with a degree of courtesy and condescension derogatory to his dignity, he could not obtain his consent to the proposal he had made him, she, at first, upbraided him with pusillanimity, or not knowing how to exert the authority of a king. She afterwards desired him to banish all melancholy, as she had thought of an expedient by which he might be put in possession of the much-desired vineyard. The device was this: She caused letters to be written in the king's name, and sealed with his signet, to be directed to the principal men in Jezreel, commanding them to proclaim a fast, call an assembly, and assign Naboth a place amongst the leaders. They were then to suborn three witnesses to give evidence against him for blaspheming God and the king, upon whose testimony he should stand convicted, and receive sentence to be stoned to death by the people. Notwithstanding the baseness of the plot, such was the influence of the king over the leading men in Jezreel, that every thing was executed according to the directions of the infamous Jezebel, and the innocent Naboth fell a sacrifice to the covetous disposition of the king, and the infernal machinations of a tyrannical and perfidious woman.

As soon as Jezebel received intelligence that the horrid murder was perpetrated, she repaired to the king, informed him of the circumstance, and desired him to go to Jezreel, and, without any ceremony, take possession of the vineyard. Ahab, pleased with the effect of the plan devised by his queen, immediately followed her directions, and prepared for a visit to his new possessions. But he was suddenly met by the prophet Elias, who, at the Divine command, first upbraided him with having slain the innocent, and then usurping a right to his possessions. When Ahab saw the prophet approaching, he made open confession of the whole transaction, and a tender of any satisfaction he might require. But Elias spurned at the offer, and denounced judgment on him to this effect: "That where the blood of Naboth had been licked by dogs, they should likewise lick the blood of Ahab and Jezebel; and that the crime of taking away the life of an innocent man by perjury, should be punished by the extirpation of his whole race."

Ahab was so affected at the denunciation of this judgment, that he became deeply penitent, clothed himself in sackcloth, went barefoot, and gave every proof of the most unfeigned sorrow and humiliation. Hereupon the prophet was commissioned to acquaint him that, in consideration of his contrition, the judgment denounced should be postponed during his life; but that it should certainly take place in that of his son, the truth of which prediction will hereafter appear.

to be his servant, to attend upon him, and succeed him in his office. However this be, it is probable that when he threw his mantle over him, he said something whereby he acquainted him with his design; though the particular words, in so brief history, are not expressed, Ahab.

DURING these transactions between Ahab and the prophet, Adad, the king of Syria and Damascus, levied a most formidable army from the different parts of his dominions, and being joined by thirty-two confederate princes beyond the Euphrates, he marched with this mighty force against the king of Israel, who, deeming it impolitic to hazard the event of a battle on the plain with a power so superior, retreated to fortified places, in order to act upon the defensive. He took up his stand in Samaria, the most eligible situation, being surrounded with strong walls, good ramparts, and having a numerous and well disciplined army in the garrison to maintain it. The king of Syria marched with his army, and sat down before Samaria, sending, at the same time, an herald to Ahab, to desire that he might dispatch ambassadors with instructions to propose terms.

This being complied with, the ambassadors were accordingly dispatched, with directions to inform Ahab, that the whole of his treasure, together with his wives and children, were at the mercy of the king of Syria; and that, if he would acknowledge the same, and permit him to take what part of his possessions he pleased, he would instantly raise the siege, and withdraw his troops. Upon this Ahab commissioned the ambassadors to return and assure the king their master, that himself and all that he had were at his disposal.

When the ambassadors delivered the purport of their commission to the Syrian, he dispatched them again to the king of Israel, to desire that, as he had acknowledged his right to all his possessions, such officers and servants as he should send the next morning, might have free liberty to search his own apartments, together with those of his retinue, and take with them whatever they might select, leaving the remainder in the possession of Ahab.

dresses his council upon the occasion

The king of Israel, struck with a demand at once so imperious and unreasonable, thought it expedient to call a council, to debate on a point in which both his honour and interest were so essentially concerned. They were accordingly summoned, and, when assembled, he thus addressed them: "My friends and countrymen, I have had two proposals sent me from Adad; the former to acknowledge that myself, my wife and children, were all at his mercy; upon my compliance with which terms he was to raise the siege. For the public peace and safety, and the common good of my people, I waved all consideration of my own interest, and acceded to these terms. Not satisfied with this compliance, he desires to send his officers and servants to search and rifle my property, and that of my attendants and people, at pleasure, select what they may deem most eligible, and leave us the remainder. My own concerns I readily gave up; but cannot think of resigning those of my subjects to so peremptory and insolent a demand. A denial, I am persuaded, will bring on a war; and therefore I submit the matter to your deliberation, determined to abide by your resolves."

Adad's
terms are rejected.

The council reprobated the haughty and insolent demand of the barbarian in the severest terms, and unanimously declared for the vigorous prosecution of a war. Accordingly the ambassadors were instructed to report to their master, that "The king of Israel was still disposed to comply with the first demand, for the common peace and safety; but that he could not submit to terms so unreasonable as he had proposed."

He sends a third embassy.

Adad, fired with indignation at this reply, sent a third embassy, with a message more peremptory and menacing than the former. "Tell their king (said he) that, though he vaunts himself on the strength and security of his walls, my army will raise a bank higher than those walls, and that by only each man taking an handful of earth." By this he gave Ahab to understand the incredible number of his troops in order to deter him from opposition. Ahab replied in laconic terms, that "Men of honour were to dispute with their swords, not with their tongues."

When the ambassadors returned, they found their master at a convivial board with his confederate princes; and having reported Ahab's reply, he gave immediate orders for the carrying on the siege with all possible vigour. Ahab, and his people, were greatly intimidated at the formidable preparations made by the enemy, in circumventing the city, and raising a strong bulwark, till a prophet came to him, and encouraged him with an assurance that he should prevail against this tremendous power. When he expressed a desire of being informed by what means the victory was to be obtained, he received for answer, "By the sons of the leaders of the people, but under thy conduct as their commander." Ahab, roused by this pleasing information, called them together to the number of two hundred and thirty-two; and receiving intelligence that the king of Syria had retired to rest after a debauch, the gates were suddenly thrown open, and the young officers made an intrepid sally. Information was no sooner given by the centinels to Adad, than he issued orders, that "Whether they came to fight or to treat, they should bring them bound to him." Ahab, at the same time, had a reserve of men within the walls, in readiness to sally forth, as occasion might require: but the young officers fell upon the out guard, slew many of them, and pursued the rest to the camp. When Ahab found that they had succeeded thus far he commanded the remainder of his army to sally forth, and charged the Syrians with the utmost fury. This resolute effort decided the fate of the day; for the enemy being not only intoxicated, but unarmed, fell an easy prey to the assailants, were put to the rout, left their armour behind them; and the king himself with difficulty escaped by the agility of his horse. Ahab followed the pursuit; and when he had rifled the enemy's camp, which contained an immense booty of gold, silver, and other valuable commodities, he took Adad's chariots and horses, and returned to the city. But, as the prophet advised him to keep his army in readiness to take the field, as the king of Syria would make another expedition against him the next spring, he employed himself in making the necessary preparations for a renewal of the contest.

Adad summoned his friends, with the remainder of his broken army, to deliberate on their future conduct. When he informed them of his resolution to make another expedition against the Israelites, they unanimously dissuaded him from engaging with them on the mountains; because their God was potent in such places, and thence it came to pass that they had so lately been beaten; adding, that if they fought on the plain, the Israelites would be conquered. They also counselled him to dismiss the confederate princes from any further personal service and attendance, but to retain their army, and appoint experienced officers to command it, instead of the princes, while they might be employed in levying recruits in their respective territories, to supply the places of such as might fall in battle. Adad approved of the counsel given him, and regulated his measures accordingly.

In the beginning of the spring the king of Syria marched with his army against the Hebrews, and pitched his camp in a large plain, according to the advice of his friends, not far from the city of Aphica. In the mean time Ahab advanced with his troops, and pitched his camp over against him; though his army fell many thousands short of the number of the Syrians. While the armies faced each other, the prophet came to the Hebrews with the Divine assurance that they should be victorious, and that their enemies should find his assistance as potent on the plain as on the mountains, which it seems was contrary to their opinion.

The armies remained encamped in their respective stations for six successive days; but on the seventh they advanced on both sides in a line, and commenced a battle. The action was gallantly sustained by each army at first; till the Israelites pressed the Syrians with such ardour that, unable to stand the shock any longer, they were put to the rout, and closely pursued by the enemy. upon flight, and those who perished by such misadventures as are immediately brought on by confusion, the havock was very great; for, indeed, they were destroyed by their own chariots, and by one another. Those that got into Apheca, their only place of refuge, were but few in number; and it is supposed that about seven and twenty thousand were crushed to death by the walls suddenly falling to the ground, and that an hundred thousand were slain in battle.

Terrified at this dreadful judgement, Adad, with some of his officers and friends, retired, for security, into a cellar under ground, where some of them took occasion to represent the clemency and humanity of the Hebrews, and thence to advise the king to cast himself at Ahab's feet for mercy, in confidence that, upon such application and submission, it would not be refused.

Adad approved of their advice; and thereupon several of his train were dressed in the habits of supplicants and captives, cloathed in sackcloth, with ropes about their necks, according to the custom of the country in such cases (a), and sent to Ahab, requesting the life of their king upon any terms he might be pleased to propose. The king of Israel received them courteously, and assured them, that, "He rejoiced in the safety of their king as much as if he was his own brother." Nay, he promised to shew him the same tokens of honour and respect.

The messengers, having received assurances, upon oath, that no violence should be offered to his person, hastened to their master in his retirement, and brought him to Ahab, who was at that time in his chariot. As soon as the vanquished king did him homage, Ahab saluted him with the utmost courtesy, presenting him his right-hand, and pledging his faith and honour for his perfect security and freedom. Adad acknowledged his humanity and condescension, of which he declared he should retain a grateful remembrance to his latest breath. He also promised to restore to the Hebrews those cities and lands which the former kings had taken from them, and that Ahab should have every desirable privilege in the capital city of Damascus. Such mild treatment could not but be acceptable to Ahab; the result of which was, that a league of friendship immediately took place between the contending monarchs, founded on a reciprocal interchange of oaths for the performance of covenants; after which Adad was dismissed with magnificent presents to his own country.

After these transactions between the kings of Israel and Syria, a certain prophet, whose name was Michaiah, came to one of Ahab's subjects, and bid him smite him on the forehead, telling him that it was the Divine will it should be so: but, on his refusal, the prophet told him he should suffer for his disobedience; for he should be destroyed by a lion. When the accident foretold had befallen the man, the prophet applied to another with the same injunction, who immediately smote him, and drew blood. Upon this he bound up his head, and went to the king with this story: "That he had been one of his soldiers, and had the custody of one of the prisoners delivered to his charge by an officer, and that the prisoner having escaped, he was in danger of his own life, by means of that officer, who had threatened him with death if the prisoner was not found, when called for, in his custody." When Ahab told him he would suffer justly, he unbound his head, and gave him to know his person and office. He told him he made use of this artifice as a prelude to impress on his mind the following prediction, "That God would punish him who had suffered Adad, a blasphemer against him, to escape punishment (b); for the time would come when this very Adad, whom he now spared, would be the means of his death, and the destruction of his "army." Ahab was highly exasperated at the denunciation of the prophet, and commanded him to be imprisoned; though he was much affected, and struck to the very heart, by his prediction. But we shall return to the affairs of Jehoshaphat, king of Jerusalem.

CHAP. IX.

Jehoshaphat, a pious, virtuous, and wise king of Jerusalem, assists Ahab in an expedition against the Syrians.

JEHOSHAPHAT had not only enlarged his territories, and put garrisons into all the cities under his jurisdiction, but had appointed governors in those cities which were taken out of the tribe of Ephraim by his grandfather Abijah, when Jeroboam reigned over the ten tribes. This prince was favoured with the Divine blessing, assistance, and protection, in all his undertakings; for his life might be deemed a series of piety and virtue, as scarce a day passed in which he was not employed in acts pleasing to God, and beneficial to mankind. His character, for integrity and humanity, gained him the reverence and esteem of all the neighbouring princes, as appeared from the munificent presents which poured in upon him from different quarters, and greatly conduced to enhance both his fortune and fame. In the third year of his reign he summoned the elders and priests that were under his jurisdiction, and ordered them to appoint commissioners in the respective cities and towns within his dominions, to enforce a regular attendance on divine worship, and a due observance of the laws of Moses. His own concern for the preservation of the pure religion had a powerful influence on the minds of his subjects, who seemed to vie with each other in the promotion of so excellent a work. Nay, his general conduct seems to have impressed the neighbouring princes with a kind of reverential awe; for they lived in peace and harmony, and studied to render each other mutual services. The Philistines paid their tribute with the most scrupulous regard to justice; and the Arabians their annuity of 630 lambs, and the like number of kids, with the greatest complacency.

Jehoshaphat also fortified his large cities and towns, and kept, in constant pay, a well disciplined army, to be in readiness upon any urgent occasion. Of the tribe of Judah there were three hundred thousand shield-bearers, under the command of Edra, and two hundred thousand under Johanan; and of the tribe of Benjamin, two hundred thousand archers, under the same officers. There was also another officer, called Achobab, who commanded an hundred and eighty thousand men, armed with bucklers; besides the soldiers who were dispersed in different garrisons.

Jehoshaphat at length married his son, Jehoiam, to Gotholia, the daughter of Ahab, king of the ten tribes; upon which occasion, when he went to Samaria, he was most sumptuously entertained by Ahab; and his officers and attendants in general, were presented with the rarest productions of the country. At the entreaty of Ahab, upon this visit, he joined him in an expedition against the king of Syria, for the recovery of Ramoth-Gilead, which had been taken, and was detained from him, by that prince. Jehoshaphat promised him a powerful assistance, and sent for a numerous army from Jerusalem to Samaria, where both the kings went out of the town, and each of them, seated on a throne of state, reviewed and gave orders to their forces. Previous to their entering upon hostilities, Jehoshaphat deemed it adviseable, if there were any prophets at hand, to consult them upon the occasion; for there had been a three years interval of peace between the kings of Israel and Syria.

(a) This was the dress of humble supplicants in those times. The sackcloth on their loins was a token of great sorrow for what they had done; and the ropes about their necks, as an indication that they would submit to whatever punishment Ahab should think proper to lay on them.

(b) Ahab's great offence consisted in suffering so horrid a blasphemer as Adad to go unpunished, which was contrary to an express law, Lev. xxiv. 16; and this law extended not to those only that were born in the land, but to strangers likewise that were among them, and in their power, as Adad certainly was.

CHAP. X.

Consultation of the prophets relative to the war. Different opinions and predictions of the true and false prophets. Death of Ahab, and succession of his son Ahaziah.

IN consequence of the advice of Jehoshaphat, Ahab called his prophets together to the number of about four hundred, and commanded them to make enquiry concerning the event of a war with Adad, and particularly the carrying the city, on which account it was undertaken. These prophets unanimously declared for the expedition, alledging their assurance of the Syrians being vanquished and taken captives before. But Jehoshaphat, who suspected the reality both of these prophets and their prediction, asked Ahab if there were no other prophets to whom they might have recourse with more certainty. Ahab replied, that "There was, indeed, one Micaiah; but that he had never foreboded him any success, but, on the contrary, had foretold that he should fall by the hand of the king of Syria; for which cause he was now in prison."

Upon Jehoshaphat's desire, however, that he might be produced, an eunuch was dispatched to bring him into the royal presence. The messenger informed Micaiah on the way, that the rest of the prophets had unanimously declared that Ahab should be victorious in his expedition against the king of Syria. Micaiah declared that he would not prevaricate in so solemn a matter, but most faithfully report to the king such message as he should receive from the Divine intimation.

Upon the prophet's arrival, and Ahab's adjuring him to speak the truth, he said, "I saw all Israel scattered and flying, and the Syrians pursuing them as flocks of sheep are dispersed when their shepherd is slain; by which representation I am given to understand, that the Israelites, in general, shall return safe, but that the king shall fall in the action." When Micaiah had uttered this alarming prediction, Ahab said to the king of Jerusalem, "Are you not convinced that this man is my enemy?" Micaiah declared the contrary; and solemnly averred, that the words he delivered were expressly according to the Divine command, adding, that Ahab, at the instigation of false prophets, had engaged in an expedition which to him would prove fatal. The resolution of this upright prophet threw the king into suspense and consternation.

During his state of anxiety one Zedekiah presented himself to Ahab, and, in contempt of Micaiah, undertook to controvert his opinion, and detect the fallacy of his prediction. In order to this, he cited the prediction of Elias, "That the dogs should lick his blood in the city of Jezreel, in the field of Naboth, as they licked the blood of Naboth, who, at his instance, was stoned to death by the multitude." Thence he inferred the fallacy of Micaiah, as contradicting a greater prophet than himself, by saying, that the king within the compass of three days should fall in battle. As a farther proof of his fallacy, Zedekiah said he would smite Micaiah, to try if his hand would wither upon so doing, as Jadon caused the hand of king Jeroboam to wither upon a former occasion. Having thus spoken, he struck the prophet; and Ahab finding no judgement immediately follow, persevered in his resolution of entering upon the war, giving more credit to false prophets than true, and thereby hastening the judgement that awaited him. Zedekiah then made horns of iron, and declared to Ahab that those horns were signals of his total conquest of Syria. Micaiah, on the other hand, assured the false prophet, that, in a short time, he should be called to account for his fallacious pretensions, and be compelled to seek refuge to avoid just punishment. The king was so exasperated with Micaiah, that he remanded him back to prison, with orders to the governor of the city, to allow him only bread and water till his return.

The kings of Israel and Jerusalem now advanced with their forces towards Ramoth; and the king of Syria no sooner had intelligence of it, than he marched on to meet them. It had been agreed that Ahab should assume the disguise of a private habit, while Jehoshaphat was arrayed in his royal robes, in order to evade the presage of the prophet. But this artifice had no effect, for Adad, by his officers, had issued strict orders to his army to encounter neither small nor great, except Ahab, king of Israel.

The Syrians, at first, seeing Jehoshaphat at the head of the army, conjectured that he was Ahab, and advanced towards him to execute the order of their king; but when they found their error, they retreated. They kept the field from morning till night, the one party flying, the other pursuing; but no blood was shed during the whole day. Ahab was the object of pursuit; and the Syrians, in general, were in quest of him. At length one of Adad's attendants drew an arrow at venture, that entered through his breast-plate into his very lungs. Ahab was desirous of keeping the accident from the knowledge of his men, lest they should be intimidated, and therefore ordered his charioteer to take him a little way aside, as he was mortally wounded. He remained in his chariot till about sun-set, when he expired in great agony.

When night came on the Syrians withdrew to their camp; and as soon as the death of Ahab was announced by an herald, they all returned home. The king's body was carried to Samaria, and there interred. The chariot, in which he was conveyed, was so stained with blood that issued from his wound, that they were obliged to wash it in a neighbouring fountain, in doing of which the dogs came and licked it, thereby fulfilling one part of the prediction of Elias, which he denounced against Ahab for the murder of Naboth, the citizen of Jezreel. He died at Ramoth, as Micaiah had foretold, so that, to confirm the Divine authority of the predictions of the true prophets, we find these singular instances of the interposition of Divine Providence. This should dispose us to the worship of the one only and true God, and dissuade us from any reliance on false prophets and impostors, who are actuated by mercenary views, and, instead of leading us to our duty to God, divert us from it into the paths of infidelity and impiety. The gift of prophecy is of singular advantage, as men are thereby shewn what they ought to avoid; though they too frequently persist in their obstinacy till it proves fatal. This was the case of Ahab. He disbelieved those who foretold his defeat, and was slain for giving credit to what eventually proved false. He was succeeded in his government by his son Ahaziah.

C H A P. I.

The piety, as well as civil and military talents, of Jehoshaphat. Prophecy of Elias verified in the death of Ahaziah. Jehoshaphat, with auxiliaries, vanquishes the Moabites and their confederates.

WHEN king Jehoshaphat returned to Jerusalem, after his joining with Ahab against the king of Syria, he was met by the prophet Jehu, who severely reprehended him for espousing the cause of so impious and abandoned a prince as the late king of Israel. The prophet, however, assured him, that, for the sake of his own exemplary piety and virtue, the offence for which he had rebuked him, should not only be pardoned, but that God would be pleased to deliver him out of the hands of his enemies.

Upon the admonition and encouraging information of the prophet, the king offered up prayers and sacrifices, as an acknowledgement of the goodness of the Father of Mercies. He then appointed a general visitation throughout his dominions, and issued particular orders to those to whom the charge was committed, to instruct the people in the laws of Moses, and the religion of their ancestors. He also erected tribunals, and commissioned magistrates in all the cities, and considerable towns, strictly enjoining them to administer justice to all men, without respect to person, interest, or affection, always remembering they must render an account of the discharge of their duty to that Being who searches the heart, and cannot be deceived.

Having taken these wise precautions for the establishment of order and good government in the several cities belonging to the two tribes, he returned to Jerusalem, where he constituted judges out of the most considerable priests and Levites, giving them the same strict charge, upon the same principle, to administer justice with the utmost impartiality.

If matters of an intricate or important nature, within their respective districts, should be brought before them, they were by means to pass a definitive sentence without the greatest caution and deliberation, as nothing could reflect such foul disgrace on a king and people, amongst whom the Almighty had been pleased to establish his temple, as ■ partial administration of justice. He appointed two principal superintendants out of the tribe of Judah; those were Ahaziah, the priest, for religious, and Zebediah, a priest, for civil concerns.

About this time the Moabites and Ammonites made an expedition against Jehoshaphat with a large army of mercenaries, and encamped at Engedi, city near the lake of Asphaltites, three hundred furlongs distant from Jerusalem, and famous for the production of balsam and palm-trees. When Jehoshaphat heard that his enemies had passed the lake, and made an irruption into his dominions, he was much alarmed, and immediately issued orders for calling a general assembly of the people in the temple. When they were convened, in a fervent and humble address, he implored the Divine blessing upon his arms, to enable him to repel so formidable an invasion. This was entirely agreeable to the practice of our forefathers, upon the first institution of that sacred place; for whenever they had cause to apprehend danger of being over-run by a foreign power, the people were summoned to meet in full assembly, to implore the Divine assistance towards the repelling the invasion of their enemies, and the maintenance of those possessions which they enjoyed through the Divine bounty. Jehoshaphat mingled his prayers with his tears, which were accompanied by the joint supplications of the whole multitude.

In the midst of their devotions there came into the assembly ■ certain prophet, named Jahaziel, exclaiming, that their supplications had reached the Almighty, who would defend their cause, and maintain the religion they professed. He recommended them to prepare for ■ march the next day against their enemies, whom they should find encamped between Jerusalem and Engedi, at a certain ascent, known by the name of Sis, which, in our language, signifies an eminence. The prophet added, that there would not be a necessity for any exertion on their part; they might therefore stand inactive spectators of the Divine interposition in their favour. At this declaration declaration the king and people fell prostrate, worshipped and adored, while the Levites accompanied their praises with hymns adapted to musical instruments.

At break of day the king went into the desert near the city of Tekoa, where he admonished the multitude to place their whole reliance on the Divine aid, according to the declaration of the prophet. He assured them that there was no necessity for their being ranged in order of battle, and that nothing more need be done than to form lines of the priests and Levites, who should move cheerfully forward, chanting hymns of thanksgiving, accompanied by music, as upon a day of victory and deliverance from a common enemy. The king's counsel was universally approved and followed.

The Ammonites and confederates slay each other.

Just as the Ammonites and their auxiliaries were ready to begin the attack, they were struck, from on high, with such terror and consternation, that they fell upon one another as enemies; and so frantic was the rage that prevailed amongst them, that, out of so vast a number, nor one man was left alive. When Jehoshaphat took a view of the valley on which the enemy had been encamped, found it covered with dead bodies, and reflected that he obtained ■ victory without either toil or bloodshed on his part, in joy for so signal ■ blessing, he gave his soldiers the pillage of the camp, and the spoils of the dead, which were so immense, that they were three days in collecting and carrying them off.

On the fourth day the multitude assembled together in ■ deep craggy valley, called the valley of Beracha, where they joined in their adorations of the Divine Being, for the late wonderful display of his goodness and power. From hence the valley took its name; for Beracha implies, "The valley of Blessings;" and that name it retains to this day. When Jehoshaphat's army marched back again to Jerusalem, several days were devoted to fasting and sacrifice.

Jehoshaphat is revered by foreign princes.

The fame of this extraordinary event impressed foreign nations with so striking an idea of the piety and virtue of Jehoshaphat, which had been thus eminently rewarded by the Divine protection, that they held him in awe as a prince highly favoured of God, and maintained the same opinion during his reign.

Maintains a friendship with Ahab.

Jehoshaphat lived on terms of friendship with Ahab's son, who was king of Israel, and had a joint concern with him in the ships that traded to Pontus and Thrace. But their design miscarried, to their very great expence and detriment; for the ships were not properly constructed for those seas. Indeed, either through ill conduct or foul weather, they were all cast away; so that their project was rendered abortive, nor was it ever after revived. Thus much, at present, for the transactions of Jehoshaphat.

■ Kings i. Ahabiah imitates the infamous example of his father.

Ahaziah, the son of Ahab, and king of Israel, took up his residence at Samaria. He seemed addicted to all the vices and abominations that fixed a stigma on the character of his father. Indeed, if possible, he out-vied Jeroboam, the grand seducer of the Israelites to idolatry. Soon after his accession to the throne, the Moabites, who had been obedient to the kings of Israel, from the first separation of the two kingdoms, took the opportunity of revolting, nor was it in his power to reduce them to obedience. It happened, in the second year of his reign, that Ahaziah received a violent contusion by a fall from a terrace, inasmuch that he was reduced to a very bad state of health. In this extremity he sent to the god of Ekron (a) to know if he should recover. Upon this occasion the God of the Hebrews commanded the prophet Elias to go meet the messengers, and ask them whether the Israelites had not a God of their own? for, if so, there was no need of consulting a strange god, in this or any other case. He was enjoined also to bid them go back, and tell their Consults an idol god.

(a) Ekron was a city of the Philistines, which fell, by lot, to the tribe of Judah, but was afterwards given to the tribe of Dan; though it does not appear that the Jews ever had a quiet possession of it.

(b) Should it be asked why these men were singled out to suffer Divine punishment, when the whole nation was plunged in the same idolatrous practices and immoralities, is easy to reply, that these men suffered in the case before us, because there was not the same reason why others should suffer; nor could the king that he should not recover. When the prophet had executed the Divine command, the messengers hastened with the purport of it to the king, who was much surprized at their speedy return. On his enquiry concerning the matter for which they had been sent, they informed him that they were met by a man who bade them proceed no farther, but go back and tell their king, in the name of the God of Israel, that the hurt he had received would prove mortal. The king then demanded ■ description of the man who had presumed to send such a message; upon which they told him that he was an hairy man, and that he wore a leather girdle.

The people Elias tells Ahab's doom.

From this description the king immediately concluded the person to be Elias, the prophet, and therefore dispatched an officer, with fifty men, to apprehend him, designing to take away his life for his presumption. The officer, finding the prophet on the top of a mountain, commanded him to come down, and go with him to the king; for it was his positive order, if he refused immediate compliance, to bring him away by force. Elias told the officer that he would convince him, by an extraordinary act, that he was ■ true prophet, and no impostor; he would pray that fire might descend from heaven, and destroy both the soldiers and officer. He accordingly prayed, and a fire (b) instantly descended, and consumed them all. The king no sooner received intelligence of the destruction of these men, than, fired with indignation, he sent another officer with fifty more. Upon his laying on Elias the same command, enforced with the same menaces, they all shared the same fate. After this the king sent a third officer. This person acted very differently from the former; for, when he came to Elias, instead of peremptorily demanding his person, he saluted him with respect, and thus addressed him: "I need not inform you of the purport of my commission, or the reluctance I feel in the execution of it: therefore I have only to intreat that, in compassion for the lives of both officers and soldiers, you would come down, and go with us to the king." Elias was so affected by his discreet and courteous behaviour, that he came down and followed him.

A dreadful judgement executed on the officers who were sent by the king to apprehend the prophet.

When he came to the royal presence, he, without an ceremony, thus addressed the king: "The Lord hath said, Since you esteem me no God, and unable to tell what will be the issue of your distemper, and that you prefer the God of Ekron in point of authenticity, be assured that thou shalt die." The prediction of the prophet was soon verified; for the king's indisposition increasing daily, he at length gave up the ghost; and dying without issue, was succeeded by his brother Jehoram. This prince also followed the pernicious example of his father, devoting himself to the practice of idolatry, in contempt of the laws and religion of his forefathers; though, abstracted from this, his ability for government was considerable.

The prophet approaches the king and assures him of his death.

Ahaziah dies, as his brother Jehoram succeeded, who is a great idolater.

At this time the prophet Elias disappeared from among men (c). He left behind him, as his successor, in the prophetic office, Elisha, of whom we have spoken already.

Disappearance of Elias, and his successor Elisha.

Upon Jehoram's succeeding to the throne of his brother, he formed a resolution of going to war with Mesha, king of the Moabites, for refusing to pay an annual tribute in sheep and lambs, which had been paid to his father Ahab, during the whole of his reign, though denied to his brother Ahaziah. In consequence of this resolution Jehoram raised ■ very considerable army at home, and then solicited the alliance of Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, urging, as a motive, the ancient friendship that subsisted betwixt their respective fathers. Jehoshaphat not only complied with his request, but engaged to bring the king of Idumæa into the league, having, from di-death of any others so well answer the ends of Infinite Wisdom. If this catastrophe was intended for the punishment of evil-doers, who so fit to be made examples, as those who were actually engaged in the wicked enterprize?

(c) The sacred records informs us, that, while this prophet was conversing with his successor, Elisha, in the prophetic office, there suddenly appeared a fiery chariot, that parted them; immediately ■ which the prophet was conveyed by ■ whirlwind into heaven. See ■ Kings ii. 11.

vers causes, ■ considerable influence with that prince.

As Jehoram met with so favourable ■ reception upon his application, he went to Jerusalem, where he was cordially received, and sumptuously entertained, by the king of the place. The plan of the expedition was debated in council; and it was carried unanimous, that the army should march through the desert of Idumæa, where the enemy would be least apprized of their design. According to the resolution formed in council, the kings of Judah, Israel, and Idumæa, proceeded towards the desert, where, having wandered for the space of seven days, they were greatly distressed for want of water both for their men and cattle, insomuch that they sunk into the utmost despondency. Jehoram was so particularly distressed, that he impatiently exclaimed, "What have these three kings done, to be delivered up captives to the Moabites without resistance?" But Jehoshaphat bearing the calamity with pious resignation, endeavoured to soothe the affliction of Jehoram, and advised him to enquire if there was a prophet of the Lord at hand, in order to ask of him counsel concerning the Divine will. Being informed, by a servant, that he had seen Elisha, the son of Shabat, and disciple of Elias, there, the three kings, on the proposal of Jehoshaphat, immediately repaired to the prophet, and enquired of him what would be the consequence of the army's being wholly destitute of water. Elias replied to Jehoram, who was more particularly inquisitive, "Ask counsel of the gods of your father, and of your mother." Jehoram, notwithstanding this abrupt reply, persisted in his application to the prophet, and intreated him to return a favourable answer, and save the lives of thousands that were perishing with thirst. Elisha solemnly declared he would return no answer but for the sake of Jehoshaphat, ■ pious and virtuous prince; and then ordering a musician to be called, while he was singing an hymn, accompanied with his instrument, the prophet recommended to the kings to cause ditches to be cut, which should be supplied with a sufficiency of water both for the people and their cattle. He added, moreover, that henceforward they should not experience the calamities of drought; for that the Almighty would enable them to overcome their enemies, destroy all their plantations, stop their rivers and fountains, and lay their country waste. Early next morning the prediction of Elisha was verified; for there came down from Idumæa, three days journey from that spot, an impetuous torrent, which filled all the ditches they had caused to be dug; so that a copious supply was obtained for the refreshment both of man and beast.

The king of Moab, upon receiving intelligence that the confederate kings were advancing against him by way of the desert, marched out with his whole army to meet them on the borders, and thereby preclude an invasion. The armies of the confederates were by this time not far from the land of Moab; and when the army of that country perceived the water, which, from the reflection of the beams of the rising sun, appeared like blood, they concluded that a contention had arisen between the three kings, that their armies had engaged and slain each other, and that they had nothing more to do than take possession of the spoil of an abandoned camp. Elated with this confidence, they asked permission of their king to rifle, which being granted, they rushed on as to an advantage already gained, upon ■ supposition of their enemies having destroyed each other. But they soon found themselves mistaken; for when they came up to the camp, in order to rifle it, they met with an unexpected reception, the confederates falling on them with such courage and resolution, that, being obliged to give way, great numbers were slain on the spot, and the main body reduced to the necessity of saving themselves by ■ precipitate flight.

The kings, availing themselves of this success, made an incursion into the land of the Moabites, destroyed their cities and towns, drove away their cattle, choked up their rivers and fountains, cut down their timber, and made ravage and devastation wherever they went. The king of the Moabites was obliged to take refuge in a town, which was soon after besieged by the confederate army. Apprehending the danger of losing it by assault, he determined on making one resolute effort. Having selected seven hundred of his choicest troops of horse, he made a desperate sally at their head, in order to break through the enemy's weakest quarters; but failing in the attempt, and meeting with a repulse, he was reduced to the necessity of saving himself by a precipitate retreat to the town in which he had taken refuge. This disappointment, aggravated by others, induced him to an action the most horrid and barbarous that frantic despair could possibly suggest. He took his eldest son, the heir-apparent, and sacrificed him upon the walls of the town, in view of the enemy's army. The kings were so affected at the horrid spectacle, that, impressed by the feelings of humanity, and a reflection on the vicissitudes of fortune, they raised the siege, and retired to their own country. Jehoshaphat lived in peace after this expedition the short time he survived it: he soon after died at Jerusalem, in the sixtieth year of his age, and twenty-fifth of his reign; and was interred, with a magnificence suitable to his character, as he did honour to his station as a king; and to human nature as a man, by a conduct uniformly pious, virtuous, and just.

CHAP. II.

Succession of Jehoram to the throne of his father Jehoshaphat. Elisha performs singular miracles. Adad, king of Syria, invests Samaria. The siege miraculously raised. Adad put to death by Hazael, who usurps his crown. Flagitious actions of Jehoram. Elisha's denunciation against him.

THE late king Jehoshaphat had a numerous issue, but he appointed his eldest son, Jehoram, to the succession. He had the same name with his mother's brother, the son of Ahab, and king of Israel, who was just returned to Samaria from the war with the Moabites, and brought with him the prophet Elisha. There are upon sacred record several memorable passages relative to this venerable character, which I deem worthy of being related upon this occasion.

Elisha was applied to by the widow of Obadiah, steward of Ahab's household. She told him he was no stranger to the violent outrage of Jezebel against the prophets, nor to her husband's preservation of them, and borrowing money for their maintenance. She added, that her husband dying, and leaving her in indigent circumstances, the creditors threatened to make slaves of her and her children for the debt, and therefore intreated him to afford her some assistance. The prophet asked her what she had in the house, to which she replied, that she had only a little oil in ■ cruise. He then bid her borrow what empty vessels she could of her neighbours, take them home with her, shut herself up with her two sons, and from her little, but multiplied, store, to pour into the vessels till they were full. The widow did as she was ordered, and the oil continuing to run from her own vessel till those she had borrowed were full, she returned to the prophet to give him ■ particular account of what had passed, and to thank him for his interposition in her behalf; upon which he told her to sell as much of the oil as would satisfy the creditors, as there would remain a sufficiency for the support of herself and family: by this means she was freed from ■ state of embarrassment.

Elisha having notice of a conspiracy against the life of Jehoram by the Syrians, who had treacherously planted an ambush to surprize him, gave the king immediate intelligence, with ■ caution to beware of a certain place, where the plot was laid. The king availed himself of the prophet's information and advice, put off an intended hunt, and frustrated the whole design. Adad, king of the Syrians, was so incensed at the disappointment, that he reviled his own servants, and threatened them with death itself, for disclosing ■ plot to which they alone were privy. When it was represented to him, "That he should not suffer himself to be biassed by a groundless opinion, nor suspect his servants of discovering his design to his enemy;" when he was also given to understand that the prophet Elisha was the man who had discovered and laid open all his counsels, he gave immediate orders to some of his messengers to go in quest of the prophet; and word was soon sent him that he might be found at Dathan. Upon this intelligence he immediately dispatched a number of officers to apprehend him. They beset the town by night, and thereby prevented passengers from coming in or going out. When the prophet's servant had notice of this extraordinary incident, and found the design upon his master, he hastened to him, and, with timorous accent, related the circumstance. Elisha bid him take courage, nor harbour a fear in his breast, for his confidence was ever firmly reposed in the goodness and power of the over-ruling Providence. Upon this he besought the Almighty to manifest to his servant his presence and protection in such a manner, as to inspire him with hope and courage, and lead him to an entire resignation to his holy will and pleasure. His prayers were heard; and there appeared, in the sight of the servant, a multitude of chariots and horses round about Elisha, as a guard to his person. This dissipated the fear, and animated the courage, of the servant, as well as confirmed the character and office of his master.

After this the prophet intreated that the Syrians might have such a mist cast before their eyes, as to affect their sight, so that they should not discern him from another man. In confidence of the grant of this request, he went into the midst of the troops, and asked them whom they fought. They answered, "Elisha, the prophet;" upon which he told them, if they would follow him, he would lead them to the place where he was to be found. These men, whose understanding became impaired, as well as their sight, followed him with the greatest cheerfulness, till at length he brought them to Samaria. Upon their entrance into the city, king Jehoram, at the instance of the prophet, commanded the gates to be shut, and the Syrians to be surrounded. Elisha then intreated that their sight might be restored; and his prayer being granted, the mist was withdrawn, and, to their great astonishment, the Syrians saw themselves surrounded by their enemies in their own capital, Samaria.

While the Syrians were in this state of danger and suspense, apprehending nothing but a retaliation of injuries from a professed enemy, the king proposed to the prophet the putting them all to death: but this he absolutely rejected, as a means totally inconsistent with honour, justice, and humanity, and never justifiable but in self defence, or when victory is obtained in battle. He observed, that these men had been guilty of no act of hostility upon his territories, but only were brought thither by the Divine will, and through the Divine power, without any malicious intention, and without their own knowledge. The prophet, from these considerations, recommended to the king that they should be treated not only with lenity, but hospitality, and, after affording them every comfortable refreshment, dismissed without the least annoyance. Jehoram followed his counsel; so that, after a splendid and sumptuous regale, they were sent home to their king without offer of the least injury.

Upon their return they related to the king the particulars of this strange event, which struck him with conviction, that it was certainly brought about by the display of a Divine power, and that what the prophet had delivered were the dictates of Divine inspiration. He therefore determined to make no more secret attempts upon the king of Israel; but resolved, however, upon an open war, relying on the strength and power of superior numbers.

In consequence of this resolution Adad raised a formidable army, and marched with his whole force against Jehoram, who thinking himself incompetent to engage him in the field through great inequality in point of numbers, kept within the walls of Samaria, depending on the strength of its fortifications. Adad, however, invested the place, not doubting of its surrender, if not through force of arms, by famine, through his precluding them from obtaining provisions. The siege had not been long carried on before the people were brought to so miserable a scarcity, that a man's head was sold for fourscore pieces of silver, and five pieces were given for a pint of pulse. In this extremity Jehoram was apprehensive that the enemy might receive information of the dreadful degree in which the famine prevailed, so that he daily walked round the fortifications, had an eye upon the guards, and was very attentive that no person whatever should enter the city with first undergoing a proper examination.

As the king was one day walking on the walls of the city, upon this business of watchful inspection, a strange woman accosted him, requesting his assistance. Supposing she wanted food, he put her off with a rebuke of anger, asking her how she could expect relief from him, who had neither barns, nor any kind of provisions to spare. The woman gave him to understand she did not come to solicit him for food, but for justice, and earnestly intreated him to determine a dispute between her and another woman. The king asking her meaning, she told him that "Her neighbour and herself, having each a male infant, and being both ready to perish for want of food, came to an agreement to kill their children and eat them, as the only means to prevent starving. She added, that her child was killed and dressed the preceding day, and the other woman partook of it; but that now, when she ought, in turn, to partake of her child, the woman had broken her agreement, and concealed it (a)."

Jehoram, deeply affected by this melancholy tale, rent his clothes, and, in a fit of rage and horror, vowed vengeance on Elisha, whom he took to be the cause of this dreadful calamity. While this frenzy prevailed, he dispatched an officer to take off the prophet's head; and the man immediately set forward to execute his commission. Elisha, by the spirit of prophecy, had notice of this wicked design against his life, and, therefore, having acquainted the people with it who were with him, and particularly informed them, that Jehoram, the son of a murderer, had sent an officer, with a party, who were then on the way, to take off his head, he desired them to secure the doors, and by all means to admit the officer till the arrival of the king, who, he had reason to be assured, had changed his mind, and was hastening after his people to prevent mischief. They watched as they were directed, shut the doors upon the men when they came, and kept them out till the appearance of Jehoram, who hastened with the utmost speed to countermand the execution of the order, and save the life of the prophet.

The king, on his arrival, began to reproach the prophet with inhumanity, in beholding himself and his people reduced to such extremity of distress, without interposing, and offering up one prayer for their relief. The prophet then encouraged and comforted him with this promise and assurance, "That, by the same hour on the following day, Samaria should be so abundantly stored with all kinds of provisions, that the market price of a measure of fine flour should be only a shekel; and that two measures of barley should be sold for the same sum." This prediction was credited by the king, and those of his attendants, who had seen different proofs of the prophet's veracity. They rejoiced in the presage as if already accomplished, and bore their present distresses with a degree of patient resignation, being revived by the hope of speedy relief. But one of the king's favourite officers, who commanded a third of the lepers

There was a law in Samaria, that no persons affected with the leprosy, and whose bodies were not cleansed from it, should be suffered to live within the walls of the city. It happened, at this time, that there were four leprosy persons that had their habitations without the gates. The famine raged with such violence in the city, that no provisions could be expected from that quarter; and to remain in their habitations, would be to give themselves up to the most lamentable of deaths. They therefore unanimously resolved to cast themselves upon the mercy of the enemy, who would either relieve their necessities, or put them to death; so that their miseries one way or other would be soon terminated.

In consequence of this resolution, they proceeded, by night, to the camp of the Syrians, whether they had no sooner arrived, than, to their great surprize, they found it entirely deserted by the enemy. For, upon the approach of the lepers, the Syrians were struck with ■ panic, by the imaginary noise of horses and armed men breaking in upon them, and concluded that the king of Israel had called in the assistance of allies, and were coming to surprize them. This conjecture threw them into the greatest consternation, insomuch that they hastened to Adad, and told him that the confederate kings were just at hand, within hearing of the march of the army. Adad gave credit to the delusion, as he himself was influenced by the same false imagination; so that, in one general confusion, the whole camp broke up, the army dispersed, and every man began to shift for himself, leaving their treasure, cattle, baggage, and provision; in ■ word, all their possessions behind them.

The lepers, having gone through the camp of the Syrians, and found all safe, first regaled themselves most plentifully, and then carried off a great quantity of gold, and other valuable effects, without finding so much as ■ person in the field. They loaded themselves four times, and buried their treasure in a hole, which they dug for that purpose, without the camp. But while they were thus regaling, and providing for themselves, they reflected that their countrymen were still under the dismal apprehensions of starving in the town, or perishing by the enemy, and that it was but justice to inform them, as soon ■ possible, of the happy event that had taken place. Thus resolved, they made the utmost haste to the city, called aloud to the centinels on the walls, that the enemy had totally abandoned their camp, and left behind them all their tents, cattle, and treasure.

Intelligence of this important event being communicated to the king, he immediately summoned a full council, to whom he gave it as his own private opinion, that it was only ■ artifice of the enemy to draw them out of the city, and that, placing themselves in ambush, they would suddenly fall ■ them, and obtain ■ compleat victory. He observed, that they might, perhaps, despair of starving the besieged to death, and therefore had recourse to this invention to surprize them, and thereby gain their point. From thence he inferred the expediency of guarding against such ■ design, and deliberating on measures with the greatest caution. One of the council stood up, and, with due deference to that venerable board, gave his opinion in concurrence with that of the king, observing further, that it would be proper to send two horsemen as far as the river Jordan for discovery, and if their suggestions were justly founded, and they should be made prisoners, the loss would not be considerable; but if they did not discover any part of the enemy, they might reasonably suppose that all was safe, and that they had retired to their own country.

The king readily assenting to the last proposal, two scouts were immediately dispatched for intelligence. In a short time they returned, and reported, that not one individual of the enemy was to be seen; but that they saw abundance of corn, arms, and other articles which they had left behind them, that they might be light and more expeditious in their flight. Upon this information, the people, at the king's command, rushed out of the city, in great numbers, in order to pillage the enemy's deserted camp, where they found an immense booty, in treasure and cattle, and such an incredible stock of grain, that, in ■ most amazing superabundance, they forgot their scarcity; for two measures of barley were sold for one shekel, and ■ measure of flour at the same price, according to the prediction of Elisha. This measure contains about an Italian bushel and an half.

The officer, who disputed the veracity of the prophecy, was appointed by the king to guard the gate, which led from the city to the camp, in order to prevent disorder, and their crushing one another to death in the sally; but the crowd pressed on him with such vehemence that he was trampled to death: so that, though he saw the great abundance of provisions afterwards brought to market, yet, as the prophet had foretold, he did not taste thereof.

When Adad, upon the miraculous raising of the siege of Samaria, had escaped to Damascus, and was informed, that all the alarms of chariots and horsemen, that had given such an irreparable rout to him and his army, were, in truth, nothing more than judicial impressions of fright and terror, without any foundation, he looked upon it ■ declaration from heaven against him; and this anxiety of thought made him as sick in body ■ in mind.

2 King 8.

Adad, being informed that Elisha was at this time in Damascus, he sent Hazael (who was now become one of his prime ministers) with magnificent presents to the prophet, and to enquire whether or not he should recover from the sickness under which he then laboured. The noble messenger took with him forty camels, loaded with the choicest curiosities that either the town or country afforded, and meeting Elisha on the way, saluted him, with the greatest reverence, in the name, and by the command, of king Adad, telling him, at the same time, that he had commission to offer him presents, and also to consult him about his disease, whether or not he might hope for relief. The prophet assured Hazael, that the king was to die, but charged him not to disclose it to him. The messenger was much affected by this melancholy presage; and Elisha poured forth tears abundantly, on contemplation of the miseries the people were to undergo after the decease of Adad. When Hazael enquired of the prophet the cause of his excessive grief, he replied, "I cannot refrain from weeping, when I contemplate on the calamities which you yourself are to bring upon the people of Israel. You will put their strong men to the sword, burn their fenced cities, dash their children against the stones, and destroy their women in a state of pregnancy." When Hazael, struck with surprize, asked, by what power he was to perpetrate all these evils, the prophet assured him he had received Divine intimation that he was to reign in Syria.

These words of Elisha fixed the ambition of Hazael, who immediately left the prophet, and returning to the king his master, gave him great hopes of recovery. This, however, the treacherous courtier took care to prevent himself; for the next morning he put him to death, by stifling him with a cloth dipped in water, and took possession of his palace and government. Adad was ■ active prince, and greatly beloved by his people, insomuch that, to this day, the memory of Adad, and Hazael his successor, is honoured by the Syrians, for their generosity in general; and the magnificence of the temples they erected at Damascus, together with the ornaments with which they embellished the city in particular. Their images are daily carried in grand procession, and much esteemed for their antiquity; for several hundred years have elapsed from the time of the existence of their original. The death of Adad gave rest to the king of Israel, delivered him from the apprehensions which had long disturbed his quiet, and afforded him the enjoyment of an interval of peace.

abandoned of his predecessors. Indeed, he was chiefly instigated by the example and persuasion of his wife, Gotholiah, the daughter of Ahab, to trespass against the laws and religion of his country; by the practice of idolatry, and departing from the worship of the only one and true God. Now, though the Almighty was not pleased to extirpate this family, for the sake of the promise given to David, Jehoram continued his provocations by the introduction of customs that tended to the promotion of impiety, and the subversion of the real interests of the people.

The Idumæans revolt from Jehoram.

The Idumæans having at this time revolted from Jehoram, and slain their former king, who had ever been faithful to his father, as well as set up another in his place, Jehoram, incensed at this insult, made an incursion with a considerable troop of horse, and a number of chariots, into the enemy's quarters by night. He destroyed those parts that were contiguous to his own kingdom, but did not attempt any further progress into the country. This expedition, so far from filling the minds of those who had revolted with any degree of fear and apprehension, instigated others to follow their example; for it caused the defection of the country of Libnah. Such, indeed, was the frantic madness of Jehoram, that he compelled the people to go up to the high places of the mountains, and there pay their adorations, and worship false gods.

2 Chron. 21.

As he persisted in these abominations, setting the religion and laws of his country at defiance, there was brought him an epistle from the prophet Elisha, which declared, "That since he had wilfully and presumptuously set himself in opposition to the practice and example of his forefathers, and espoused the prophanation of the Israelites, and that, not resting there, he had corrupted the tribe of Judah, and the citizens of Jerusalem, from the worship of the true God, and seduced them to idolatrous superstitions, in making gods of images, and, like Ahab, used violent means to compel the people to those abominable practices, not sparing the blood of his brother, and other pious and virtuous men, that, for these causes, his family and people should fall into the hands of a merciless enemy, that should spare neither women nor children, and that he himself should be tormented with a lingering pain in his intestines, till his bowels should rot by degrees, and at length fall out." This was the judgment denounced at the Divine command, by the prophet Elisha, in his epistle to Jehoram, who was brought too late to a sense of his impiety.

The Arabians invade Judea. Miserable death of Jehoram. Succession of his son Ahaziah.

SOON after this dreadful denunciation of the Divine vengeance against Jehoram, an army of Arabians, from the borders of Ethiopia, with other barbarians, made an incursion into his dominions, rifled his palace, and put to the sword his wives, and all his children, except one, who was Ahaziah, and he very narrowly escaped their fury. This public calamity was followed by the execution of the judgment denounced against the king, who, according to the prediction of the prophet, fell into a most tormenting disease, his bowels dropping out daily by degrees, till at length he expired in the greatest agony. As he lived detested, so he died unlamented, by the people, who even insulted his remains, inferring the justice of his punishment from the enormity of his crimes. They even denied him an honourable funeral, or a place in the sepulchral monument of his father. He died in the fortieth year of his age, and eighth of his reign, and was succeeded on the throne by his son, Ahaziah.

CHAP. IV.

Jehoram is wounded at the siege of Ramoth-Gilead. Jehu carries on the siege. Is anointed king of Israel. Proceeds to the city of Jezreel.

AS the city of Ramoth-Gilead had been a place of long dispute between the two crowns of Israel and Syria, Jehoram, king of the Israelites, on the death of Adad, king of Syria, entertained sanguine hopes of recovering it. With that view he laid siege to it with a very powerful army; but, at the first onset, he received a very dangerous wound with an arrow from the bow of a Syrian; so that he was obliged to quit the army, and retire to Jezreel, for necessary accommodations, and the conveniences of the cure. His troops, however, continued to oppose the enemy under the command of Jehu, to whom it was delegated during his absence, and who, in a short time, took it by force. Jehoram proposed, on his return, to prosecute the war against the Syrians; but, in the mean time, the prophet Elisha, thinking it a proper opportunity for executing the orders left him by Elias, relative to the punishment of the house of Ahab, ordered one of his disciples to go to Ramoth-Gilead, and there anoint and declare Jehu king, in the name, and by the authority, of the Most High. He also ordered him to depart in as private a manner as possible, and by no means give the least notice of the purport of his journey.

When the young prophet reached the town, he found Jehu engaged with his officers, in consulting what steps should be taken relative to the prosecution of the war. As soon as a convenient opportunity offered, he gave Jehu to understand that he desired to have a conference with him in private. The general immediately retired with him into an inner chamber, which they had no sooner entered, than the young prophet, taking out a phial of oil, poured it on his head, telling him, "That God had chosen him king for the destruction of the house of Ahab, and to avenge the blood of the prophets that had been so wantonly and cruelly spilt by Jezebel." He added, that "As Jeroboam, the son of Nebat, and after him the family of Baasha, had been utterly exterminated for their wickedness, so there should be left no remainder of the impious stock of Ahab." When he had thus spoken, he hastily left the chamber, and endeavoured to pass unseen by any of the army.

As soon as Jehu returned to the council-chamber, the officers, from the appearance of the young prophet, having entertained a very mean opinion of him, enquired concerning his person and business, intimating that he seemed to give indications of insanity. Jehu, at first, gave an evasive answer; but that rendering them more urgent and inquisitive, he related to them all that had passed, told them he was a prophet, and that his business was to anoint him king of Israel, which he had no sooner done than he hastened away.

After this declaration every one of them put off his garment, and strewed it under him in token of submission; and when he had taken his place they all saluted him king, with acclamations, benedictions, and the sounds of horns and trumpets, to congratulate his accession to the throne. Jehoram still continued at Jezreel, on account of the wound he had received from the Syrians at the siege of Ramoth-Gilead; and Ahaziah, king of Judah, his sister's son, was also at the same place, upon a visit of duty and respect to him. Jehu therefore took this opportunity of marching with his army to Jezreel, where he might surprize them both at once; but warned his men, upon their allegiance, not to give Jehoram any intelligence of their design.

CHAP. V.

Jehoram and Ahaziah are both slain by Jehu.

JEHU was disappointed in his intention to get to Jezreel before Jehoram could receive any intelligence of what had passed at Ramoth-Gilead, notwithstanding the precision with which his officers had executed his orders in possessing themselves of all the avenues to the town, and keeping the strictest guard. Jehoram had a centinel on the watch-tower, who perceiving a large body of men approaching; concluded it was Jehu who commanded them, hastily ran to the king, and acquainted him with the particulars of what he had seen, and his conjectures who they were. The king upon this immediately dispatched a messenger on horseback to the party with instructions to learn who they were. The messenger executed his master's orders, and, on making enquiry relative to the state of the army, Jehu, instead of giving giving him the least satisfaction as to the purport of his message, ordered him to fall into his rear, and join the march. The messenger, in this situation, was under an unavoidable necessity of obeying; and the centinel on the watch tower seeing him detained, gave the king notice that he had joined the troops. He then dispatched another messenger with the same instructions, and with the same success as the former, till roused with resentment by such contemptuous treatment, the two kings mounted their chariots, and set out together to meet Jehu, who continued his march at a very regular moderate pace. It happened that they met near the field of Naboth, the Jezreelite, and very probably not far from the spot where that innocent and injured man was stoned to death. On their first meeting, Jehoram asked Jehu concerning the situation of his army, and whether it was war or peace? Jehu, in reply, cast a bitter reflection on the whoredom and witchcraft of Jezebel, his mother.

The kings meet near the field of Naboth.

Jehu slays Jehoram.

Ahaziah mortally wounded by Jehu.

Interred at Jerusalem.

From this answer Jehoram was convinced of the hostile intentions of Jehu, and the danger in which he stood himself; so that he gave Ahaziah to understand he was betrayed, and then turned his chariot, and endeavoured to save himself by flight. But Jehu prevented him from effecting his design; for, at that instant, he let fly an arrow at him, which penetrating his heart, he immediately expired in his chariot. As soon as Jehu saw this, he commanded Bidkar, one of his principal officers, to take the body and cast it into the field of Naboth. This circumstance suggested to his mind the prediction of the prophet Elias to his father Ahab, "That his whole race should perish on the very spot he had unjustly arrested from Naboth, the legal proprietor."

When Ahaziah, king of Judah, saw the fate of Jehoram, he became apprehensive of his own danger, and attempted to make his escape, and turned off into a bye-path to evade pursuit. But Jehu, following him to a certain bank, wounded him with an arrow, and caused him to leave his chariot, and take horse, in order to save himself by flight. He reached as far as the city of Megiddo, where he died of his wounds. His remains were removed to Jerusalem, and there interred in the royal sepulchre of his ancestors. He reigned over Judah two years, and was a despicable a character as his father.

CHAP. VI.

Jezebel is put to death by command of Jehu, who exterminates the race of Ahab, the idolatrous priests, and demolishes the temple of Baal.

IN the mean time Jehu made the best of his way to Jezreel, where Jezebel, the queen mother, determined to maintain her state to the last, had dressed herself in her best attire, and fixed herself at a window of the gate of the city, in order to view the procession. As soon as Jehu came opposite the window, she upbraided him with treachery, and uttered this sarcasm; "A hopeful servant that kills his master." Fired with indignation at such insolence, Jehu called out to know who she was, and bade her come down; but she not immediately obeying, he commanded the eunuchs that were about her to cast her down headlong, which being done, the walls of the tower, against which she struck in falling, were stained with her blood; and when her body fell to the ground, it was so trampled on by the horses as to be quite disfigured.

Jezebel is trodden under foot, and torn by dogs, as Kings ix.

Soon after Jehu and his retinue arrived at the palace, he gave orders to Jezebel's servants, from respect to her exalted station, to see the remains of their mistress interred with the honours due to her rank; but when they came to seek for her body, they found only a part of the skull, the palms of her hands, and her feet, the rest having been devoured by dogs. When Jehu was informed of this circumstance, it gave him additional veneration for the prophetic spirit of Elias, who had foretold, "That dogs should eat the flesh of Jezebel in the field of Jezreel."

There were at this time seventy sons of king Ahab in Samaria, under the guardianship of the governors, elders, and other great men of the city. Jehu, to effect his intention of extirpating the race of Ahab, wrote letters to these guardians, giving them to understand, that, being well provided with men, arms, chariots, horses, and all necessary implements of war, they would do well in selecting one of the bravest youths from the stock of Ahab, under whose conduct they might revenge the death of their lord and master. This insinuation was thrown out to sound their disposition, and try how they stood affected to his interest. Having deliberated on the purport of the letters with great circumspection, and come to a resolution, that it would be neither prudent or safe, in their then situation of affairs, to oppose a power that had already defeated the united efforts of two mighty potentates, it was unanimously agreed to return for answer, "That they would own no other lord and master than himself, and that they were entirely at his devotion." Jehu sent them back, in reply, "That, as a proof of the fidelity of their allegiance, they should send him next day the heads (a) of all the sons of Ahab, which he should deem an indubitable testimony of their good faith." The guardians having conferred on this injunction of Jehu, unanimously agreed on compliance, and, without the least remorse, ordered the heads of all the princes to be cut off, put into baskets, and sent to Jezreel. Jehu, being informed of their arrival, ordered them to be laid in two heaps before the gate of the city, one on each side, and to let them remain there that night. The next morning he went to the place, and, after viewing the heads, addressed the people to this effect: "I was concerned in the death of my master, but I did not slay all these." His main point was to satisfy the people that this rigour towards the house of Ahab was not only agreeable to the Divine will, but consonant with the prediction of the prophet. When he had extirpated as many of the race of Ahab as could be found, he returned to Samaria. On his way he overtook a company, consisting of forty-two people; and enquiring who they were, and where they were going, they replied, they were relations of Ahaziah, king of Judah, and were going to pay a visit to the court of Samaria, being ignorant of the fate of the late kings, Jehoram and Ahaziah. As soon as Jehu understood who they were, he ordered his guards immediately to seize and put them to death.

Ahab's 70 sons are slain by desire of Jehu.

Jehu causes Ahaziah's relations to be slain.

When he had advanced a little farther, he met Jehonadab, his particular friend, and a man of strict probity, who, after the first salutation, highly commended him for his zeal in extirpating the race of the wicked Ahab, according to the Divine command. Jehu then invited him to accompany him in his chariot to Samaria, assuring him he "Would not spare one apostate, but put to the sword all the false prophets and priests, and those who deceived the multitude, and seduced them from the worship of the true God to the adoration of foreign gods, deeming it pleasing to a good man to see the destruction of the wicked." Jehonadab submitted to the king's pleasure, and attended him to the city.

As soon as Jehu arrived at Samaria, he caused strict search to be made for all the kindred of Ahab, and all that could be found to be put to death; so that, in a short time, the whole race was extirpated. He next formed a resolution of destroying the temple of Baal, with all the false prophets and idolatrous priests, which design he executed by the following stratagem. Calling an assembly of the people together, he told them he was determined to pay a very strict attention to the worship of Baal; adding, that "If Ahab served Baal a little, Jehu would serve him twice as much; for he would worship double the number." He then desired that all that if any of the inferior people had been inclined to oppose his designs, they were, by these means, deprived of any man of figure and distinction to head them: and not only so, but, by this expedient, Jehu thought likewise that he might, in a great measure, justify, at least lessen, the odium of his own conduct.

the prophets and priests of Baal might be present, as he had ■ great sacrifice to offer to the god of Ahab, whom they called Baal, declaring at the same time, that the absence of any priest should be punished with death. Having appointed a day for the proposed solemnity, he sent messengers throughout the whole country of the Israelites, to summon the priests up to Samaria on that day. Upon the arrival of the priests and prophets, they were presented with those kinds of vestments in which they were accustomed to perform their religious ceremonies. When Jehu entered the temple, attended by Jehonadab, he gave orders that strict search should be made to find out any who were not worshippers of Baal, as he would not suffer any prophane intruder to mix in their sacred offices. It being reported that none were present but the devotees of Baal, he ordered them to proceed to the performance of their usual ceremonies. Just as they were beginning, he had fourscore guards ready at the door, who only waited the word of command to break in upon the idolators. Their orders were to put all the false prophets and priests to the sword, and vindicate the laws and religion of their fathers, which had been so long and so flagrantly violated. He threatened that if any one was suffered to escape, their own lives should pay the forfeit. The word of command was given, the commission was executed with the utmost rigour, and every individual put to the sword. The temple was set on fire, and reduced to ashes; so that Samaria was now purged of its idolatrous abominations. This Baal was the Syrian idol, to whom Ahab dedicated an altar in Samaria, for the sake of Ithobal, his father-in-law, king of Tyre and Sidon.

Thus did Jehu extirpate the race of Ahab, and abolish the rites and ceremonies of the worship of Baal, although he suffered the Israelites to persist in the worship of their golden calves. WHEN Athaliah, daughter of Ahab, king of Israel, and widow of Jehoram, king of Judah, was informed of the devastations which Jehu had made in the impious house of her father, and particularly of the massacre of her brother and son, she formed a resolution of revenging their deaths by so effectually extirpating the race of David, as not to suffer one to escape her vengeance, who should boast an hereditary claim to the crown of Judah. To effect this, she gave orders that not only the children of Ahaziah, but likewise their offspring, should all be put to death. These orders were accordingly put in execution, but, from a circumstance that occurred, were not, ■ she intended, fully accomplished. At this time Jehosheba, the sister of Ahaziah, by the father's side, was married to Jehoiada, the high-priest. Coming to the palace, where Athaliah's executioners were murdering all the rest, she found Joash, ■ infant of about a year old, amongst the dead bodies of the slain, which it seems had there been concealed by the nurse. She privately conveyed him to her dwelling, and from thence into the temple, where she kept him concealed during the six years of Athaliah's reign over Jerusalem and the two tribes, without the knowledge of any one person, except her husband.

After the expiration of six years, Jehoiada entered into an association with five principal officers of the army (captains of hundreds) to depose Athaliah, and transfer the crown to the right heir. Having bound themselves by an oath of fidelity and secrecy, they applied themselves to the execution of the design, in which they embarked with great confidence of success. The officers, who had joined in the association with Jehoiada, dispersed themselves throughout the country, to summon the priests, Levites, and the leading men of the tribes, in the name of the high-priest, to Jerusalem.

As soon as they were assembled, Jehoiada informed them that they were called together to consult on ■ matter he had to communicate, which was of the utmost importance to the public weal. He added, that the business required secrecy, in order to carry it into execution with success. The oath having been generally administered, he opened the whole affair without reserve, and then pointing to the child, addressed them in words to this effect: ■ Behold your "king, the only surviving branch of that family, "which, according to the Divine promise and pre- "diction, shall never be wanting to fill the throne "of David. It is my advice that you divide your- "selves into three parties; one to guard the person "of the king in the temple, one to secure the ave- "nues leading to it, and the other to guard the open "gate that leads to the palace, that none be permit- "ted to enter, except the priests and Levites, upon "pain of death." He also gave orders that ■ select number of priests and Levites should stand with their drawn swords as a guard about the king, to put to death whosoever should press into the temple with a weapon about him; and, at all events, to secure the life of the king.

When these preparations were made, Jehoiada brought forth the young prince, placed the crown on his head, put the book of the law into his hand, anointed him, and then proclaimed him king of Judah, the people expressing their approbation by the loudest acclamations.

The shouts of the people reaching the palace, greatly alarmed Athaliah, who immediately summoning her guards to assemble, hastily repaired to the temple, where she herself was admitted by the priests; but her attendants were kept out by the guards, who were posted there by Jehoiada for that very purpose.

As soon as she entered the place, and saw the child upon the throne with a royal crown upon his head, and heard, at the same time, the loud huzzas of the people upon the joyful occasion, she rent her clothes, exclaimed vehemently, and called her guards to exterminate the traitors who had combined to deprive her of her kingdom. Jehoiada, on the other side, commanded the officers of the guards to conduct her immediately out of the temple, as that place was not to be polluted with the blood of a sorceress. Orders were likewise given, that if any man should attempt a rescue, he should be put to death. Those who had the charge of this commission conducted Athaliah to the stable gate belonging to the palace, and there dispatched her without any opposition.

As soon as this design upon Athaliah had taken effect, Jehoiada summoned the populace to the temple, and administered to them an oath of allegiance to their king, respecting the safety and defence of his person, and the honour and preservation of his government. These ceremonies being over, the whole multitude hastened to the temple, which Jehoram and his wife Athaliah had built, during the reign of Ahab, king of Israel, near Jerusalem, and dedicated to Baal. After destroying the image of Baal, and all the ornaments within, they levelled the whole structure with the ground, and put to death Mattan, the priest, who was then in attendance.

placed a second time on the throne, was received with the loudest acclamations. A general joy and festivity took place; nor did one man regret the fall of the impious Athaliah.

Joash was seven years old when he came to the crown. His mother's name was Zibia, of Beerseba. During the life of Jehoiada, he observed the laws, and maintained a zeal for Divine worship. When he arrived at years of maturity, he had two wives given to him by the high-priest, by whom he had both sons and daughters. Thus much, for the present, relative to Joash, and the particulars respecting his deliverance from the treachery of Athaliah, and his advancement to the throne of Judah.

HAZAEI, king of Syria, at this time waged war against the Israelites, and their king Jehu, laying waste a large track of land to the eastward beyond Jordan, particularly in the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasses, not only burning and pillaging, but putting men, women, and children, to the sword, without mercy. Nor did Jehu seem disposed to resent his outrages and cruelty, having, from a zealous defender of the religion and laws of his country, degenerated into a negligence and contempt of them. He died in the twenty-seventh year of his reign over Israel, was buried at Samaria, and succeeded in his government by his son, Jehoahaz.

Sometime after Joash had been on the throne of Judah, he formed a resolution of repairing the temple, which had been very much damaged in the days of Jehoram and Athaliah. For this purpose he directed his uncle, Jehoiada, to send certain priests and Levites throughout the several parts of his dominions, in order to raise a supply of money, by levying a tax on the people, at half a shekel a head. Jehoiada, convinced that the people were not disposed to apply their money towards the ends proposed, did not put the king's commands in force, and they remained unexecuted till the twenty-third year of his reign. Joash then finding so pious a resolution totally laid aside, sent for Jehoiada, the high-priest, together with the priests and Levites, whom he censured for their negligence, and repeated his charge to them, to set about the necessary methods for raising the contribution required. A variety of expedients were suggested by Jehoiada, in order to effect the business without aggrrieving the people, till at length the following was adopted as most eligible. A chest, made of wood, through the cover of which a slit was cut, for the purpose of receiving donations, was placed over the altar. This being done, it was recommended to the people to contribute towards the intended work, in proportion to their zeal for the true religion, and the worship of the only true God. The multitude being perfectly satisfied with these means of collecting, brought contributions of gold and silver in great abundance. The high-priest was entrusted with the key of the chest, which, in the presence of the king, was opened every day, and after the money was counted, it was registered by the clerks of the treasury.

When it was found that sufficient treasure was accumulated for beginning the work, masons, carpenters, and other artificers were employed, and the choicest timber, and all necessary materials provided; so that, in a short time, the repairs were compleatly finished. The overplus of the contribution, which was very considerable, was applied to the purpose of procuring cups, flaggons, goblets, and other vessels, for sacred services, over and above the oblation of daily sacrifices. This important work was finished under the immediate care and inspection of Jehoiada, who, with it, closed his life in the 130th year of his age. He was a man of exemplary piety and virtue, universally beloved by the people; and, in consideration of his steady attachment to the house of David, his remains were deposited in the sepulchre of the kings.

The death of the good high-priest was productive of fatal consequences both to king and nation. Joash soon degenerated from his late zeal for the cause of true religion, into a contemptuous negligence of the Divine worship; and the heads of the people were in general disposed to follow his example, till, indeed, from the baneful influence of the great, the apostacy became almost universal.

This declension from the laws and religion of their forefathers, to which they had so inflexibly adhered during the life of Jehoiada, was highly offensive to the Almighty, who was pleased to send several prophets to expostulate both with the king and people on their flagrant impiety, and to threaten them with a severe punishment, unless they immediately reformed, and returned to their duty. But the vengeance denounced against them, and the repeated examples of the fate of their predecessors and families, upon whom the judgement of heaven had been inflicted, as a punishment for the enormity of their crimes, were not sufficient to effect a reformation. Nay, such was the obduracy, as well as ingratitude, of the king, that he caused Zachariah, son of the late high-priest, Jehoiada, to be stoned to death in one of the courts near the temple, for the freedom he had taken in remonstrating with him, in strong terms, on the general impiety, and exhorting both him and his people to a timely repentance, in order to avert those judgements which, their persisting in their iniquities, would certainly entail upon them. The prophet Zachariah appealed to God with his dying breath, his judge and witness, that, "He suffered only for having administered good counsel, and being the son of a man, who had deserved so well from his king and country."

Death of Joash.

It was not long before the great avenger of violence was pleased to punish Joash for his base treatment of his servant and prophet Zachariah. Hazael, king of Syria, made an incursion, with a powerful army, into his dominions; and having first rifled and destroyed Gath, proceeded towards Jerusalem, where the king himself had taken refuge. Joash, being in no condition to make resistance, was so alarmed at the approach of the Syrian army, that, to redeem himself from the miseries of a siege, he compounded for himself and the city, and delivered up all the treasure of the temple, that which was dedicated to religious uses, as well as the donations of particular kings, to Hazael, in order to prevail with him to withdraw his troops. The value of the bribe tempted the invader, who accepted it, raised the siege, and returned with his forces to his own country.

No sooner was Hazael departed than Joash was attacked with a severe distemper; and the friends of Zachariah, in revenge for the death of the prophet, and son of their late much loved high-priest, took him by surprise, and slew him. Joash reigned forty years, and was buried in the city of Jerusalem; but his late impious courses had rendered him so obnoxious in the eyes of the people, that his remains were denied a place in the royal sepulchre.

JOASH was succeeded in the government of Judah by his son Amaziah, who, at the time of his accession, was twenty-five years of age. In the twenty-first year of Joash, Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu, entered upon the government of Israel, in Samaria, and held it seventeen years. He cannot be said to have followed the example of his father, which, at the commencement, and during a considerable part of his reign, was praise worthy; for the son and successor lived in the constant practice of all impious and idolatrous abominations. For this cause it pleased the Almighty to afflict both him and his people, by delivering him into the hands of Hazael, who reduced him to so low an ebb, that he had no more than 10,000 foot, and 500 horse, to defend himself against the enemy, who wasted his country, and destroyed his subjects. This circumstance fulfilled the the prediction of Elisha to Hazael, when he told him he should kill his lord and master, and take possession of Syria and Damascus.

Jehoahaz intercedes, and obtains the Divine aid and protection.

In this unfortunate situation Jehoahaz had recourse to heaven, by prayer and supplication, for deliverance from the power and oppression of the Syrians. His humiliation was accepted; and that Divine goodness, that supports the innocent, and pardons the penitent, and is even disposed to reform, rather than punish, was pleased to grant him his request, put an end to a ruinous war by a timely peace, and restore his dominions to the blessings they had formerly enjoyed.

Joash, the son of Jehoahaz, a pious prince

After the death of Jehoahaz, Joash, his son, succeeded to the government of Israel, in the thirty-seventh year of the reign of Joash, king of Judah. He was a pious and virtuous prince, and maintained a character, for religion and government, totally different from that of his father.

The prophet Elisha was now far advanced in years, and being, as was supposed, upon his last bed of sickness, Joash, who always entertained the highest respect for the prophet, and paid him the greatest reverence, made him a visit on this melancholy occasion. After he had expressed his grief for the agonies under which the good old prophet laboured, and mixed his lamentation with tears, he pointed out the great loss all Israel would sustain in the death of a father, defender, and protector; as such he had proved both by his counsel and his prayers, which had so often delivered them from the desolation of their enemies, and obtained them the most important of blessings.

Visits Elisha in his sickness. Emblematical prediction of the prophet.

The kindness and compassion of the king so far wrought upon the prophet, that, having first bestowed on him his blessing, he emblematically predicted to him the future success he should have over his enemies the Syrians, in the following manner: he called for a bow and arrows, and, when brought, bid the king put his hand upon the bow, bend it and shoot. The king then discharged thrice, and gave it over. Elisha told him if he had shot more arrows, he would have reduced the whole kingdom of Syria; but since he had been satisfied with shooting three times only, he must content himself with three several victories over them, wherein he should recover such parts of the country as they had taken from his father. Upon these words the king went his way, and the prophet departed this life soon after. He was a man eminent for his piety, and the integrity of his life; for which he was honoured with singular instances of the Divine favour and regard, as appears from the miracles he wrought, which stand upon record in the sacred history of the Hebrews to this day. He obtained a magnificent funeral, becoming the dignity of his character, as a prophet of the Lord.

Death and character of Elisha.

A dead man revives on touching the body of Elisha. 2 Kings 13.

Soon after the burial of this prophet, it happened that certain robbers cast a traveller, whom they had slain, into Elisha's tomb. As soon as the body of the dead man touched that of Elisha it revived (a). Thus have we recounted the acts of Elisha, who seems to have had a Divine power, not only during life, but even after his death.

Upon the death of Hazael, king of Syria, the kingdom devolved, by right hereditary, to his son Adad, who was overcome by Joash in three engagements; by which means all that country was recovered to the Israelites which his father Hazael had taken from them, according to the prophecy of Elisha. Upon the demise of Joash his son succeeded to the throne.

was Jehoadan, a native of the place. When he found himself fully established on the throne, he revenged the death of his father upon the heads of those who treacherously murdered him, under a pretence of friendship. But, though he brought the assassins to public justice, he spared their children, according to the precept of Moses, which expresses, "That children should not be punished for the iniquity of their fathers."

2 Kings 14. Amaziah revenges the murder of his father.

After this he selected an army out of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, composed of men in their prime; and when they were incorporated, appointed officers to command them. He also sent to the king of Israel, and hired a great number of auxiliaries, for an hundred talents of silver, determined upon a war with the Amalekites, the Edomites, and the Gabinites.

Resolves on an expedition against the Amalekites.

When this combined army was ready for marching against them, he received a visit from a prophet, who, by the Divine direction, dissuaded him from employing the Israelites, as they were become an abandoned generation, and would certainly be destroyed, together with those who joined them. The prophet added, that, with his own force, and the Divine aid, he might overcome the enemy. The king rather hesitated at compliance with the requisition of the prophet, as he had already deposited the money for payment of the auxiliaries; but on the prophet enjoining him to yield implicit obedience to the Divine will, he discharged the auxiliaries with this sarcastic remark, "That he had bestowed that treasure on them as a bounty, which they had received only as hire." On dismissing the mercenaries, he advanced with his own troops against the combined army of the enemy, when he overcame, and cut off, ten thousand of them in one battle, and carried away ten thousand more to the summit of a stupendous rock, where they were all destroyed by being thrown down the precipice. He then returned home with an immense booty.

But, in the mean time, the hired subjects of the king of Israel, thinking themselves shamefully and contemptuously dismissed, were greatly exasperated against Amaziah; and, to avenge so heinous a disgrace, they plundered all the towns in their way to Judah, killed no less than three thousand men, and carried away a considerable booty, in order to make amends for the plunder they had promised themselves in going against the Edomites.

The disbanded mercenaries lay waste part of Amaziah's dominions.

Amaziah, elated with this conquest over the Edomites, and claiming too much merit to himself, regardless of the interposing hand of Divine Providence, fell from the worship of the true God; for, on his return to Jerusalem, he brought with him the idols of the Amalekites, to which he paid adoration, and offered incense. This was so displeasing in the sight of heaven, that a prophet was sent to reprove him for his apostacy, and vain dependance on those powers which had suffered their votaries to be taken captive by the Hebrews, and carried, with the rest of the spoil, like abject slaves, to Jerusalem. The king interrupted the prophet in his discourse, reproached him with want of deference to his person and character, and enjoined him, at his peril, not to interfere with matters that did not concern him. The prophet told him he would desist; but assured him withal, that vengeance would be the certain consequence of his persevering in idolatry.

Amaziah lapses into idolatry.

The king, however, was so transported with pride and vanity upon his late success, that he determined to resent the indignity offered him by the subjects of the king of Israel, whom he had dismissed from assisting him against the Amalekites, and who had committed ravages in different parts of his dominions on their return home.

With this view, he wrote an imperious letter, commanding him and his people to pay the same allegiance to him which they had formerly rendered to his ancestors, David and Solomon, in default of which he might expect a decision of the cause by the point of the sword. Joash treated his haughty behaviour with disdain, and returned him an answer couched in a parable to this effect :

of

King Joash to king Amaziah greeting.

"It happened upon a certain time, that a thistle, which grew on Mount Libanus, sent to a cedar tree growing on the same spot, saying, give thy daughter in marriage to my son; whereupon a wild beast passing by, trod the thistle to the ground. Learn hence to lower your ambition, nor aspire to things above your reach. Be cautious, lest your pride, on having conquered the Amalekites, should lead you to such actions as may terminate in the loss of your life and kingdom."

This sarcastic reply enraged Amaziah to the highest degree, and rendered him more furious and implacable than before; as if Providence had given him up to the influence of his outrageous passion, in order to expose him to the stroke of Divine justice for his impiety. Thus inflamed, he took the field; and both armies were drawn up in order of battle; but no sooner were the troops of Amaziah advanced within sight of the enemy, than they were struck with such a panic and consternation, that they gave way on the first onset, and, consulting their own safety, fled with the utmost precipitation, leaving their king in the hands of his enemies. Amaziah being now at the mercy of Joash, the latter refused him quarter upon any other terms, than that the citizens of Jerusalem should set open their gates, and receive him and his victorious army into the town. Necessity forced compliance; so that Joash entered Jerusalem with his army in a most triumphant procession, through a breach of three hundred cubits of wall he had caused to be broken down, with his prisoner Amaziah marching before him. He proceeded first to the palace, and then to the temple, both of which he plundered of their richest valuables; and then dismissing Amaziah, returned to Samaria. This calamity befel Jerusalem in the fourteenth year of the reign of Amaziah.

In consequence of this fatal stroke of Divine justice, the leading men of Jerusalem entered into a conspiracy against Amaziah. Having received intimation of their design, he endeavoured to escape by flight to Lachish, a town situated on the frontiers of the country of the Philistines: but this attempt proved fruitless; for the conspirators sent ruffians after him, who put him to death. His body was carried to Jerusalem, and buried in royal state. Thus fell Amaziah, king of Judah, as a punishment due to his neglect of the worship of the true God, and introduction of abominable idolatry. He lived fifty-four years, reigned twenty-nine, and was succeeded on the throne by his son Uzziah.

CHAP. XI.

Transactions of Jonah, the prophet. Death of Jeroboam, and succession of his son Zachariah. Piety and conquests of Uzziah. His delinquency afterwards severely punished. Dies with grief, and is succeeded by his son Jotham. Divers successions to the throne of Israel. Excellent qualities of Jotham, king of Judah. Prediction of the destruction of Nineveh, and the Assyrian empire, by the prophet Nabum.

Jeroboam, the son of Joash, ascended the throne of Israel, and resided in the palace of his ancestors at Samaria. He was a prince most dissolute and licentious, abandoned to the most idolatrous and profligate practices, by which he brought down almost innumerable calamities upon the people of Israel.

It was foretold him by Jonah, the prophet, that he should overcome the Syrians, and enlarge his dominions as far as the city Hamath on the north, and the lake Asphaltites on the south, which were formerly the bounds of the land of Canaan, according to the allotment of Joshua, their general. Jeroboam, elated by this prediction, made an expedition against the Syrians, took from them all the above-mentioned track of land, and annexed it to his own territories.

As I promised, at my entrance upon this work, to give a faithful and impartial history of our nation, I deem it necessary, in this place, to recount the actions of this prophet, as I find them represented in the sacred records.

Jonah had received a Divine commission to go to Nineveh, and denounce the destruction of that great city, because of the many enormous crimes of its inhabitants: but Jonah, instead of obeying the Divine command, in order to avoid the danger to which such a denunciation might expose him, directed his course another way, and intending to retire to Tarshish, a town in Cilicia, embarked on board a vessel at Joppa. In the course of their passage there arose a violent tempest, which so alarmed the mariners, that, after labouring some time in opposition to the winds, they found themselves in the most imminent danger of being shipwrecked. It was observed that, during the time of their labour, and even that of their prayers, Jonah was the only man that did not exert himself upon so pressing an occasion, but lay in the hold totally inactive and useless. The master finding that the violence of the storm increased to such a degree as to frustrate all their endeavours, suspected that so unusual a tempest was occasioned by the extraordinary crimes of some person on board the vessel: it was, therefore, generally agreed amongst the crew and passengers, that they should cast lots, to know who was the man.

This was accordingly done, and the lot fell upon Jonah. In consequence of this the mariners enquired who he was, and what he had done, to bring on himself, and them, so great a calamity. Jonah frankly acknowledged that he was an Hebrew, and not only an Hebrew, but a prophet to the great God: but that as he, by disobeying the Divine command, had brought on the present calamity, he wished them to throw him overboard, as the only means of abating the storm, and saving themselves and the vessel.

The mariners being much surprized at the free and unconcerned confession of Jonah, by which he doomed himself to death, hesitated some time, and endeavoured, by rowing hard, and exerting their utmost might, to reach the land, in hopes of saving his life; but finding that all their efforts were in vain, that the waves still ran higher and higher, and that the vessel was on the very point of sinking, they were at length prevailed on, through the injunction of the prophet, and the imminent danger in which they stood, to throw him overboard.

No sooner was Jonah thrown into the sea than the tempest abated. It is related the Jonah was swallowed up by a large fish (a), and, after three days, and as many nights, cast up again, living and sound, upon the shore of the Euxine Sea. From thence, having implored and obtained pardon for his disobedience of the Divine command, he proceeded immediately to the city of Nineveh, according to his commission, and standing on an elevated place, where he might best be heard, foretold them, "That the empire of Asia was nearly at an end;" and having uttered this prophetic declaration, he took his departure. This is recounted concerning the prophet Jonah in the sacred writings: but we return to our main history.

Jeroboam, after a prosperous reign of forty years, departed this life, was buried in Samaria, and succeeded by his son Zachariah; as was Amaziah by his son Uzziah, who began to reign over the two tribes in Jerusalem in the fourteenth year of the Uzziah extends his conquests, and lays his vanquished foes under contribution.

His military force.

Uzziah was a prince pious, active, valiant, and courteous. He made an expedition against his enemies the Philistines, overthrew them in battle, took the cities of Gath and Jamina by assault, and demolished their walls. His next expedition was against the Arabians on the borders of Egypt. He built a town upon the Red Sea, and committed it to the guard of a strong garrison. He afterwards subdued the Ammonites, who were so alarmed at the rapidity and extent of his conquests, that they, as well as others, became his tributaries.

Having thus reduced his enemies to submission, he next directed his attention to Jerusalem, the capital of his dominions. He rebuilt the ruined walls, and repaired that breach which had been made by Joash, king of Israel, when he entered the city with his army in triumph, after making Amaziah his prisoner. He erected also several towers of 150 cubits in height; and built castles and strong forts for the protection of the country. He also constructed aqueducts, cisterns, and basins, for the convenience of his cattle, of which he had immense numbers, the lands about him being pasturage. As he was a great lover of husbandry, he employed prodigious numbers of ploughmen and planters on the plains, as also vine-dressers on the mountains, by which he obtained considerable possessions.

But the chief glory of his country lay in his military force, which consisted of 370,000 select men, under the command of 2000 brave and experienced officers, who had been trained up in the most perfect knowledge of martial discipline. They were all furnished with swords, bucklers, spears, bows, slings, and other implements of war, and rendered expert by constant practice in their respective exercises. He likewise constructed machines (a) and engines for battering, and casting of stones and darts, with hooks, and other offensive weapons.

But at length the mind of Uzziah was so elated with the success of his military operations, and the glory he had acquired by his attention to national concerns, that he grew, as it were, intoxicated with the idea of his power and greatness, and forgetting himself, neglected the more important duties of his worship to God, following herein the example of his father, who could not enjoy a course of prosperity with due moderation.

Uzziah becomes elated by prosperity.

Usurps the office of high-priest.

On a certain day, that was fixed for a solemn festival, the king, having assumed the sacerdotal habit, went into the holy temple to offer incense upon the golden altar. Intimation of this being given to Azariah, the high-priest, he, accompanied by a train of eighty priests, immediately repaired to the temple, and protested against such an assumption of the sacerdotal rights, which had ever been the peculiar privilege of the priests of the house of Aaron. Azariah enjoined him to desist from such prophane-ation, nor continue to incur the Divine displeasure by a conduct repugnant to the Divine will.

This remonstrance had not the least effect upon the king, who, instead of paying any attention to it, fell into a violent passion, treated the high-priest with the greatest indignity, and commanded him and his attendants to depart upon peril of their lives. This menace was followed by a terrible earthquake; and the roof of the temple opening with the shocks of it, there passed a beam of the sun through the cleft, that struck upon the face of this sacrilegious and impious prince, who, at that very moment, became a leper.

Is smitten with leprosy.

This awful judgement was accompanied with a tre-

(a) This is the first time we read of any machine either for besieging or defending towns, which is plainly the reason why sieges were of so long a continuance before these were invented. It is said of Uzziah, that, "He made, in Jerusalem, engines, invented by cunning men, to be on the towers, and upon the bulwarks, to shoot arrows and great stones;" so that it must certainly be a mistake to attribute the invention of the ballista, the scorpio, or the onager, to the Greeks or Romans, because we find them made use of in the east long before the Greeks had brought the military art to any great perfection. Uzziah was certainly the first inventor of them; and therefore it is said, that, for these and other warlike preparations, his name was spread abroad. From this time they began to be employed

There was a place, at a small distance to the westward from the town called Eroge, where, by the same earthquake, one half of the mountain was torn from the other, and after it had rolled over and over, stopped at the east side of an opposite mountain, having choaked up the high-way, and covered the king's gardens with rubbish.

A tremor, does ensue, quake.

When the priests found that the king was infected with leprosy, and that he had been smitten as a Divine judgement, they admonished him to depart the city; as an unclean person, and unfit for common society. The disgrace of being infected with so noxious a disease humbled his pride so far, that he took the admonition of the priests, and having lived some time in private out of the city, (Jotham, his son, taking upon him the administration of government), his grief at length brought him to the grave, in the sixty-eighth year of his age, and fifty-second of his reign. As he was a leper, his body was not interred in the royal sepulchre, but in the same field, in a monument by itself.

Death of Uzziah, and succession of his son Jotham.

Zachariah, (b), king of Israel, and son of Jeroboam, was murdered in the seventh month of his reign, by Shallum, the son of Jabesh, who usurped the throne. Shallum's government was much shorter than that of his predecessors, for he survived his usurpation but thirty days. At the time of his murdering Zachariah, Menahem had the command of an army at Tirzah, who, upon the news of what had befallen Zachariah, marched with his troops to Samaria, defeated and overthrew Shallum, and putting him to the sword, was, not only with the approbation of the army, but likewise the heads of the people, raised to the regal dignity.

Shallum is slain, and succeeded by Menahem.

Menahem, having thus secured possession of the government, returned with his army to Tirzah, in order to renew the siege he had before undertaken, and reduce the inhabitants to subjection. But the citizens shut the gates against him, and refused him admission; at which he was so enraged against them, as revolvers, that, after making himself master of the place, he put all to the sword without distinction either of age or sex; indeed, he exercised that merciless cruelty upon his own countrymen, which would have been unpardonable even towards the most savage barbarians. In short, his reign was one scene of murder, rapine, superstition, and idolatry.

His horrid barbarity.

When his affairs were in a most distracted situation, he was threatened with an invasion by Pul, king of Assyria; but not daring to stand the hazard of a battle, he came to a timely agreement with him, for the composition of a thousand silver talents, which he raised upon the people, at fifty shekels a head. He died soon after, and was buried at Samaria, leaving his son Pekahiah to succeed him, who inherited not only the crown, but the ill qualities of his father. The reign of Pekahiah, however, was but short; for, after he had been upon the throne about two years; Pekah, the general of his army, conspired against him, and having cut him off; with several of his friends about him, seized upon the government, which he held about twenty years, during which he was as notorious for his impiety towards God, as his tyranny and injustice towards men. In the course of his reign Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria, invaded the Israelites, and, after subduing the land of Gilead, the country beyond Jordan, and that part of Galilee that is adjacent, as also Cydida and Afra, took the inhabitants prisoners, and carried them away into his own country.

both in attacking and defending towns; and therefore we find the prophet Ezekiel, in describing the future sieges of Jerusalem and Tyre, makes mention of battering rams and engines of war, which, in all probability, were what latter ages called the ballista and catapultæ.

(b) Zachariah was the fourth king from Jehu, and the last of his race; in whom was fulfilled that gracious promise God was pleased to make to Jehu, as a reward for his courage and zeal in executing the judgement which God had commanded him to do in the house of Ahab, viz. that he and his family should sit on the throne of Israel unto the fourth generation, which was about 100 years, the last of the family being this king Zachariah, the son of Jeroboam II.

virtuous prince, exemplary for the veneration of the Deity, his justice to mankind, and his concern for the public weal. His care was to preserve decorum in all things, and rectify whatever was found to be amiss. He repaired the decayed porches and galleries of the temple, as well as the walls of the city, where they were falling to ruin, and built towers, large and almost impregnable. He also made an expedition against the Ammonites, whom he overcame, and laid under the contribution of an hundred talents annually, thirty thousand measures of wheat, and as many of barley. Indeed he so advanced the kingdom, that his people were happy at home, and a terror to their foreign enemies.

In the reign of this prince there appeared a prophet, whose name was Nahum. He foretold the destruction of Nineveh, and the destruction of the Assyrian empire, in words to the following purport: "The condition of Nineveh shall be like that of a fish in violent agitation of water before a great wind. The people shall fly away before the storm in trouble and confusion, saying to each other, 'Take with you your gold and silver; but none shall regard it, for their lives shall be dearer to them than their treasure. Factions and divisions shall prevail amongst them, and there shall be weeping, wailing, with trembling knees, and pallid countenances. Nineveh, (saith the Lord), I will strike thee from the face of the earth, and put an end to the outrages of the wild beasts that thou hast sent into the world!'"

This prophet foretold many other particulars, which it is not deemed necessary to repeat, as they may appear tedious to the reader; I shall therefore only add, that this prophecy was fulfilled an hundred and fifteen years after it was delivered.

CHAP. XII.

Upon the death of Jotham, Ahaz succeeds to the government. Rezin and Pekah make war upon him. Pekah overthrows Ahaz.

ON the demise of Jotham, who paid the debt of nature in the forty-first year of his age, and sixteenth of his reign, Ahaz, by right hereditary, succeeded to the throne. He was a very wicked prince, and, instead of following the maxims of his father, gave himself up to idolatry, in imitation of the kings of Israel. He built altars in Jerusalem, sacrificed to false gods upon them, and offered his own son as a burnt-offering, after the manner of the Canaanites.

While Ahaz was following these impious pursuits, Rezin, the king of Damascus, and Pekah, the king of Israel, having joined in a league, marched in conjunction up to Jerusalem, and pressing hard, lay before it a considerable time; but the place was so well fortified and defended, that they made but a slow progress, and afterwards found it expedient to raise the siege.

In the meantime the king of Syria possessed himself of Elath, near the Red Sea, put all the inhabitants to the sword, and introduced in their places a colony of Syrians. He afterwards took possession of several castles and strong holds, harassed the Hebrews very much and returned with an immense booty to Damascus.

When the king of Jerusalem had intelligence of the departure of the Syrians, and apprehended himself a match for the king of Israel, he advanced with his army against him; but having, by his crimes, incurred the Divine displeasure, the enemy gained the victory, and slew an hundred and twenty thousand of his men. In this action Zachariah, the general of the Israelites, killed Amia, the son of Ahaz, in a personal encounter. Seven principal officers fell upon the same occasion. Elkanah, the general of the troops of Judah, was taken prisoner; and the Israelites returned in triumph to Samaria, graced by a long procession of captives of both sexes, and laden with the richest spoils of the enemy.

There was at this time in Samaria a prophet, named Obed, who went out of the town to meet the army on their return, accompanied by a great number of the principal inhabitants. As soon as they approached, the prophet, in express terms, stated to the conquerors, that they were by no means to impute the late victory to their own virtue or valour, but consider it as a judgement from heaven upon king Ahaz. He told them they might rest satisfied with their conquest and spoils, without making slaves of their own kindred of the two tribes, and enjoined them to set them at liberty, and send them home, without offering any indignity to their persons, upon the peril of falling under the Divine wrath.

A council called.

Upon this remonstrance and admonition of the prophet, the Israelites called a council to deliberate on their future proceedings. The point in question being fully stated, one Berachiah, a man of rank in the assembly, arose, and put a negative against bringing any of the prisoners into the town, lest they should themselves thereby incur the vengeance of the Almighty. He represented, that their own transgressions had already occasioned the severest denunciations of the prophet, and that therefore it would be highly blameable in them to add to their number or enormity. The opinion of Berachiah was supported by other leading men in the assembly, so that the officers of the army, prevailed on by the force of the arguments alledged, gave the prisoners their freedom. They were also furnished with necessary provisions, and escorted as far as Jericho, on their return home, by a detached party, which afterwards returned to Samaria.

The prisoners are discharged.

CHAP. XIII.

Ahaz forms an alliance with the king of Assyria. Lays Syria waste, and puts the king to the sword. Death of Ahaz. Succession of Hezekiah, who restores the true religion, and vanquishes the Philistines.

THE situation of Ahaz was now so desperate, that, being unable to send a proper force to repel the incursions of his enemies, he dispatched an embassy to Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria, with magnificent presents, to solicit his alliance against the kings of Israel, and of Syria and Damascus.

The Assyrian monarch was so captivated with the bribe, that he readily engaged in the interest of Ahaz, and marching with a powerful army against Rezin, king of Syria, slew him in battle, besieged and took Damascus, and laid waste the whole country. He transplanted the inhabitants of Damascus to the Upper Media, and sent colonies from his own country to people Damascus. He then depopulated a great part of the land of the Israelites, and carried away a great number of prisoners.

An alliance between Ahaz and the king of Assyria.

After the reduction of Syria by means of the alliance with Tiglath-Pileser, king of Assyria, Ahaz, to gratify him for his services, took all the gold and silver out of the royal treasury and the temple, with other invaluable articles, and carried them with him to Damascus, where he delivered them up to his ally, with acknowledgment of his valiant conduct, and then returned to Jerusalem.

Ahaz rewards the service of Tiglath-Pileser.

Such was the pusillanimity and absurdity of the king of Judah, that notwithstanding the mortal enmity which subsisted between his subjects and those of Syria, he abjectly condescended to worship their gods, and join in their idolatrous ceremonies; vainly persuading himself that they would be propitious to his arms, because he had manifested an unhallowed zeal for a false religion. When it appeared to him necessary, he would pay homage to the gods of the Assyrians; nay, he seemed to prefer every kind of idolatry to the adoration of the true God, and the laws and religion of his ancestors. He contemned the honour and service of the Almighty to such a degree, that, having rifled the temple of all its vessels and ornaments, he commanded the very doors to be shut, in open defiance of all that was sacred; and, in a word, suppressed the Divine worship throughout his dominions.

While Ahaz was thus carrying on his horrid impieties, the Almighty was pleased to stop his career, by suddenly cutting him off in the very prime of his life, being only thirty-six years of age, and in the sixteenth of his reign. His son Hezekiah succeeded him on the throne of Judah.

Death of Ahaz.

About this time Pekah, king of Israel, lost both his government and his life, through the treachery of a court confidant named Hosea, who enjoyed the fruits of an impious usurpation for the space of nine years. He was a character profligate and abandoned.

done to the highest degree, a contemner of God, and an enemy to justice. At length Salmanezer, king of Assyria, led an army against him; and that Almighty aid which he had rejected and despised, being justly withheld, he was easily overcome, and forced to submit to the terms imposed by the conqueror, who laid him under contribution.

In the fourth year of the reign of Hosea, Hezekiah ascended the throne of Judah. He was a prince of distinguished abilities, and revered for his strict adherence to piety and justice. No sooner had he got possession of the kingdom, than he began with a laudable zeal to set about an entire reformation in matters of religion. To this end he summoned an assembly of the priests and Levites, whom he addressed as follows:

"It is unnecessary for me to remind you of the misfortunes consequent on my father's sins, in your refusing the worship due to God, and uniting with him in the adoration of idols. But as experience has now taught you how dreadful a thing it is to trifle with heaven, I recommend that all past failings may be buried in oblivion, that you cleanse yourselves from former pollutions, and that you purify the temple by sacrifices and consecrations; in doing of which alone, you may hope for future prosperity, as well as pardon for the sins you have committed."

The priests were so affected by the king's speech on this important occasion, that they instantly followed the instructions it contained, by opening the temple, cleansing it from all impurities, preparing the vessels, and laying their sacrifices on the altar, according to the form and manner prescribed by the Mosaic institution.

Hezekiah then sent messengers throughout all his dominions, to summon the people up to Jerusalem, to celebrate the feast of unleavened bread, which had been long intermitted through the impious neglect of former kings. He also exhorted and invited the Israelites to relinquish their idolatrous superstitions, and return to the true religion, and the worship of the true God, promising them, upon those conditions, liberty to pass and repass, and celebrate the festival in common with his own people. He observed, that he was not actuated by a principle of self interest in giving them this invitation, but a desire to promote their real prosperity, as they would most certainly find, if they would be guided by his counsel.

But the Israelites treated the invitation with scorn, and held the messengers in derision: nay, they insulted the prophets for their good offices in admonishing them to return to their duty, and foretelling the calamities that would befall them without a timely humiliation and repentance. They not only neglected this salutary counsel, but gratified their bigotry and resentment at the expence of the lives of some of the prophets. They proceeded, indeed, from one enormity to another, till the Almighty, in his vindictive wrath, avenged himself on them for their impieties, by delivering them up to the oppression and tyranny of their enemies, as will appear from the sequel of their history. Many, however, of the tribes of Menasseh, Zebulun, and Issachar, were duly impressed with the promission of the prophets, and cordially resorted to Jerusalem, at the invitation of Hezekiah, to worship the true God according to the form of his own appointment.

As soon as Hezekiah was informed that the necessary preparations were made in the temple for the worshipping of God, he repaired thither early the next morning, attended by the princes, and a great concourse of the people, and sacrificed for himself, seven bulls, seven rams, and as many goats. Having laid his hands on the victims, the priests performed the duties of their function, while the Levites standing around, chanted Divine hymns, and accompanied the vocal with instrumental music, as David had composed and set them of old.

When this ceremony was over, the king and the people cast themselves prostrate, and paid adoration to the One Supreme. He afterwards sacrificed seventy bullocks, an hundred rams, and two hundred lambs; besides six hundred bullocks and three thousand other cattle, which he bestowed as a bounty for the entertainment of the people. When the solemnities were duly observed, and the ceremonies regularly passed, according to precise form and order, the king joined in the general festivity, and universal joy prevailed throughout Jerusalem.

The feast of unleavened bread was now approaching, and during the time of the preparation, they offered up a course of other sacrifices for seven days successively. The king again bestowed upon the people as a bounty, two thousand bulls, and seven thousand other cattle. The princes likewise following the example of his liberality, added a thousand bulls, and one thousand four hundred other beasts, inasmuch that it might be deemed one of the greatest festivals that had been solemnized from the days of king Solomon.

After the celebration of this festival, the king's next care was to purge the whole country, having first purified Jerusalem itself from the abominations of idolatry. He then appointed daily sacrifices, according to the law, to be supplied out of his own stores, and enjoined the people to present the priests and Levites with the tenths and first fruits, that the ordinary concerns of life might not divert them from a due attendance on the offices of their sacred function. He also caused granaries and store-houses to be built, for the common use and service of themselves, wives, and children, to be distributed in proportion to their shares; so that, by these means, the ancient discipline was restored.

Hezekiah having thus effected an entire reformation in matters of religion, and established the worship of the true God throughout his dominions, directed his attention to politics, by endeavouring to recover those places which had been taken by the Philistines during the reign of his father. To this end he made war upon them, and over-ran their country from Gath to Gaza, which he annexed to his own territories. In the mean time the king of Assyria sent a message to Hezekiah, to demand the tribute which his father Ahaz had agreed to pay annually to the kings of Assyria, with a menace, in case of refusal, to lay waste his country. But Hezekiah, relying on the Divine protection, conscious of his own integrity, and confident of the fulfilment of the prediction of the prophet Isaiah, was by no means intimidated by the menaces of the Assyrian. This shall suffice for the present concerning the transactions of king Hezekiah.

CHAP XIV.

Salmanezer takes Samaria. Lays waste the kingdom of Israel. Transplants the ten tribes, and forms a colony of Chuthites in their country.

WHEN intelligence was given to Salmanezer, king of Assyria, that the king of Israel had entered into a secret treaty of alliance with So, the king of Egypt, he was greatly exasperated, and advanced with his army against Samaria. This city was besieged by him in the seventh year of the reign of Hosea: it sustained an attack till the third year, when it was taken by assault, in the ninth year of the present king, and seventh of the reign of Hezekiah, king of Jerusalem.

The loss of Samaria was attended with the total destruction of the kingdom of Israel; for the people were all transplanted into Media and Persia, and their king, Hosea, was carried off with them. The king of Assyria brought others from thence in exchange, as far as Chuthah, a river of Persia, to plant in Samaria, and up and down the country of the Israelites.

This was the miserable end of the Israelites, who impiously, as well as obstinately, persisted in their transgressions of the Divine command; nor would they attend to the voice and admonition of the prophets, though they were told by them, that inevitable destruction would be the consequence of their continuance in disobedience of the Divine commands. These calamities took their origin from the seditious revolt of the Israelites from Rehoboam, and advancing to the regal dignity Jeroboam, who, in contempt of the laws and religion of their forefathers, drew the indignation of heaven upon them, by leading them into the practice of the most execrable abominations: but that monster of iniquity did not escape unpunished.

The king of Assyria extended his ravages, and carried all before him, throughout Syria and Phœnicia. His name is recorded in the history of the Tyrians; for, in the reign of Elulæus, (as Menander has it in his Annals, that were translated from the Tyrian into the Greek language), he made war upon Tyre (a). Menander writes to this purport: "This king Elulæus reigned thirty-six years; and, upon a revolt of the Gittæans, sent a fleet thither, which reduced them to obedience. The king of Assyria also sent an army against them, and invaded the whole country of Phœnicia. A short time after this expedition the cities of (b) Sidon, Arce, with many others, revolted from the Tyrian to the Assyrian monarch. When the Tyrians would not submit, the latter renewed the attack upon them with a fleet of sixty sail, and eight hundred rowers, under the conduct of the Phœnicians. This fleet the Tyrians encountered with only twelve vessels, dispersed the enemies ships, and took five hundred prisoners. The naval reputation of the Tyrians was enhanced by this exploit. But the king of Assyria returned, and placed guards at the river and aqueducts, to prevent the Tyrians from drawing water. The Tyrians laboured under this inconvenience, and were obliged to dig pits to procure a supply for their relief."

(a) Tyre, or Tyrus, it was anciently called, was situated upon a rock, which its name implies. It is supposed to have been first built by a colony of Sidonians, from whence the prophet Isaiah calls it "The daughter of Zidon;" Isaiah xxiii. 12. It was a place of such great trade and wealth, that, according to the same prophet, "Her merchants were princes, and her traffickers the honourable of the earth." Tyre had two good havens, one towards Sidon, and the other towards Egypt, and was divided into three cities, viz. Palæ-Tyre, that is, Tyre on the Continent, or Old Tyre; Tyre on the Island; and Tyre on the Peninsula. The houses in the city were lofty, and the buildings in general magnificent, particularly the superb temple erected by its king Hiram, and dedicated to Jupiter, Hercules, and Astarte, the walls of which were 150 feet high, proportionably broad, firmly built of huge blocks of stone, and cemented together with a strong white mortar.

Tyre was taken and destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, and after him by Alexander the Great. The latter, however, rebuilt it; and in time it recovered its beauty and opulence, and was invested with the privileges of a Roman city. After undergoing various revolutions in succeeding times, it was finally reduced by the Turks, in whose hands it has continued ever since. Its present inhabitants are only a few poor wretches, who dwell in caverns, and subsist by fishing: such is the completion of Ezekiel's prophecies concerning it, of which we shall transcribe the words: "Thus saith the Lord God, Behold, I am against thee, O Tyre, and will cause many nations to come up against thee, as the sea causeth his waves to come up, and they shall destroy the walls of Tyrus, and break down her towers. I will also

The Chuthites, who removed into Samaria from the country of Persia, called Chutah, composed five nations, each of whom brought their respective country gods along with them. These idolaters so incensed the Almighty, that they were visited with a dreadful plague, insomuch that the greater part of them were swept from the face of the earth; and finding no relief from any human means, they were directed by the oracle to have recourse to the worship of the One Supreme God, as the only means of averting their calamity. Upon this they sent messengers to the king of Assyria, requesting him to send some of the priests who were carried away captive with the Israelites. This being granted, and the priests arrived, they had the law of Moses read, with an explanation of the same, so far as it related to the theory and practice of religion, insomuch that, through their attention, the pestilence ceased.

The people of that country still retain the name of Chuthites among the Hebrews; but by the Greeks they are called Samaritans. They are fickle in their notions, and in their conducts time-serving. When the Hebrews are in prosperity, they claim kindred; when in adversity, they disclaim all connections. But this will appear hereafter with greater propriety in another place.

Ezek. chap. xxxi. 3, 4, 5. It is worthy of remark, that the Tyrians were particularly celebrated for dying purple, which was first found out by them from an accident, viz. a dog's lips being finely tinged by eating of the fish called conchilis. This fish is a buccinum, a name given by the ancients to all fishes whose shells bear any resemblance to an hunting horn; and it appears from Pliny that the famed Tyrian purple was obtained from it. The dye was so much valued in the time of the Roman emperors, on account of its being the imperial colour, that one pound of it cost above a thousand Roman denarii, or above thirty pounds sterling.

(b) Sidon, or Zidon, was founded by Sidon, the eldest son of Canaan. Joshua calls it, by way of eminence, the Great Sidon. Josh. xi. 8. From whence it has been asserted by some, that in his time there were two Sidons, namely, a Greater and Lesser; but no geographer has made mention of any other Sidon distinguished from Sidon the Great. Joshua assigned Sidon to the tribe of Asher, but this tribe could never get possession of it. It is situated upon the Mediterranean, in a fertile country, and has a fine harbour. It has always been famous for its great trade and navigation. There are extant some remains of Sidon, whereon are seen ancient Phœnician characters, the same as the Hebrew characters, and which were used by the Jews before the captivity of Babylon. The principal deities of the Sidonians were Baal and Astarte, or the sun and moon. They likewise worshipped Hercules.

IN the fourteenth year of the reign of Hezekiah, king of Judah, Sennacherib, the king of Assyria, made an expedition against him, with a numerous and well disciplined army, and having taken several of the fenced cities of Judah by assault, was now advancing towards Jerusalem. Hezekiah, deeming it most expedient to compound the matter, sent an embassy to the king of Assyria, with an offer of submission, and paying him tribute. When Sennacherib heard the proposals of the ambassadors, he determined to decline hostilities, solemnly engaging, upon condition of receiving three hundred talents of silver, and thirty of gold, to withdraw his army, and give up his design of investing Jerusalem. Hezekiah complied with his terms, and, to fulfil the agreement, was under the necessity of exhausting all the treasure, both of the palace and temple, to raise the stipulated sum, and present it to Sennacherib. The base and perfidious Assyrian having received the money, receded from his agreement; for, instead of declining the siege, and withdrawing his army, he left Rabshaketh, his lieutenant-general, with Flarata and Anacharis, two other principal officers, to carry on the siege of Jerusalem, while he marched himself with ■ considerable detachment against the Egyptians and Ethiopians.

On drawing up their army, they pitched their camp within sight of the walls of Jerusalem, and Rabshaketh dispatched a messenger to demand a parley with Hezekiah. The king, thinking it unsafe to go in person, sent out three of his particular friends, Eliakim, his deputy governor, together with Shebna and Joash, the keepers of the records.

As soon as they came to the Assyrian camp, and delivered their commission to the officers, Rabshaketh addressed them in haughty and peremptory terms to this effect:

“The mighty potentate, Sennacherib, demands to know, upon what principle or prescriptions the king of Judah disputes of admitting the army into the city, or acknowledging his supremacy. Does he rely on the aid of the Egyptians? Vain and delusive hope. He trusts to ■ broken reed, that will not only deceive, but wound him severely. Go, tell your master this expedition is undertaken against him by the Divine will and direction, and that, therefore, the king of Assyria will as certainly obtain victory over Hezekiah and his subjects, ■ he hath done over the Israelites.”

Rabshaketh his insolent address to the deputies of Hezekiah

Rabshaketh addressed himself to Hezekiah's ambassadors in Hebrew, a language in which he was versed. Eliakim, apprehending that what he had said, being generally understood, might have an unfavourable effect on the multitude, requested him, if he had anything further to say, to speak it in Syriac. But Rabshaketh being apprized of Eliakim's motive for desiring ■ change of language exalted his voice, and continued his harangue in Hebrew, to this effect:

“It is necessary that your people should well understand the commands of the king, my master, as it commands them to submit before it is too late. I am aware, that it is your purpose to amuse the people with vain hopes of defending themselves by force. But if you have courage to attempt an enterprize, or entertain a thought of repelling the assailants, I will supply you with 2000 horses, if you will undertake to find them riders. But alas! you cannot make the experiment. Thus reduced, why will you longer deliberate? Your compliance will ensure your safety, while a farther opposition will involve you in most imminent danger; for necessity will at length compel the weak to yield to the strong.”

When Hezekiah's messengers acquainted him with the purport of Rabshaketh's harangue, he immediately divested himself of his royal attire, put on sackcloth, after the custom of the country, in token of of humiliation, and prostrating himself on the ground, fervently implored the Divine aid and protection, as the only means whereby he could overcome a powerful and haughty foe. Having done this, he dispatched some trusty friends, accompanied by a number of priests, to the prophet Isaiah, entreating him to exert his utmost endeavours by prayer, to intercede with the Almighty in his behalf, that thereby he might be able to humble the pride and power of his enemies. The prophet complied with the king's request, and succeeded so far in his intercession, that he was authorized to bid the king and his friends take courage, as Sennacherib should be overcome without a battle, and abandon his design with loss and disgrace, his pride be humbled, and the Divine vengeance pursue him to his ruin. He added, that Sennacherib should miscarry in his Egyptian expedition, and returning home disappointed, should fall by the sword in his own land.

At this very time Hezekiah received letters from the king of Assyria, expostulating with him on the folly and presumption of maintaining an opposition to a prince who had vanquished so many warlike nations, and concluding with a menace, to spare neither age, nor sex, but put all to the sword without distinction, unless, without delay, they let open the gates of the city, and cleared a free passage for his army. Hezekiah relying on the Divine veracity and power, was not affected by this imperious epistle; but folding it up, laid it in the temple, and again had recourse to ardent supplication for the safety of the city, till Isaiah returned with this encouraging answer, that, "His petition was heard, and that he need not apprehend any harm from the Assyrians upon that undertaking; that there were happier times at hand, in which they should enjoy their possessions in full security from the invasion of their enemies."

Soon after this the king of Assyria, finding all his attempts against the Egyptians frustrated, withdrew his army, and returned home upon this occasion. He spent a long time in the siege of Pelusium; and at length, when he had brought his platform within a little of the top of the walls, and was upon the very point of making the assault, he received intelligence that Tirhaka, king of the Ethiopians, was advancing with a powerful reinforcement to the Egyptians, and that he took his way through the desert, with a design to fall upon the Syrians by surprise. Sennacherib was so alarmed at this report, that he immediately withdrew his army.

Herodotus, in the second book of his history, calls this war of Sennacherib, a war against the priest of Vulcan, as the Egyptian king was also a priest of that false god, and assigns this cause for the raising of Pelusium. "The king of Egypt, upon this occasion, called upon his god for aid, which being granted, was fatal to the Arabian." But here Herodotus was mistaken; as he should have written "Assyrian" instead of "Arabian." The same historian adds, that "There came in one night such multitudes of rats into the camp of the Assyrians, that they gnawed all their bowstrings to pieces, and rendered useless several other pieces of their arms, even to the disarming of the Assyrians, who, upon this disappointment, drew off from the town."

Berosus, a Chaldee historian, speaks of this Sennacherib, and writes, that he reigned over the Assyrians, and made war upon all Asia and Egypt. His words are to the purport of the following chapter.

CHAPTER II.

Judicial pestilence in the army of Sennacherib. He raises the siege, and returns home, where he is murdered by his two sons.

WHEN Sennacherib returned from the Egyptian war to Jerusalem, he found the army he had left under the command of Rabshaketh, his general, almost destroyed by a pestilential distemper, which, on the very first night of the siege, swept away, in general, officers and soldiers, one hundred and eighty-five thousand men. This tremendous mortality so alarmed Sennacherib, that, partly through apprehension of Divine vengeance, and partly through fear of the loss of the rest of his army, he fled with precipitation to his palace at "Nineveh, where he was treacherously assassinated, and died by the hands of his elder sons, Adrammelech and Sharezer, in his own temple, called, after his darling idol, Nisroch. The parricides fled into Armenia; and Esarhaddon, the third son, succeeded to the government. This proved the conclusion of the Assyrian expedition against the people of Jerusalem."

CHAPTER III.

Hezekiah, on the supposed approach of death, has the promise of fifteen years being added to his life. Forms a league with the king of Babylon. Isaiah foretells the captivity of the Israelites in Babylon, and the calamities of Hezekiah and his descendants. Death of Hezekiah.

HEZEKIAH being thus providentially delivered from all apprehension of danger from the Assyrians, betook himself, with his whole people, to thanksgivings for the late mercies received, duly impressed with the interposition of heaven, by which their preservation was wrought, as well through the pestilence, as the alarm it occasioned his enemy. While he was thus piously disposed he fell into a severe distemper, inasmuch that his physicians despaired of his life. In this condition, nothing affected the king so sensibly as the reflection that, on his dying without issue, the succession of the family would cease, and the kingdom be left without a legitimate heir. Thus anxious concerning a most important point, he addressed himself to the Almighty, with prayers and tears, to vouchsafe to prolong his life, that he might have a successor from his own stock, and not be taken from among the number of the living, till he became the father of a son to transmit his memory to posterity.

The Almighty was pleased to compassionate his case, and the rather, it seems, because he was not so much troubled for the loss of his kingdom, as the want of an heir to succeed him in the government of it. Upon this the prophet Isaiah was sent to him with the comfortable assurance that, in three days, his disease should leave him, that he should survive it fifteen years, and the kingdom at length descend to his son and heir. When the prophet had thus executed his Divine commission, Hezekiah, surprized at this sudden reverse of his doom, and, from the desperate state of his distemper, fearful of its not taking place, indicated a desire of some token from Isaiah, to make him sensible of his authority; as there is, indeed, a propensity in mankind, when they labour under difficulties beyond either hope or reason, to have the cause and end of them confirmed by some extraordinary evidence.

When the prophet asked him what sign or token he required as a due satisfaction, he requested that the shadow upon his dial might go ten degrees backward from the place where it then stood. The king finding this miracle wrought from the prayers of the prophet, was restored presently to his health, and went up immediately to the temple, to render his most unfeigned thanksgivings to the Father of all Mercies.

It was at this time that the Assyrian empire was dissolved by the Medes, an event of which we shall speak hereafter. But Balad, the king of Babylon, sent ambassadors with presents to Hezekiah, inviting him to a league of amity and alliance. Hezekiah received them with great courtesy, entertained them with royal magnificence, shewed them the curiosities of his palace, and sent them back with sumptuous presents to the king their master.

Upon this the prophet came to him, and enquired who those men were, and whence they came? He replied they were sent from the king of Babylon, and that he had shewn them all the richest curiosities of his palace, that they might gather from thence a knowledge of his dignity, and thereby induce their master to pay him all due deference. The prophet rejoined, "Know that a day will shortly come when these boasted treasures shall all be carried away to Babylon, and that your sons, after becoming captives, shall be attendant eunuchs in the royal palace of that city. This I foretell you from Divine authority." This awful prediction penetrated Berosus makes mention of this Balad, king of Babylon. But the prophet Isaiah, who spoke by Divine, and of course infallible, inspiration, was so convinced of the truth of the prophecies, that he committed them to writing, and left them to the judgment and evidence of posterity. There were twelve more that did the same; and it appeared, from events; that, in all cases, good or ill, the accomplishment exactly corresponded with the prophecy.

When Hezekiah had survived in peace the interval already mentioned, he paid the debt of nature, in the fifty-fifth year of his life, and twenty-ninth year of his reign.

CHAP. IV.

Succession of Manasseh, an impious prince, but afterwards reclaimed through means of the Babylonish captivity. Is succeeded by his son Amon, from whom the crown devolves to Josiah.

WHEN Manasseh, the son of Hezekiah, by Hephzibah, a native of Jerusalem, ascended the throne of his father, he deviated from his conduct in every instance, both of religion and government. Influenced by the example of those around him, and open to the flattery of sycophants, who were averse to the reformation effected by Hezekiah, he rushed into the commission of the most daring impieties, and all those idolatrous abominations, for which the severest judgments had been denounced and inflicted on the Israelites upon several occasions. He was so daring as to profane the holy temple itself: nay, his example, as it were, infected not only the city in which he resided, but spread a contagion throughout his dominions.

Manasseh a profligate and abandoned prince

His contempt of God, and cruelty to good men.

He began his reign with a contempt of the Divine Being, and the persecution of good and holy men, who would not conform to his abominations. Nay, he embued his hands in the very blood of the prophets (a), inasmuch that a day scarcely passed in which some or other of them were not put to death, so that the streets of Jerusalem were crimsoned with their gore. These horrid enormities called so loud to heaven for vengeance, that prophet was sent after prophet, both to the king and people, with admonitions to them to repent in time of their neglect of the Divine worship, and to return to their duty, upon the peril of suffering the like calamities for the same transgressions, for which their brethren, the Israelites, had suffered before.

But they turned a deaf ear to the reasonable warning and advice of the prophets; till at length they found their menaces attended with those dreadful effects, which, by a timely attention, and due reformation, might have been prevented.

Upon their persisting in their impious and iniquitous courses, the Almighty was pleased to punish them most severely, by the means of the king of Babylon and Chaldea; who made war upon them, sent an army into Judea that overcome and destroyed the whole country, surprized Manasseh, and carried him away as a prisoner at his mercy.

Manasseh overcome, and carried captive into Babylon.

Upon repentance restored to his kingdom

This distressed and degraded situation brought Manasseh to reflection, and rendered him so sensible of his atrocious crimes, that he earnestly besought the Almighty so far to soften the hearts of his enemies, that they might treat him with some degree of lenity and humanity. The Almighty was pleased in mercy to hear his prayer, so that he was released by the king of Babylon, and reinstated in the government of Judea.

Upon his arrival at Jerusalem, through the clemency of the conqueror, he exerted his utmost abilities to make every possible atonement for his former crimes. His late conduct was totally reversed, and he seemed wholly intent on the advancement of religion and virtue. He purified the city, and consecrated the temple afresh, and made it the business of his life to manifest a due reverence and gratitude towards his Divine Protector. Conscious that his former mal-administration had, in a great measure, been the cause of the miseries which his people had endured, he endeavoured to effect a reformation amongst them, both by his example and authority. He caused an altar to be erected, agreeable to the directions of Moses, and offered upon it daily oblations.

Manasseh effects a total reformation in religion and manners.

When he had restored religion to its original state and purity, he attended to the fortifying of Jerusalem, made the necessary reparations in the old walls, and, as a farther security, encompassed them with new ones. He erected several strong and lofty towers, and provided the out works with stores and ammunition. In a word, his general conduct was so reformed, that, from the instant of his return to his duty to God and his subjects, he was regarded as one of the happiest of princes. He died after holding the government fifty-five years, and in the sixty-seventh year of his age, and was buried in his own garden. The crown devolved to his son Amon, whom he had by Emalsena, of the city of Jabat.

This prince, following the pernicious example of his father's early life, and indulging himself in the same licentious courses, was soon arrested by the hand of Justice; a conspiracy being formed against him by his own domestics, who cut him off in the twenty-fourth year of his age, and the second of his reign. The people, however, took care to avenge his murder, by putting to death all those who were any ways concerned in it. His remains were deposited in the monument of his father, and he was succeeded on the throne by his son Josiah, a youth who had attained to his eighth year.

CHAP. IV.

Instances of Josiah's zeal for the establishment of the true religion, and extirpation of idolatry.

THE mother of Josiah was a native of Bosath, and her name was Jedidah. He was a prince eminently possessed of the most amiable and virtuous disposition, and seemed inclined to follow the example of David, throughout the whole course of his conduct, in the promotion of the religion and laws of his country. Before he had completed his twelfth year, he gave an instance of his piety, by suppressing the worship of idols, and restoring the people to the religion of the true God. Such of the ordinances of his predecessors as he found productive of ill consequences he abolished; such institutions as were expedient he retained; and to those which required alterations he made amendments, which would have conferred honour on the most consummate wisdom, and the experience of advanced years.

Josiah's zeal for the establishment of true religion. 2 Chron. 34

Having made this reform in the city of Jerusalem and its environs, he next made a progress throughout his dominions, firmly resolved to purge religion from all those corruptions which had been introduced in the preceding reigns. He caused all the groves and altars, together with the carved and molten images which his apostate predecessors had set up, to be destroyed. By these means the people were drawn from the vanity of their superstitions, to a reverence for the exercise of the worship of the only true God, and for the use and custom of burnt-offerings and other sacrifices upon the altar.

He also appointed certain magistrates and commissioners for the regulation of manners, and deciding matters of a private concern, in order to preserve good government, and an impartial administration of justice.

attention to his remonstrances, he caused him to be apprehended, and, to make his torture both more lingering and exquisite, had him sawn asunder with a wooden saw; and in this it is probable the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews refers, when he says, they were sawed asunder. Heb. xi. 37.

His attention was next directed to the reparation of the temple, for which purpose he deputed commissioners throughout his dominions, to receive contributions of gold and silver, from those who were willing to promote the design; but leaving all his subjects at full liberty, that they might have no cause of complaint. The contributions being brought in, and deposited in the treasury, Amaziah, the governor of the city, Shaphan, the secretary, Joah, the recorder, and Hilkiah, the high-priest, were appointed to engage workmen, provide materials, and regulate the expences of the intended repairs. This gave rise to the rebuilding of the temple, and the erecting of a lasting monument to the posterity of the king's piety and bounty.

Josiah, in the eighteenth year of his reign, directed Hilkiah, the high-priest, to apply what gold and silver there remained after the charge of the necessary repairs of the temple was defrayed, in the formation of cups, chalices, goblets, and other vessels and utensils, for the performance of sacred services. He likewise ordered that all the gold and silver remaining in the treasury should be brought out, and applied to the same purpose.

The repairs of the temple being compleated, and all expences defrayed, Hilkiah, in conformity to the king's orders, took out the money for the purpose of converting it into vessels for the use of the temple; and, upon removing the gold, happened to discover the sacred book of Moses (a). This he took out, and gave to Shaphan, the king's secretary, to peruse, who, upon reading them over, went to the king, accompanied by Hilkiah, who told him, that he had executed all his commands relative to the reparation of the temple, and at the same time presented the book to him in great form, assuring him what it was, and where they had found it.

The king ordered Shaphan to read a part of the contents, which being done, he rent his robes, in dread of the heavy curses denounced against a wicked generation. In the height of his affliction he desired the secretary, with Hilkiah, and several priests who were present, to go to the prophetess Huldah, the wife of Shallum, a man of eminence, and unite their endeavours to prevail upon her to make intercession with God for pardon towards himself and his subjects. He told them there was great reason to apprehend that the vengeance of heaven would fall upon the present generation as a punishment for the iniquity of their progenitors, and particularly their neglect and contempt of the laws of Moses; and that, without obtaining a reconciliation, they should be dispersed over the face of the earth, and terminate their lives in misery.

Hilkiah, with those who were appointed to accompany him, immediately repaired to the prophetess, and having related the cause of the king's affliction, and his earnest desire of her intercession with heaven in behalf of him and his subjects, she bade them return him this answer; "That the sentence already pronounced was not to be recalled on any supplication or intercession whatever. That the people were to be banished from their own country, and punished, for their disobedience, with the loss of all human comforts. That the judgment was irrevocable, for their obstinately persisting in their superstitious and idolatrous practices, notwithstanding many warnings to a timely repentance, and the menacing predictions of the prophets, if they persevered in their abominations."

This unchangable decree was to shew, by the event, that there is a just and over-ruling Disposer of all Things, and the predictions which he delivered by the means of the prophets, will be infallibly verified, as the certain indications of his whole will respecting mankind. The prophets added, "Tell the king, however, that, in consideration of his own pious and virtuous example, the judgment shall be averted from the people during his days; but that the day of his death shall be the eve of their final destruction."

As soon as Josiah received this message from the prophets, he immediately dispatched messengers to the several cities within his dominions, commanding all the priests and Levites, and men of all ages and conditions, to repair with the utmost speed to Jerusalem. These orders being obeyed, and the people assembled, the king went to the temple; where, in the hearing of the whole multitude, he caused the laws of God, contained in the books of Moses, to be distinctly read, after which he bound himself and the people, with their universal consent, by a most solemn oath, strictly to observe every article contained in the sacred books, respecting the laws and religion established by Moses. This solemn oath was followed by prayers and oblations for the Divine blessing and protection.

The king strictly enjoined the high-priest to take a particular account of the plate and vessels in the temple, and to cast out so many of them as they should find to have been dedicated by any of his ancestors to idolatrous services. Those that were found were reduced to dust, and in that state thrown into the air. All the priests were likewise put to death that were not of the stock Aaron.

Having effected this reformation in Jerusalem, Josiah made a progress throughout his whole dominions, where he destroyed all the relics of Jeroboam's superstition and idolatry; and burnt the bones of false prophets upon the very altar which that impious king had set up. Of this we have taken notice before, as well as the intervention of the prophet with prediction in the hearing of the multitude, at the time when Jeroboam was offering sacrifice, "That one of the race of David, Josiah by name, was to do this." The prediction was verified, by the event, three hundred and sixty-one years after it was foretold.

So ardent was the zeal of Josiah for extending the great work of reformation, that he went in person to several of the Israelites, who had escaped the Assyrian bondage, in order to dissuade them from continuing in superstition, and prevail with them to embrace the pure religion of their forefathers, according to the long established custom of their country. Nor did he rest here, but caused the towns and villages to be searched for the discovery of any remains of idolatrous practices that might be concealed. The very figures of the horses over the porch of the temple, which their forefathers had dedicated to the sun, and all the monuments to which the people had ascribed Divine honour, were, by his special order, taken away and destroyed.

Having thus purged the whole nation from idolatry, and fully restored the true worship of the one only and true God, he called an assembly of the people at Jerusalem for the purpose of celebrating the passover, the time for that festival being near at hand. On this occasion the king gave out of his own store, for paschal sacrifices, thirty goats, a thousand lambs, and three thousand oxen. The heads of the priests presented to the others of the sacerdotal order two thousand six hundred lambs, and the chiefs of the Levites gave to their tribes five thousand lambs, and five hundred oxen. A solemn sacrifice was made of these victims according to the precepts of Moses, and the ceremony was performed under the direction of the priests. From the time of the prophet Samuel to that day there had never been a festival celebrated with equal solemnity, for this had the allowed preference, because the whole was conducted in strict conformity to the very letter of the laws, and the precise mode of their forefathers. (a) Whether it was the whole Pentateuch, or the Book of Deuteronomy only, which the high-priest found in the temple, is uncertain; but it is generally agreed, that the part, which Shaphan read to the king, was taken out of the Book of Deuteronomy, and not without some probability, that the xxviii, xxix, and xxx chapters, that portion of scripture which the secretary, who (as we told a Kings xxii. 8.) had read the book before he brought it to the king, thought proper, upon this occasion, to turn to; for therein is contained a renewal of the covenant which Moses, as mediator, had made between God and the people of Israel at Mount Horeb; and therein are those threats and terrible comminations to the transgressors of the law, whether prince or people, which affected Josiah so much; and which Moses had given to the Levites to put on the side of the covenant, that it might be there for a witness against the transgressors of it. SOON after the celebration of the passover, Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, advanced with a powerful army towards the Euphrates, against the Medes and Babylonians, who had subverted the Assyrian empire, with a design of making himself master of Asia. When he came to Megiddo, a town within the dominions of Josiah, he refused him passage through his country, in an expedition against the Medes. The Egyptian upon this sent an herald, to give Josiah to understand, that he entertained not a thought of hostility towards him, and that his only design was to expedite his march towards the Euphrates, desiring him, at the same time, not to put him to the necessity of effecting that by force, which he wished to do by courtesy.

Josiah, notwithstanding the very mild terms in which the herald's message was couched, persisted in the denial of the passage, as if through the impulse of a fatality that was to bring on his dissolution. For, putting his army in a posture to dispute the passage, and riding up and down from wing to wing, to animate his men, an arrow, from the bow of an Egyptian, gave him a mortal wound. He immediately commanded a retreat to be sounded for his army, returned to Jerusalem, and there expired. He was interred, with great funeral pomp, in the sepulchre of his ancestors, in the thirty-ninth year of his age; and thirty-first of his reign. Never did a king die more universally regretted by his subjects: the lamentations for his loss were as universal when dead, as had been their affections for his person when living. Jeremiah, the prophet, composed an elegy upon the occasion, which is extant at this day. This prophet foretold the approach of the Babylonish captivity, and the calamities of our days, and also, like Isaiah, committed his predictions to writing, for the information of posterity. Nor was Jeremiah the only prophet who foretold these melancholy events; for Ezekiel also left behind him, in writing, two books of prophecies, concerning the same events. These two prophets were of the sacerdotal line. Jeremiah resided at Jerusalem, from the thirteenth year of the reign of Josiah, to the time of the destruction of the temple and city, of which we shall treat in due order.

The king of Egypt, on his return from the expedition against the Babylonians, sent for Jehoahaz to come to him, to a city called Hamath, in the country of Syria, whither he had no sooner arrived, than he caused him to be put in fetters, and delivered up his government to Eliakim, his elder brother, by the same father, on condition of his changing his name to Jehoiakim, and paying the Egyptian monarch an annual tribute of an hundred talents of silver, and one of gold. (a) Jehoahaz was carried captive into Egypt, where he finished his life in disgrace and misery, having reigned in Jerusalem three months and ten days. The mother of Jehoiakim was a native of Ramah; her name Zabida. He was a prince as destitute of religion as of humanity, having neither reverence for God, nor regard for man.

C H A P. VII.

Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, having defeated the king of Egypt, makes the king of Judah his tributary. Jeremiah foretells the calamities attendant on Jehoiakim.

IN the fourth year of the reign of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, advanced with a mighty army to Carchabesa, a city bordering on the Euphrates, with a resolution of making war upon Pharaoh Necho, king of Egypt, who, at that time, held all Syria under subjection. The Egyptian, sensible of the power of his adversary, took the field with a formidable body of forces, in order to oppose him; but coming to action, was obliged to retreat, with the loss of many thousands of his men. The victorious Babylonians passed the Euphrates, and subdued the whole country of Syria, as far as Pelusium, Judea only excepted.

In the fourth year of Nebuchadnezzar, and eighth of Jehoiakim, the former made an expedition, with a powerful army, against Judea, threatening the inhabitants with the greatest extremities, unless they would become tributary, as were those of Syria in general. Jehoiakim, awed by these menaces, purchased peace for a certain sum of money, which was duly paid for the space of full three years; but the year ensuing, upon the credit of an idle report, that the king of Egypt was advancing against Nebuchadnezzar, Jehoiakim refused to pay him tribute any longer. He found himself, however, miserably disappointed in his hopes; for the Egyptians, fearful of the power of the Babylonians, declined the contest.

The prophet Jeremiah had repeatedly foretold this event, and pointed out the folly of Jehoiakim, in relying on the assistance of the Egyptians. He likewise presaged the fate of Jerusalem, that it would be suddenly destroyed by the Babylonians; and the king himself taken captive. But the inhabitants of Jerusalem, instead of being duly impressed with the awful prediction of Jeremiah, treated it with contemptuous ridicule. Nay a charge was exhibited against the prophet to the king, as a mover of sedition; and being ultimately referred to the decision of the council, the majority were for pronouncing sentence of death. The elders, however, seeing the matter in its true light, would by no means agree to so rigorous a punishment. Their prudent advice was for discharging Jeremiah the court; observing, that he was not the only prophet that had foretold the calamities of Jerusalem, as Micah, and several others, had done the same before him, without being subjected to the censure or punishment of government, but, on the contrary, honoured and caressed, as bearing a Divine commission. The council, prevailed on by this cool, though forcible, mode of reasoning, gave up their former opinion, and revoked the sentence they wished to pass without due deliberation.

Jeremiah committed all his predictions to writing; and, upon a day of solemn fasting, when the multitude were assembled in the temple, on the ninth month of the fifth year of Jehoiakim, he read to the congregation those predictions which related to the destruction of the temple, the city, and the people. The rulers, alarmed at the denunciation, took the book from the prophet, and ordered him, and Baruch (b) his scribe, to abscond, and conceal themselves from public search. The book was then carried to the king, who ordered his secretary to read it in the presence of his friends. The king was so incensed at the contents, that he rent the book, threw to his master drew upon him several persecutions, and a great deal of bad treatment.

The book called Baruch is introduced with an historical preface, wherein it is related, that Baruch, being then at Babylon, did, in the name of the captive king and his people, draw up an epistle, and afterwards read it to them for their approbation; and that, together with it, they sent a collection of money to the high priest at Jerusalem, for the maintenance of the daily sacrifices.

Nebuchadnezzar lays waste Jerusalem. Puts Jehoiakim to death, and appoints his son Jehoiachin to the succession.

Nebuchadnezzar lays waste Jerusalem, and puts Jehoiakim to death. Appoints Jehoiachin to the succession. Ezekiel carried captive to Babylon.

SOON after the king of Babylon made an expedition against Jehoiakim, who, alarmed at the prediction of the prophet, received him with his army into the city, and lulled, as it were, into a kind of fatal security, remained wholly inactive. But the Babylonian, upon his admittance into the city, violated the covenant previously made, and put the flower of the youth of Jerusalem, together with the king himself, to the sword. He then commanded his body to be thrown before the walls without burial, and constituted Jehoiachin, his son, king, both of the city and country, in his stead. He carried away captive to Babylon three thousand of the principal inhabitants, among whom was the prophet Ezekiel, being at that time a youth. This was the end of king Jehoiakim, who lived thirty-six years, and reigned eleven. He was succeeded by his son Jehoiachin. His mother was a native of Jerusalem, whose name was Nehusta. He reigned only three months and ten days.

CHAP. IX.

Nebuchadnezzar violates his faith in imprisoning Jehoiachin, and the heads of the people of Jerusalem.

Jerusalem besieged by the Babylonians.

THE king of Babylon soon repented his having placed Jehoiachin on the throne of Jerusalem, apprehending that, in revenge for his perfidious practice, in the life of his father, he would embrace the first opportunity of stirring up sedition and tumult. Upon this reflection he dispatched an army to invest Jerusalem. Jehoiachin, being a prince of a just and mild disposition, and unwilling that the city should be exposed to destruction on his account, entered into a treaty with Nebuchadnezzar's deputies for delivering up the city, upon condition, that neither the town itself, nor the inhabitants, should sustain any injury. The treaty was ratified, and his mother and kindred delivered up as hostages to the deputies for the due performance of the articles. But before a year elapsed, the king of Babylon violated his faith, commanded his officers to secure all the youths of the city, and all artificers in general, and bring them bound to him. Their number was ten thousand eight hundred and thirty-two, amongst whom were Jehoiachin himself, his mother and kindred, who were detained in custody by the king's command.

CHAP. X.

Jehoiachin deposed, and Zedekiah advanced to the throne. Upon his violating his oath, Nebuchadnezzar again invests Jerusalem. Zedekiah opposes the councils of the prophet Jeremiah.

Jehoiachin made prisoner by Nebuchadnezzar.

Jehoiachin being still detained in custody (a), the king of Babylon appointed Zedekiah, his father's brother, to the government in his place, binding him, by a solemn oath, to attempt no innovation, nor enter into any league with the Egyptians.

Though Zedekiah was no stranger to the fate of his predecessors for their impieties, he followed their pernicious example in the practice of the most detestable abominations. To this he was instigated by a similarity of disposition and manners in his contemporaries, and the sycophants who surrounded him. Indeed, an universal depravity seemed at this time to prevail. Such being the declension of true religion, and the prevalence of vice and immorality, Jeremiah, the prophet, frequently warned the king of the evil tendency of his impious courses, and admonished him to a reformation. He also pointed out to him the danger, as well as folly, of relying on the misrepresentations of those about him, or the predictions of false prophets, all of which would eventually prove as delusive as that respecting the Egyptians overcoming the Babylonians. Zedekiah admitted the propriety of the prophet's observation and advice, and that it was conducive to his best interest; but such was the influence of the wicked suggestions and corrupt principles of those with whom he was most intimate, as to efface any good impression that might have been wrought on him by the salutary counsel of the prophet!

Ezekiel, being at this very time in Babylon, foretold the destruction of the temple, and the calamities attendant on the people, and sent his predictions in writing to Jerusalem. The two prophets exactly corresponded as to the taking the city by force, and Zedekiah's being carried away captive; while there was an apparent disagreement between Ezekiel's foretelling that Zedekiah should not see Babylon, and Jeremiah's affirming that the king himself should carry him prisoner there. This seeming inconsistency, or at least diversity of expression, induced Zedekiah to doubt the truth of all the particulars in which they agreed; though the things foretold came to pass exactly according to their prophecies, we shall render evident in their proper places.

Jer. 32. Ezek. 12. The seeming contradiction of the prophets reconciled.

After an alliance of eight years between the kings of Babylon and Judah, the latter violated the treaty, and went over to the interest of the Egyptians, not doubting but that those two powers united, would be able to crush the imperious Nebuchadnezzar. But the Babylonian no sooner received intelligence of this revolt than he advanced with his army against Zedekiah, laid his country desolate, forced his citadels, and proceeded immediately to the siege of Jerusalem. The Egyptian, hearing of the critical situation of his ally, posted away to his relief, at the head of a powerful army, with a resolution to attempt the raising the siege. Nebuchadnezzar, upon intelligence of his march and design, drew off his army, met the Egyptians, gave them battle, vanquished, put them to flight, and drove them out of all Syria. In consequence of this temporary departure from the siege of Jerusalem, the false prophets again plied Zedekiah with their delusions, intimating, that the king of Babylon would no longer wage war with him or his people, nor remove them from their own country into Babylon, and that those then in captivity would return; and all the plate and treasure, which had been carried away, would be restored to the temple.

Zedekiah breaks the league, and revolts to the Egyptians.

The king of Babylon overcomes the Egyptians.

Zedekiah still amused by false prophets.

But Jeremiah contradicted their groundless assertions, peremptorily charged them with imposture and delusion, and affirmed that "The king of Babylon would renew the war, besiege Jerusalem again, destroy the inhabitants by famine, carry away those that remained into captivity, rifle their private property, and spoil their temple: nay, that he would lay it in ashes, utterly overthrow their city, and, lastly, they should serve him and his posterity seventy years." The prophet added, that, "On the expiration of that term, the Medes and Persians should deliver them from bondage, by the utter extinction of the Babylonish empire; that then they should be dismissed, return to their native land, rebuild the temple, and restore Jerusalem." These important declarations of the prophet had great effect on the minds of the people in general: but the leading men, and those who were hardened in impiety, and abandoned to the gratifications of sensual desires, pronounced them the effusions of a distempered brain, and treated them accordingly.

Jeremiah foretells the destruction of Jerusalem, and the Babylonish captivity. Jer. 37.

As Jeremiah was on his journey towards Anathoth, the place of his birth, about twenty furlongs distant from Jerusalem, he was met on the way by one of the rulers, who took him into custody on pretence that he was a deserter, and going over to the king of

(a) Jehoiachin continued in prison till the death of Nebuchadnezzar; but when his son succeeded to the throne, he not only released him from his imprisonment, (which had continued thirty-seven years), but treated him with great humanity and respect, allowing him an honourable maintenance, and giving him the precedence of all other princes in Babylon. The prophecy of Jeremiah, however, was amply fulfilled, he spending the remainder of his days in the place of his captivity.

Babylon. The prophet disowned the charge, and avowed that he was going to the place of his nativity; but the ruler, persisting in his accusations, carried him before some magistrates, who, after examination, sentenced him to torture, and afterwards to imprisonment, in which he continued some time.

In the ninth year of the reign of Zedekiah, on the tenth day of the tenth month, the king of Babylon made a second expedition against Jerusalem, laid siege to it eighteen months, and prosecuted the attack with the utmost vigour. The place, however, made an obstinate resistance against very powerful assailants; and though there prevailed, at the same time, amongst the inhabitants, both pestilence and famine, the army exerted themselves in a most extraordinary manner. In this posture of affairs Jeremiah, in prison, exhorted the multitude to open the gates, and receive the Babylonians into the city, the only expedient to save themselves, their families, and the town, from inevitable ruin. He assured them that those who remained in the city must expect to perish either by famine or the sword, whereas those who fled out to the enemy would save their lives.

But the heads of the people, notwithstanding the extremity to which they were reduced, were so far from attending to the prophet's counsel, that they represented him to the king as a lunatic, a mutineer, and one who intimidated the people by vague conjectures, and frantic representations; suggesting, at the same time, that the garrison was able to defend the place to the last extremity, if their ardour was not abated by a prognostication of imaginary evils.

Though the king was, in his own nature, neither illiberal nor cruel, yet, to obviate a dispute with the rulers at so critical a juncture, he left them to dispose of the prophet at their option. Having therefore gained the most desirable point, they hastened to the prison, took out Jeremiah, and let him down into a boggy pit, with a design to put an end to his life by suffocation. While he was in this condition, a favourite servant of the king, by birth an Ethiopian, hallooed and informed him of the treatment and situation of the prophet, and offered it as his humble opinion, that the rulers had not done well in aggravating his misfortunes, by exposing him to a death more grievous than that he could expect from his chains.

The king, prevailed on by the generous representation of his favourite, repented his leaving the prophet to the discretion of his enemies, and therefore ordered the Ethiopian to take with him thirty trusty men of his own guards, with all necessary implements, and use every possible and speedy endeavour to extricate the prophet from his present deplorable situation. The servant obeyed his orders, and released the prophet, who was soon after privately conducted to the king, who enquired of him, whether he could procure him relief under his present circumstances. Jeremiah replied, that "He could; but that the people would neither believe him, nor follow his counsel, as all his pretended friends were averse to him, deemed him an impostor, and were continually meditating the means of his destruction:" But where are those men (continued the prophet) who deceived us, in declaring that the king of Babylon would wage war no more against us? He added, that if he was open and ingenuous with him, his life might be at stake. The king then assured him, upon oath, that he would neither himself take away his life, nor suffer any of his people to do it; upon which he took courage, and advised him by all means to deliver up the city into the hands of the king of Babylon. This, he told him, was the only means of securing his own person, preventing the burning of the temple, and the demolition of the city: but if he pursued any other means, he was enjoined by Divine authority to assure him, he would entail upon himself, his family, and people, utter and inevitable destruction, and be considered as the author of all their calamities.

Zedekiah declared that he was disposed to follow the advice given him, from a persuasion it was conducive to the public good; but expressed his fears lest those of his own country, who were already gone over to the Babylonians, should accuse him to the king of Babylon, and thereby endanger his life. The prophet dissuaded him from harbouring any such suspicion, and assured him, that if he delivered up the city, neither himself, family, nor the temple, should sustain any injury. Upon these words Jeremiah was dismissed by the king, who charged him by no means to discover what had passed between them, not even to the rulers, if they should come to a knowledge of his having been sent for; and if they should enquire into the cause, to pretend that he craved permission to stand in his presence, in order to solicit his enlargement. The prophet followed the king's injunction, and gave that answer to those who made enquiry concerning the business of his attendance.

THE king of Babylon prosecuted the siege of Jerusalem with great vigour. He erected towers in order to repel those who stood upon the walls. The assailants, indeed, made every preparation for a general attack, while the place was defended with equal resolution by the besieged, who had not only their enemies to encounter, but the complicated calamities of pestilence and famine. They stood firm against both force and stratagem, opposing invention to invention, if the point in dispute depended on military skill; the assailants being determined to take the city, and the besieged resolved to defeat their efforts by every exertion of prowess and skill in martial manoeuvres. The contest was maintained for the space of eighteen months, when, through want of provisions, and numbers sufficient to repel the vigorous attacks of the assailants, together with the incessant annoyance of darts, which the enemy discharged at them from the towers, they were reduced to the inevitable necessity of a surrender.

Thus was the city of Jerusalem taken on the ninth day of the fourth month, in the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah, by the commanders to whom the business of the siege was committed by Nebuchadnezzar, who at that time was at Reblatha. The names of these commanders were Nersear, Aremantus, Emegar, Nabafaris, and Echanamparis. The city was taken about midnight; and when Zedekiah perceived the officers enter the temple, he took his wives, children, friends, and leading men, and with them fled out of the city through the desert. When the Babylonians received intelligence of this escape from some revolvers, they pursued them early next morning, overtook and surrounded them at a place near Jericho. Zedekiah's companions, perceiving the approach of the enemy, abandoned him, and dispersed themselves, seeking their only protection in flight. The king being thus deserted, fell into the hands of his enemies, with his wives and children, and the small remnant that adhered to him, all of whom were brought before Nebuchadnezzar. Zedekiah was no sooner presented to the king of Babylon, than he reproached him. "A covenant-breaker, and the most ungrateful of miscreants, who, after he had deposed Johoiachin, and advanced him to the throne, had used his power against the very man from whom he had received it." He added, that "The great Disposer of all Events, as a punishment for his treachery and ingratitude, had now reduced him to the abject state of a vassal and prisoner to him whose liberality he had so flagrantly abused."

After this severe, but just, reproach, he commanded his children and adherents to be put to death in his presence; and then that Zedekiah's eyes should be put out, and the vanquished prince carried as a dreadful spectacle in chains to Babylon. Thus were fulfilled the respective prophecies of Jeremiah and Ezekiel, which Zedekiah disregarded from a seeming contradiction between them; the former foretelling that he should be taken captive to Babylon, and speak to the king, face to face; and the latter, that he should be carried away to Babylon, and not see him; which

of Josephus on the foregoing events

This may serve to convince the most ignorant and incredulous of the power and wisdom of the Almighty, and the infallibility of his word respecting events in general. All the various dispensations of his providence concur to demonstrate the immutability of his goodness and justice; so that hence we may infer the danger and folly of indulging a disbelief of those things which bear the sanction of Divine authority.

End of the king's succession from David.

Thus became extinct the race of kings descended from David, after a succession of twenty-one, in the space of five hundred and fifteen years, six months, and ten days, including the twenty years of the reign of Saul, who was of another tribe.

The city of

After this signal victory, the king of Babylon sent Nebuzar-Adan, his commander in chief, to Jerusalem, with orders to raze and burn the temple, and, after laying the city level with the ground, to carry away the inhabitants captive to Babylon. Accordingly, in the eleventh year of Zedekiah, Nebuzar-Adan executed his commission, rifled the temple, taking away all the vessels of gold and silver, Solomon's gorgeous laver, with the brazen pillars and their chapiters, and the golden tables and candlesticks. After a general pillage he set fire to the temple, and then laid the palace and the city in ashes. This memorable event occurred on the first day of the fifth month, in the eleventh year of the reign of Zedekiah, and eighteenth of Nebuchadnezzar.

Upon the destruction of Jerusalem, and the transportation of the inhabitants, Nebuzar-Adan took with him prisoners, the high-priest, Seraiah, and Sephaniah, next in sacerdotal dignity; three chief superintendants of the temple; the first eunuch of the bed-chamber, with the king's secretary; and other men of eminence, to the number of sixty; all of whom were brought together to the king, then resident at Reblathis, a city of Syria. The king commanded the heads of the high-priest, and the leading men, to be struck off in that city; but the aggregate body of prisoners, with Zedekiah himself, they carried to Babylon. Jehozaback, the high-priest, and son of Seraiah, that was put to death, was taken and bound along with them.

Having enumerated the succession of kings in due order from father to son, I deem it necessary to observe the same method with respect to the high-priests, who, from time to time, exercised the supreme sacerdotal office.

The first high-priest, after the building of Solomon's temple, was Zadok. Then came his son Ahimaaz; and after Ahimaaz, Azariah, and so forward, Joram, Isus, Axiaramus, Phideas, Sudeas, Iulus, Jotham, Urias, Nerias, Odeus, Saldumus, Elcias, Sarræus, and Jehozadack, who was carried away captive to Babylon. These handed down the pontificate in a continued succession in their families from generation to generation.

Death of Zedekiah.

Upon the king's return to Babylon, Zedekiah was committed to prison, where he died, and was interred magnificently in the royal sepulchre of that city. The holy vessels taken out of the temple of Jerusalem were dedicated to the idol gods of the country. The captives were fixed in habitations, and Jehozadack was set at liberty.

Nebuzar-Adan, the general, who brought away the people captive, left the multitude and the deserters to the charge of Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, a man eminent for probity and generosity, who allotted each individual such a portion of land to improve, on condition of paying a stipulated tribute to the king. The prophet Jeremiah was also discharged from his imprisonment; and the king having enjoined the governor to pay him particular attention, Gedaliah signified to the prophet a desire of his accompanying him to Babylon; but Jeremiah replied, that he was not disposed to remove, but wished to remain there, and share in the miseries of his countrymen. Nebuzar-Adan hearing the prophet's resolution, gave strict charge to Gedaliah to see him amply provided for, made him several valuable presents himself, left him, and returned to Babylon. Jeremiah took up his abode at Mizpah, having first obtained of the governor the liberty of Baruch, the son of Neriah, a man of noble birth, and well versed in the language of his country, whom he selected as his companion.

When the deserters, who had absconded Jerusalem during the time of the siege, heard of the burning and sacking of the city, and the return of the Babylonians into their own country, they repaired, from all quarters where they had secreted themselves, to Gedaliah, at Mizpah (a). The principal men amongst them were Johanan, the son of Careah, Jaazaniah, and Saraiah, with some others. Besides these was Ishmael, a person of royal extraction, but of a base and depraved disposition. This man, at the time of the siege, fled to Bathai, king of the Ammonites, for refuge, with whom he afterwards continued.

Upon the application of these fugitives to Gedaliah, he gave them encouragement to continue there, and plant colonies, assuring them they might live quietly without the least interruption or annoyance from the Babylonians; and binding himself upon oath to assert their cause, if any man should presume to give them molestation. He left them to make choice of the town or place of their residence, and offered to send some of his own people with them, to assist in fitting up their habitations; but admonished them by no means to neglect the season of providing for the next vintage and harvest, that they might not want corn and oil the ensuing winter for their subsistence. Having given them this encouragement and assurance, he left every man at liberty to dispose of himself in such a manner as he might deem most expedient.

The report of Gedaliah's humanity and generosity towards the fugitives, who applied to him for protection, gained him so great a reputation throughout the countries that bordered on Judæa, that the inhabitants resorted to him from all parts, and speedily formed a considerable colony, having land assigned them in property, on condition of paying a stipulated tribute to the king of Babylon.

Johanan, and the rest of the principal men of the Jews, retaining the most grateful sense of the humanity and generosity of Gedaliah towards their fugitive countrymen, deemed it their incumbent duty, from a principle of the profoundest respect, to advise him of a conspiracy formed against him by the king of the Ammonites, in conjunction with Ishmael, who was to take him off by treachery, and, being of the royal line, by that means seize on the government of Judæa. They intimated to the governor, at the same time, that the only means to prevent the execution of so horrid a design, would be privately to dispatch Ishmael, which, with his concurrence, they would undertake to do, apprehensive that, if so base and injurious a person was not speedily removed from amongst them, he would eventually prove the ruin of the Israelites in general.

Gedaliah, a man of a generous temper, and not prone to entertain jealousies of others, was unwilling to give credit to what had been related to him. He told them he thought it impossible that any man could be so barbarous and ungrateful, or so far deviate from all sense of moral obligation, as to seek the destruction of one whom, by all the ties of honour and hospitality, he was bound to defend and preserve even at the hazard of his own life. He farther observed, that, admitting the truth of what had been told, he could not so far violate the laws of hospitality, as to take away the life of a man who had sheltered himself under his protection. Johanan, and his friends, finding their advice ineffectual, respectfully took their departure.

In the course of about a month after Gedaliah had received this information and advice, Ishmael, with some of his friends, paid him a visit at Mizpah, where they were treated with every instance of hospitality and respect. Being invited to a sumptuous entertainment, Ishmael seized on what he thought the most favourable opportunity for carrying his execrable design into execution, nor did he fail taking advantage of it. In the midst of the entertainment, when conviviality and intoxication prevailed, Ishmael, and his companions, suddenly arose from the table, and falling on the governor, not only put him to death, but all the guards who were present. Being now the dead of the night, and the inhabitants of the city carelessly secure, they sallied into the streets, slaughtering all they could find, whether Jews or Babylonians, without distinction. The day after this horrid transaction took place, it happened that a party of fourscore men came to Mizpah, in order to offer presents to Gedaliah, in acknowledgment of their subjection to his government. Ishmael being apprized of their arrival, went, accompanied by his companions, some way from Mizpah to meet them, which he had no sooner done, than he offered to conduct them to the governor's house. The offer was readily accepted; but they had no sooner arrived there, than Ishmael and his companions shut the doors upon them, fell on and slew them, causing the bodies afterwards to be thrown into a pit, where they might be concealed. Some few of the number were spared, in consequence of their promising to make a discovery of some treasure, and other valuable commodities, which were hid under ground in an adjacent field.

Ishmael, after these horrid massacres, took away with him captive the common people of Mizpah, with their wives and children, and, amongst the rest, two persons of distinction, daughters of Zedekiah, whom Nebuzar-Adan had left under the immediate care of Gedaliah. When Johanan, and the rest of the principal men, heard of the horrid barbarities committed by Ishmael, and that he was posting with the news of his exploits to the king of the Ammonites, they collected a considerable body of armed men, went in pursuit, and overtook him at the fountain of Hebron. As soon as the captives who were with him saw Johanan, they rejoiced exceedingly, and immediately ran over to his party; while Ishmael, with only eight of his companions, made their escape to the king of the Ammonites.

Johanan, in the mean time, with the people he had rescued out of the hands of Ishmael, eunuchs, women, and children, retired to a certain place called Mandra, where they abode one day; being determined to remove from thence into Egypt, lest the Babylonians should revenge on them the murder of their governor. While this matter was in agitation, they entered into a resolution of applying to the prophet Jeremiah, and consulting him on their present critical situation. The prophet promised them his best advice and assistance; and, at the expiration of ten days, he received a Divine commission to inform Johanan and the other rulers, "That if they continued where they were, the Almighty would assist and secure them against any injury from the Babylonians, whom they so much dreaded; but that if, after this promonition, they were determined to go into Egypt, they might expect the same vindictive judgment for disobedience, as had fallen on their brethren before them."

Though the prophet assured them that this message was delivered to them at the Divine command, they doubted its authenticity, imagining it could not be consistent with the Divine will that they should continue where they were. Supposing it, therefore, an invention of the prophet, to gratify Baruch his disciple, and expose them to the resentment of the Babylonians, Johanan, and the people under him, in contempt of the Divine commission by the prophet, went away into Egypt, and took with them Jeremiah and Baruch.

Upon their arrival, the prophet received Divine intimation, that the king of Babylon should bring an army into Egypt; and was therefore commanded to tell the people that Egypt should be taken, that part of them should be slain, and part carried away captive to Babylon, which accordingly came to pass. For, in the fifth year after the destruction of Jerusalem, and the twenty-third of Nebuchadnezzar, he made an inroad into Cælo-Syria, and, upon subduing it, carried the war forward to the Ammonites and Moabites; and when he had reduced them to subjection, made a furious incursion into Egypt, slew the then king, set up another in his place, and carried away the Jews that were found there a second time captives to Babylon.

Such was the miserable state of the Hebrew nation, in having been twice carried away beyond the Euphrates: for the ten tribes were transported first by the Assyrians out of Samaria, in the reign of Hosea; and afterwards the other two by Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Babylonians, upon the taking of Jerusalem.

Salmanezar transplanted the Chuthites into the country of the Israelites, out of the heart of Media and Persia; and they were called Samaritans from the name of the place into which they were thus transplanted. But the king of Babylon carried away the other two tribes without introducing any other into their country. For this cause Judea, with Jerusalem, and the temple, lay wholly abandoned for the space of seventy years. The interval between the captivity of the ten tribes, and the transmigration of the other two, proved to be one hundred and thirty-years, six months, and ten days.

Among the number of captives carried away by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, were many youths of the first distinction, whom the conqueror, in consequence of their great natural abilities, kept in his palace, and employed proper tutors to instruct them in the language and learning of the Chaldeans. The most conspicuous amongst these were Daniel, Ananias, Misrael, and Azariah. As it was the custom amongst conquerors to change the names of their captives, especially when they were to serve in any capacity about the court, their names were changed as follow: Daniel was called Belteshazzar; Ananias, Shadrack; and Azariah, Abednego. The king held these youths in high esteem for the sweetness of their disposition, their assiduous application to learning, and their extraordinary progress in useful knowledge; in so much, that orders were given for their daily supply of meat and wine from the royal table. But Daniel, being a devout observer of the religion of his country, and determined to abide by the precepts it enjoined, concerning the eating of some living creatures, desired Aschanes, the chief eunuch, who had them in charge, that, instead of the delicacies which the king sent them from his own table, they might have pulse or dates, or any other ordinary food that had no life in it; as a plain diet would be most agreeable to their palates. The eunuch told them he was entirely disposed to gratify their inclination; but if such indifferent diet should cause them to look not so well as those who lived on better food, the king might take offence, and it might endanger his life. Finding the eunuch not entirely averse to the proposal, they urged him to permit them to make the experiment only for ten days, and after that, if he found the least change in their habit or complexion, he might bring them back to their sumptuous fare. The eunuch was prevailed upon to make the trial; and when he found them so far from being worse for the alteration, that they improved both in the habit of their bodies, and their intellectual faculties, he made no further scruple of complying with their desires, but gave them such diet as they requested, and kept the allowance from the royal table for his own use.

This abstemious mode of living agreed so well with Daniel and his companions, that it produced an apparent good effect in preserving them in a state both of mind and body, fit for study or labour, being neither surfeited with variety, or effeminated by luxury. In short, through the means of temperance and discipline, their spirits were kept clear and active, as appeared from their astonishing progress in the Hebrew and Chaldean languages. Daniel, indeed, exceeded the rest, and soon appeared to possess most singular knowledge in the understanding and interpretation of dreams.

About two years after the destruction of Egypt, Nebuchadnezzar had an extraordinary dream, which so impressed his mind as to make him very uneasy: and what contributed to his perplexity was, that he could not recollect the substance of it. To assist his recollection in this particular, he summoned all his wise men, as Chaldeans, Magi, and the prophets, and told them, that he had an extraordinary dream, the substance of which he had forgotten, and therefore demanded of them the interpretation. They answered, answered, that they could readily give him the interpretation, provided they knew the dream; but without that it would be impossible. This answer farther irritated the king, who immediately gave orders that all the wise men in Babylon should be put to death.

As soon as Daniel heard the cause of this dreadful decree, and had reason to apprehend that he and his companions might be included in it, he immediately repaired to Arioch, the captain of the king's guards, requesting to know the crime for which they were to die. The captain informed him, that the king had a dream which he had forgotten, and that they were to die because they could not tell him the substance. Daniel requested him to procure him a reprieve for one night only, and he would not despair of giving him the satisfaction he required, as he had cause to apprehend that, by the Divine assistance, he should be enabled so to do. The captain related to the king the particulars that had passed between him and Daniel; in consequence of which the execution was repited, to try the effect of the experiment.

Nebuchadnezzar having complied with Daniel's request, he immediately went home, and related the whole matter to his companions, beseeching them to join in prayer with him, that God would be pleased to reveal to him this great and important secret, whereby not only their lives, but also those of all the wise men in Babylon, might be saved. The intercession of Daniel and his companions was heard; and that very night he received, in a vision, not only the dream itself, but a full interpretation of it, in order that he might communicate the whole matter to the king.

Daniel was so transported with this signal instance of the Divine favour and regard, that he rose early in the morning, encouraged his companions, now brought to the very brink of despair, by assuring them, that they might dissipate their fears, and rest in security. When they had joined in their acknowledgments to the Almighty for his signal interposition in their behalf, Daniel went to Arioch, the captain of the guards, desiring him to introduce him to the king, with assurance that he should have full satisfaction as to the particulars and interpretation of his dream. Arioch, happy in this intelligence, and pleased with the thought of avoiding the execution of the king's decree, readily complied with Daniel's request, and conducted him to the palace.

When he was admitted to the king's presence, he modestly confessed, that he did not arrogate to himself more wisdom than the Chaldeans and Magi, though, upon their inability to discover his dream, he had undertaken to give him full information. He acknowledged that it was not through his own prescience, or his possessing an understanding superior to the rest, but purely through the Divine mercy and goodness, which interposed in a time of imminent danger, at his intercession, for his own life, and those of his nation, and manifested to him both the dream and the interpretation. He observed, that he had not been so solicitous for the safety of himself and his companions, as for the prevention of the deaths of so many worthy men, who had so severe a sentence pronounced against them, for not being able to do that which could not be accomplished but by a supernatural power. He then proceeded in words to the following purport:

"Your mind, O king, was agitated in your sleep, concerning the succession of the empire of the world on your demise. The dream had a tendency to solve that matter, and point out to you those who will rule when you are no more. You saw a large image, or statue, standing before you; the head was gold, the shoulders and arms silver, the belly and thighs brass, and the legs and feet iron. You then saw a stone broken off from a mountain; the fall on the image overthrew it, and broke it so small, that the dust of the gold, silver, brass, and iron, was as light as chaff, and carried away by a blast of wind to the furthestmost parts of the earth; the stone increasing to such a magnitude, that it lay like a mountain upon the face of the earth." (a)

(a) By the different emblems in the interpretation of this dream, was signified to Nebuchadnezzar the four grand empires

Daniel, having thus related the dream, proceeded thus to give the interpretation:

"The head of gold denotes yourself, and the kings of Babylon, your predecessors. The hands and shoulders portend that two kings shall subvert your empire, and afterwards their empire shall be subverted by another king coming from the west in armour of brass, and he is to be subdued, in process of time, by another in iron, which, in its nature, is stronger than gold, and not to be resisted."

Daniel also gave an interpretation of the stone, which I shall pass over in this place, as I have undertaken to write of things past, and not of things to come. Those who are desirous of prying into future events, are referred to the Book of Daniel, as it stands upon sacred record.

Nebuchadnezzar was so astonished at this wonderful discovery of his dream, and the interpretation of it, that, after prostrating himself before Daniel, he appointed Divine honours to be done him: nor would this serve him without giving him the name of his god, Belteshazzar. He made him ruler of the whole province, and appointed several of this kindred to offices of dignity. This drew such an envy upon them as to endanger their lives, through a disgust the king took on the following occasion:

He caused an image of gold to be made sixty cubits in height, and six in breadth, and placed it in the great plain of Babylon. He summoned, upon the dedication of it, the great men and officers throughout all his dominions, making proclamation that, upon hearing the sound of the trumpet, they should all fall down and worship the image, upon pain of being cast into the fiery furnace.

Accordingly, upon the sound of the trumpet, all the people fell down and worshipped, Daniel and his kindred excepted, who refusing to do it, from a reverence to the laws of their country, were informed against, and cast into the fire; but, through a merciful Providence, their lives were preserved. The flame, as it were, suspended the very nature of its devouring quality in favour of the innocent, for they were not so much as scorched. This miraculous interposition of the Divine power and goodness, in their deliverance and justification, recommended them to the king's esteem in such a degree, that they were more honoured and caressed, if possible, than they had been before.

Soon after this singular circumstance in favour of the worshippers of the true God, who refused to bow down to idols, Nebuchadnezzar had another dream, as surprising as the former. It was, "That being expelled from the kingdom, he lived seven years amongst the beasts of the forest, and was afterwards restored to his former state and dignity." Upon this occasion, the king again sent for the Magi, and demanded of them the interpretation. But they were as incapable of expounding this dream, which he perfectly remembered, as they were of the former, which he had entirely forgotten. Recourse was therefore, from necessity, had to Daniel, who gave him the interpretation, and his prediction was confirmed by the event; for, after an interval of seven years solitude in the desert, during which no attempt was made to seize on his government, the Almighty was pleased to restore him to his regal authority.

Let me not incur censure for representing things in my writings minutely as I find them in ancient history; for I have obviated all cause for this censure, by a public declaration, at the commencement of this work, that it should be my study and endeavour to acquit myself as an impartial and faithful translator of the history from the Hebrew into the Greek, and to adhere precisely to the original, without addition or diminution.

Nebuchadnezzar was a prince of an active disposition, and much more fortunate than any of his predecessors. He departed this life after he had reigned forty-three years.

Berosus, in the third book of the Chaldean History, writes concerning him thus: "Nebuchadnezzar, the father, understanding that a certain great officer, " to

He went, found him out, fought, overcame him, and brought back the revolted provinces to their duty. His father, in the mean time, was taken off by a sickness at Babylon, in the twenty-first year of his reign. The young prince had no sooner intelligence of this event, than he applied himself to the settling of his affairs in Egypt, and the rest of the provinces; and recommended to some particular friends the charge of conveying his prisoners, Jews, Syrians, Phœnicians, and Egyptians, to Babylon, with the army and baggage, while he himself, with a small retinue, took his way thither over the desert. The government was reserved for him in the mean time by the Chaldeans, and secured in his absence by the principal men till his return; so that, when he entered upon the government, he was established in the full possession of his paternal empire. His first care was to make a well-arranged distribution of his captives into colonies; and after that to adorn the temple of Belus, and other religious places, with the spoils taken in battle. He repaired and enlarged the ancient buildings of the city, and raised works upon the banks of the river, to prevent all approaches of an enemy. He erected three walls, or entrenchments, within the bounds of the city, and as many without, and they were all composed of brick. Having thus fortified the city, he ornamented the gates with a curious frontispiece; and built another palace, contiguous to that of his father, with all possible art and magnificence. The particulars of this stately edifice are too numerous for insertion in this place; therefore I shall only observe, as worthy of notice and admiration, that it was finished in fifteen days! In this building there were vast stones, supported upon arches, that appeared like mountains suspended in the air; and they were planted on the summit with several sorts of trees, in compliment to the queen, who, being a Median, was fondly desirous to see some artificial resemblance of the gardens and rarities of her own country.”

Magasthenes, in the fourth volume of his History of India, makes mention of these garden works, and represents this king, both for his enterprises and his performances, as superior to Hercules himself, having subdued the greatest part of Lybia and Iberia. These are all the historians, within the compass of my knowledge, who have written concerning this king.

ON the death of Nebuchadnezzar, the government of Babylon devolved to his son, Evil-Me-

ach, who immediately released Jehoiakim, king of Jerusalem, from his confinement, honoured him with many presents, reposed in him a particular confidence, and made him chief governor of his palace at Babylon. His father, indeed, had ignobly violated his faith with Jehoiakim, in making him his prisoner, after having voluntarily delivered himself up, with his wife, children, and kindred, from the patriotic mode of saving his country. On the demise of Evil-Merodach, after a reign of eighteen years, he was succeeded by his son Niglissar, who, having reigned forty years, the government fell, by right hereditary, to his son Labotardochus, who retained it only nine months, after which it devolved on Belshazzar, called, by the Babylonians, Naboandel.

cause it was the first, the most splendid, the most magnificent, if not the most extensive; and king Nebuchadnezzar, being then upon the throne, is said to be the head of it. That of silver represents the Persian empire, founded by Cyrus on the ruins of the Chaldean, but inferior to it, at least in its duration, if not in its extent. That of brass is the Grecian empire, founded by Alexander on the ruins of the Persian; and its character is, that it should bear rule over all the earth, Dan. ii. 39. which was verified in its great founder; for, upon his return from India to Babylon, the ambassadors of almost all the known parts of the world resorted thither, to pay their homage and acknowledgment of his dominion. That of iron is the Roman empire, which is distinguished by its breaking in pieces, and subduing all things. For, during the time it was in its full strength and vigour, under its consuls and first emperors, it brought under its dominion all the kingdoms and states that were then flourishing in Europe, Africa, and a great part of

His father, indeed, had ignobly violated his faith with Jehoiakim, in making him his prisoner, after having voluntarily delivered himself up, with his wife, children, and kindred, from the patriotic mode of saving his country. On the demise of Evil-Merodach, after a reign of eighteen years, he was succeeded by his son Niglissar, who, having reigned forty years, the government fell, by right hereditary, to his son Labotardochus, who retained it only nine months, after which it devolved on Belshazzar, called, by the Babylonians, Naboandel.

Cyrus, king of the Persians, and Darius, king of the Medes, made war upon this prince; and while they lay before Babylon, there appeared to Belshazzar a most extraordinary vision. As he was regaling himself in a spacious room, with his courtiers and concubines, he ordered the vessels of gold and silver, which Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the temple of Jerusalem, to be brought thither, and converted to the purposes of conviviality; though he had already a most magnificent service of plate, and they had never heretofore been put to any kind of use. To add to this instance of their criminality, when they became intoxicated, they added blasphemy to prophanation. In the midst of their mirth and jollity, the king was thrown into the utmost terror and consternation by the appearance of an hand, which wrote on the wall, in three words, the sentence of his condemnation. He immediately sent for the most expert of the Magi, to tell him the meaning of the words that were marked on the plaister: but when they were not able to make the least discovery, Belshazzar was under such agitation of mind, that he caused a proclamation to be made, that whoever could explain the writing, and give him the signification, should have, as a reward, a golden chain and purple vestment; nay, the third place of rule in his dominions. This proclamation induced the Magi to exert their utmost skill to find out the import of the writing; but they were as defective as they had been upon the former occasion.

While the king was labouring under a state of the most anxious and tormenting suspense, his grandmother told him, for his encouragement, “That there was a certain captive, who came from Judea, a Jew by birth, brought thither by Nebuchadnezzar, whose name was Daniel, famed for his sagacity in solving the most intricate matters that could possibly be propounded to him.” She added, that he had brought to light such things, and answered such questions to Nebuchadnezzar, as defeated the skill of the most learned in his kingdom when they were consulted. She therefore desired he would send for him, and enquire of him concerning the writing; giving him full encouragement, at the same time, to speak the truth, though it should make against him, on the means of solving his doubts, and exposing the ignorance and inability of pretenders.

Upon this advice Belshazzar caused Daniel to be sent for; professing, indeed, that he had heard of his extraordinary sagacity, and that he apprehended him to be the most capable person in the world to divine the truth of a matter inexplicable to all others. When Daniel was brought into the royal presence, the king put the question to him, declaring, that if he solved it, he should be rewarded with the presents, and honours specified in the proclamation he had caused to be made throughout his dominions, and which would spread his fame throughout the world, when it should be known that he had acquired them by his wisdom.

Daniel modestly declined receiving the offers proposed, observing that wisdom was a Divine gift, and not to be corrupted by bribes, but, on the contrary, bestowing its benefits freely on those who seek them; for which cause he would proceed to explain the writing.

Exposition of the hand writing.

"The writing (said he) denotes that your death is at hand, as you have not taken warning from the judgments that befell your great ancestor, for his contempt of God, and neglect of the exercise of piety and virtue. You cannot but know that Nebuchadnezzar was banished human society, and sentenced to the life and condition of a beast; though it pleased the Almighty, on his contrition and supplication, to restore him to his former state as a man and a monarch, which signal instance of Divine mercy he adored and celebrated during the remainder of his life: but this example is so far from having a due influence on you, and those around you, that you are guilty of the most flagrant blasphemy, and glory in the profanation of the vessels dedicated to the most solemn services. By these impious courses you have drawn upon your head the Divine vengeance; and the intent of the writing is to demonstrate to you the consequence. MENE, which signifies number, intimates that the days both of your life and reign are numbered, or, that you have but a short time to live. TEKEL, which signifies weight, intimates that you have been weighed in the balance of Divine justice, and found wanting. PERIAES, which signifies a fragment, intimates that your kingdom shall be divided, and given to the Medes and Persians."

Belshazzar, having heard this dreadful sentence pronounced by Daniel, could not but be struck with awe and confusion: nevertheless he fulfilled his promise, though he was the harbinger of most disastrous events, justly imputing the cause not to the prophet but his own impious courses, that had so highly excited the Divine indignation.

taken by Cyrus.

Soon after this both himself and the city were taken by Cyrus, (a), king of Persia, in the seventeenth year of the reign of Belshazzar, who is said to have been the last king of the family of Nebuchadnezzar. Darius was sixty-two years of age at the subversion of the Babylonish empire, with the assistance of Cyrus, his kinsman, which Cyrus was the son of Astyages, though known among the Greeks by another name. He caused the prophet Daniel to accompany him to Media, where he treated him with singular tokens of esteem, and appointed him one of the three chief governors, that had three hundred and sixty more under them, according to the original institution of Darius. Indeed, the king of Media entertained so high an opinion of the ability and integrity of Daniel, that he consulted him upon all occasions as an oracle, nor would resolve upon any matter of importance without his advice.

Dan. 6.

But it was with Daniel as with the favorites of princes in general; the confidence and smiles of the king his master excited the envy of the courtiers around him. Daniel, however, was so well aware of their design, that he kept so strict a watch over his words and actions as to elude their keenest efforts. As he was above the love of money, he despised bribery, and even disdained to accept a gratuity for services performed. His enemies, however, contrived a plot to ensnare him in the following manner.

der of his conduct.

Observing that Daniel exercised prayers three times a day, they applied, in the name of his council and state officers, and with their advice and request, to the king, intreating him to issue an edict, that whoever should presume to prefer any petition either to God or man for the space of thirty days, should be cast into the lions' den. The king being so short-sighted as not to see through the malevolence of this device, which, on due reflection, must have appeared to strike at the life of Daniel, consented to the request, promised a confirmation of it, and ordered the publication of the edict, as the act of himself and council. The penalty annexed to the transgression of the edict was so severe, that the people, in general, were terrified into compliance with it. But Daniel still persisted in his usual course of paying his adorations to the Almighty three times every day in the public view of the world, wholly regardless of the tenour of the edict. This pious resolution furnished his enemies with the opportunity of a pretence for accusation, of which they immediately availed themselves. They waited on the king, and gave him to understand, that Daniel was the only man who, in direct contempt of his royal proclamation, and contrary to the tenour and letter of the edict, had prayed to his God, and that not from a principle of piety, but a spirit of obstinacy, and defiance of his authority. Such was the inveteracy of their hatred, and such their apprehension that the king's personal regard for him would induce him to pass over the offence, that they solicited with an importunity, and urged him with clamour not to be resisted, for justice on the delinquent, and that, according to law, he might be cast into the lions' den.

Darius was compelled to yield to their pressing importunities; but gave Daniel to understand his hope and trust that a Divine miracle would be wrought to rescue so good a man from impending destruction. Daniel, in fine, was cast into the den; and a great stone was laid at the mouth, upon which the king put his own signet, and retired pensive to his palace. He passed that night without eating or sleeping; for the anxiety of his mind for the fate of Daniel would not suffer him to enjoy the comforts and refreshments of life. At the earliest morn he went to the den, where he found every thing as left the preceding day, and the royal signet untouched. He called upon Daniel by name, to satisfy himself respecting his fate. Daniel no sooner heard his voice than he exclaimed, "O king, live for ever!" At which instant the king ordered him to be taken out.

But his enemies would not admit that his safety was the effect of a providential interposition, and attributed it solely to the lions he glutted with food. The king was so incensed at this instance of their rancour, that he commanded the lions to be sated with prey, and Daniel's accusers cast in amongst them; pertinently observing, that, as the same causes, on natural principles, would produce the same effects, the supernatural interference would appear, if they shared an expected, nay, a deserved fate. The lions instantly seized and tore them to pieces; so that they perished as victims to Divine as well as human justice.

Darius having thus executed justice on the enemies of Daniel, published a decree throughout his empire, commanding his people to acknowledge the God of Daniel to be the only true and Almighty God, and, at the same time, heaped honours upon the prophet, in preference to all his friends and favorites. Having, by his piety and moderation, procured an universal esteem, Daniel erected a stately fabric at Ecbatan, the capital of Media, a work as eminent for the strength as the beauty of its structure. This elegant building is still to be seen, and appears as firm as if it had not sustained the least impair from the shock of time. It is famous for being the royal monument of the kings of the Medes, Persians, and Parthians, to which use it is still applied; and the spot is committed to the custody of a Jewish priest to this day.

(a) The manner in which this was done is related by Xenophon as follows: "That two deserters, named Gadatas and Gobryas, having assisted some of the Persian army to kill the guards, and seize upon the palace, they entered into the room where the king was, whom they found standing up in a posture of defence; but that they soon disarmed him, whereby

voured of

There are other circumstances in the history of Daniel, which, from their extraordinary nature, are well worthy of observation. He was endowed with a singular gift of prophecy; acquired the highest degree of reputation, both with prince and people; and, at his death, left behind him a character that reflects immortal honour on his memory. We find, by his writings, that are still extant, and in daily use and reading, that he was highly favoured of God, who was pleased to reveal to him, not only the sum and substance of things to come, in common with other prophets, but the precise time of their accomplishment. And whereas other prophets, in general, foreboded calamitous events, and consequently incurred the odium of princes and people, it was his peculiar honour and happiness to conciliate their esteem, by being the harbinger of welcome tidings. The accuracy and veracity of his predictions will be abundantly evident to such as may be disposed to peruse his writings with candour, in proof of which we cite the following passage.

Vision of the ram and goat.
Daniel viii.

"It happened (says he) as I was taking the air with some of my companions at Susa, the metropolis of Persia, that we were suddenly surprized with an earthquake. My friends, in a fit of terror, deserted me. As I lay upon the ground, struck with horror and consternation at so awful an event, I perceived the touch, and heard the voice of a person, bidding me rise, and give due attention, as the revolutions that would befall my countrymen in future ages, would not to me be communicated. When I arose I saw a large ram, with several horns, and the last was higher than the rest. Turning my face towards the west, I saw a goat that passed through the air, encountered the ram, struck him down twice, and trampled him under his feet. After this there arose a large horn out of the forehead of the goat, and when that came to be broken, there sprang up four more, pointing towards the four quarters of the heavens." He also writes, "That, from one of them came forth a little horn, which, upon growing up, should wage war with the nation of the Jews, and destroy Jerusalem itself, suppress the ceremonies of the temple, and all sacrifices, for the space of 1296 days.

This was the vision which Daniel writes he saw at Susa, that was first shewn by a Divine revelation, and then interpreted after the following manner:

(a) St. Paul confuted many of the Epicurean doctrines when he was at Athens.

"No Providence th' sceptic will allow;

"Then let the ingrateful mortal tell me how

"By the ram was signified the kingdoms of the Medes and Persians. By the horns the kings who were to succeed to the government of those kingdoms. By the last horn the transcendence of the last king over all his predecessors, in riches and power. By the goat was signified some king of Greece, who should twice overthrow the Persians, and subdue their empire. By the great horn on the forehead of the goat was meant the first of their kings; and by the budding out of four horns more, pointing to the four winds, was to be understood the successors to those kings, and the partition of their dominions after the death of the first, though strangers to the blood; but that nevertheless they should reign for several years. And that in process of time, from among them should arise a king, who should make war upon the Jewish nation, suppress their laws, raze the temple, and put a stop to the exercise of Divine worship for the space of three years." This prophecy was fulfilled under Antiochus Epiphanes.

Interpre-
tion of the vision.

In the same manner this prophet foretold the desolation of our people by the victorious arms of the Roman empire. All these presages he received from Divine revelation, and transmitted them in writing to posterity, as a testimony upon record, of the exact correspondence of the prediction and the event.

Prophecy concerning the Roman empire.

These particulars may serve to establish a veneration for the writings of a man whom God was pleased to honour in so particular a manner. They likewise tend to refute the erroneous opinions of the Epicureans, who deny the superintendency of an overruling Providence, and assert the doctrines of chance and necessity, and that the whole sublunary system is the effect of contingencies, without any primary cause, not subject to the influence of any guide or director. (a) Upon this principle the world would resemble a ship tossed at the mercy of the winds and waves, without a pilot; or a chariot, without a driver, overthrown, through the fury of horses uncurbed, on crags or precipices. So that from the predictions of Daniel before mentioned, I think the ignorance and stupidity of those men will be evident, who dispute the superintendence of a Divine Providence, and assert the absurd doctrine of chance and fatality. To such opinions it will suffice to oppose the most authentic testimonies of the exact correspondence between presages and events, which could never have taken place without the intervention of a supernatural power.

Restoration of the Jews from the Babylonish captivity by means of Cyrus, who, by his bountiful influence, promotes the rebuilding of the city and temple of Jerusalem.

Chron. 36. 1. i.
IN the first year of the reign of Cyrus, king of the Persians, and the seventieth of the captivity of the Jews in Babylon, the Almighty was pleased to commiserate their calamity, and, as he had foretold them, by Jeremiah, the prophet, before the destruction of the city, that, after they had served Nebuchadnezzar and his posterity for seventy years, they should be restored to their own country, see the temple rebuilt, and resume their former state of glory, so he vouchsafed to fulfill his promise in every instance. This was effected through the means of king Cyrus, who sent circular letters throughout all Asia to this purport.

“Thus saith Cyrus, the king, I do fully believe that the Great God, of whose gift and bounty I hold my empire, is the very God whom the children of Israel worship; for I find honourable mention made of my name by his prophets of ancient date, as ■ person who, in time to come, should rebuild Jerusalem, and reinstate the people.”

Cyrus, it seems, had read the prophecies of Isaiah, which bore date two hundred and ten years before he was born, wherein the prophet relates a revelation he had from the Almighty, “That he would raise up one Cyrus to be a king of many and powerful nations, who should re-establish the Hebrews in their native country.” This was foretold by Isaiah an hundred and forty years before the temple was destroyed. The king was so transported upon the reading of these divine predictions concerning himself, that he became earnestly desirous of promoting their accomplishment.

To this end he summoned all the leading men of the Jews to Babylon, and informed them that such of them as were disposed to return to their country, should have passports and permission to rebuild the temple and city of Jerusalem, not doubting but that the Almighty would be propitious to the design. He promised that he would lend orders to all his governors and officers, bordering upon Judæa, to furnish them with gold and silver for the fabric, and beasts for sacrifices.

Encouraged by so generous a proposal, the most eminent of the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, together with the priests and Levites, immediately hastened to Jerusalem. Many of them, however, remained in Babylon, unwilling to quit their possessions. Upon their arrival in Jerusalem, all the king's officers contributed largely towards the promotion of the great works; some in gold, others in silver, and others in cattle. Many attended the discharge of their vows, and the solemnity of oblations, as if they had already entered upon the business of rebuilding the city, and the exercise of their ancient discipline. Cyrus also sent back the holy vessels and utensils that Nebuchadnezzar had taken out of the temple. These were delivered in charge to Mithridates, the king's treasurer, and by him deposited with Abassa, till the temple should be finished, when they were to be restored to the priests and rulers of the people for solemn uses and services. Cyrus then sent an epistle to the governors of Syria, couched in terms to the following import;

Cyrus, the king, to Syfina, and Sarabasan, sendeth greeting.

“Be it known unto you that I have given leave to all the Jews, that are in my dominions, to return into their own country, and there to rebuild their capital city, with the holy temple at Jerusalem, in the same place where it stood before. I have likewise sent my treasurer, Mithridates, and Zerubabel, governor of Judæa, to superintend the building, and see it raised sixty cubits and upwards from the ground, and as many over; the walls to be three rows of polished stone, and one of the wood of the country, together with an altar for

"for sacrifices; and all this to be done at my sole charge. I have also appointed my treasurer, Mithridates, and Zerubbabel, my governor of Judæa, to cause all the utensils and vessels that Nebuchadnezzar carried away from the temple at Jerusalem, to be sent back and restored. Their number is as follows: fifteen golden ewers, and four hundred silver; fifty golden vessels, and four hundred silver; thirty golden chalices, and three hundred silver; thirty golden phials, and two thousand four hundred silver; with a thousand other large vessels, of divers forms, and for divers uses. It is my farther pleasure that they receive entirely to themselves all the profits and revenues that were formerly enjoyed by their predecessors; and that they have an allowance paid them of two hundred and five thousand five hundred drachmas, in consideration of beasts for sacrifice, wine, and oil; and two thousand five hundred measures of wheat, in lieu of fine flour; and all this to be raised upon the tribute of Samaria. The priests alone to offer up the sacrifices, according to the laws and ceremonies of Moses, and to pray daily for the king and the royal family, and for the welfare and happiness of the Persian empire. Let no man presume to do any thing contrary to the tenour of this my royal will and proclamation, on pain of forfeiting both life and possessions."

The number of the Jews that returned from Babylon under Cyrus.

This was the substance of the king's letter; and the number of those that came out of captivity to Jerusalem, upon this invitation and encouragement, amounted to forty-two thousand, four hundred, and sixty-two.

CHAPTER II.

On the death of Cyrus, his son, Cambyfes, is solicited to countermand the order for rebuilding the city and temple of Jerusalem.

The building of the temple is obstructed by the Samaritans.

WHEN the foundations of the temple were laying, and the Jews (a) were wholly bent on the advancement of the undertaking, the bordering nations, and especially the Chuthites, whom Salamanezer, king of Assyria, had formerly transplanted from Persia and Media into Samaria, after he had removed the Israelites into other habitations, applied to the governors, to whom the care of the undertaking was committed, importuning them most earnestly not to suffer the Jews to proceed upon the project of rebuilding the city and the temple. The commissioners were prevailed on, by the force of bribes, and fair promises, to slacken their diligence in the prosecution of their orders; and, during the course of this negligence and delay, Cyrus could not take cognizance of this, being engaged in a war with the Massagetes, in which he lost his life.

Eldras ii.

Upon the death of Cyrus, Cambyfes of course succeeded to the empire. He had an address presented him out of Syria and Phœnicia, and from the Ammonites, Moabites, and Samaritans, signed by Rathymus, historiographer, Semelius, scribe, and the magistrates of Phœnicia and Syria. The tenour of it was to the following purport: "It is fit, O king, you should understand that the Jews, who were carried away to Babylon, are now returned to their former seats, and into our country, where they are busily employed in rebuilding a city that was most deservedly destroyed for seditious practices. They are setting up markets and places of commerce, repairing the walls, and raising up the temple. Know, therefore, that when these things are finished, they will neither pay taxes, or yield allegiance; for they are professed enemies to kings, and will not submit to serve, if once they have it in their power to command. We consider it as the indispensable duty of faithful subjects, to apprize you of the true state of the matter, before it is too late. We beseech you, therefore, to recur to the history of your predecessors, where you will find

(a) After the return from the captivity, the people, in general, came to be called Jews; because, though there were many Israelites among them, yet they chiefly consisted of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin: and though the edict of Cyrus gave

"the Jews, from generation to generation, to have been enemies to regal government; and that this very city was justly laid waste for the daring crime of rebellion. We beg leave to submit these matters to your royal consideration; and add, that, if you suffer them to proceed with the rebuilding of the city, and the finishing of the walls, you will find your communication cut off, with Phœnicia and Cœlo-Syria."

CHAPTER III.

Cambyfes sends orders for putting a stop to the rebuilding of the city and temple. On his demise the Magi retain the government of Persia during one year, when Darius is chosen king.

CAMBYSES, who was of himself naturally averse to the Jews, stood in need of very little incentive to excite him to persecution. After reading, therefore, the remonstrance, and consulting the records of his ancestors, he gave answer to this effect:

"Cambyfes, the king, to Rathymus, historiographer, Semelius, scribe, and the rest of the inhabitants of Samaria and Phœnicia, greeting:

"Upon the reading your letter of address, I have caused the records of former times to be examined, according to your request, and have found your observations, respecting the city, consonant with truth and former experience. The Jews therein appear ever to have been a vindictive, turbulent people, naturally disposed to rebellion; and their kings, in the last extreme, vexatious and tyrannical in the imposition of taxes, as Phœnicia and Cœlo-Syria, in particular, may bear witness against them. On these considerations it is my command that you exert your utmost power to prevent the rebuilding of the city and temple; for, in proportion to the increase of power amongst those people, will the spirit of sedition revive; and as they have revolted against former sovereigns, there is the greatest reason to apprehend they will as audaciously contend against the authority of the present government."

Rathymus and Semelius, having read this epistle mandatory, halted with a considerable body of associates to Jerusalem, and pursuing the king's orders with the utmost rigour, an absolute stop was put to any further proceeding in the work of rebuilding the city and temple, so that it was discontinued for the space of nine years, that is, to the second year of Darius, king of Persia. Cambyfes, after he had reigned six years, and subdued Egypt, died at Damascus, on his return from that expedition. Upon his demise the government rested in the hands of the Magi for the term of a full year, when it was conferred, by the seven Satrapæ, or eminent families of the Persians, with common consent, to Darius, the son of Hytaspes.

CHAPTER IV.

Darius promotes and accomplishes the work of rebuilding the city and temple, against all opposition.

KING Darius, before his exaltation to the throne of Persia, was well affected towards the Jews; and had made a solemn vow, that, if he ever attained to that dignity, he would send all the holy vessels that were in Babylon back again to the temple of Jerusalem. It happened about that time that Zerubbabel, who had been appointed governor of the captive Jews, came from Jerusalem to Darius. There subsisted between them an ancient friendship; so that he was admitted, with two other great officers, to a post of most important trust; an elevation that gratified his utmost ambition.

throne, gave a splendid entertainment, not only to his own courtiers, but the princes and nobility of the Medes and Persians, the general officers of all India and Ethiopia, in fine, of an hundred and twenty-seven provinces. When the entertainment was over, the company retired to rest, as did also the king; but awaking after a short slumber, and finding himself indisposed for sleep, he fell into conversation on divers subjects with the officers of the presence, and told them, at length, that he had some questions to propose, and that to him who could give the most reasonable and satisfactory reply, he would grant the privilege of wearing purple, drinking out of a golden cup, riding in a chariot with a golden harness, possessing the next place to himself in the council, and be considered as one of the blood-royal. He then stated the questions as follow:

Proposes four problems for solution.

1. Is there any thing stronger than wine?
2. What can exceed the strength of kings?
3. What is superior to the power of women?
4. Can any thing surpass truth?

Having thus stated the questions, the king retired, after desiring the officers to weigh them in their minds, and give him their sentiments which amongst the four they thought the most powerful.

The next morning, having summoned the noble company to whom he had given the entertainment the preceding evening, and having seated himself in the place where he usually gave audience, he called upon the officers, severally and publicly, to report their sentiments on the questions proposed.

The strength of wine.

The first who spoke contended for the superior power of wine, and adduced the following argument: "It disturbs the understanding, reduces the greatest monarch to an equality with infancy, gives liberty to the slave, and makes the beggar equal to an emperor. It alleviates and enlivens the hearts of the miserable, relieves every want, gives confidence to the villain, and puts him above the fear of kings. It causes men to disregard their dearest friends, and assault them with as much fury as they would shew to their most deadly enemies. For these reasons I conceive the operation of wine to be most powerful."

The strength of kings.

The second officer argued in favour of the power of kings, in words to this effect: "It cannot be disputed that the Almighty has created man to be so far master over all sublunary things, as to apply them to whatever purposes his inclinations may direct. As all earthly creatures are subservient to man, so kings have authority over men themselves. The sovereigns of these lords of the creation must be allowed an indisputable superiority. Subjects willingly expose themselves to the most imminent dangers of war, and even contend with nature herself, in obedience to the command of a prince, who takes to himself the whole honour and profit of victory. The husbandman, with unremitting toil, cultivates the earth; and his first duty is to supply the king's store with the produce of his grounds. Thus, while the people are fighting and working for him, the sovereign indulges himself in all the luxuries of abundance, security, and ease. He sleeps surrounded by his guards, who dare not close their eyes while their master enjoys that repose; and no other concerns must interrupt that slavery of attendance to which they are indispensably bound. What power then can exceed that of the man to whom the public pays such implicit obedience?"

The strength of women.

After this declamation on the power of kings, Zerubbabel, the principal of the officers to whom the questions had been propounded, maintained the argument in favour of women and truth, and began with the first, as follows: "Neither the force of wine, nor the power of princes, who bind the multitude in a common bond of allegiance, can be denied: but women have incontestably the pre-eminence of these two. Before the king the mother of the king existed. Kings are the gifts of women: women also are the mothers and nurses of those by whom the vineyards are cultivated: they direct our domestic concerns, provide necessary and ornamental coverings for our bodies; and they are so absolutely necessary, that we can neither be

No. 14.

"brought into existence, or support life, without them. When a beautiful woman is before us, we disregard gold and silver, or esteem them only as being the means of obtaining possession of the beloved object. The charms of women compel us to abandon our country, relations, and dearest friends, and to attach ourselves wholly to them. When we have explored the sea and land for things most valuable and curious in nature, do we not congratulate ourselves in the opportunity of presenting our acquisitions to a beloved fair? frequently have I seen the king condescend to receive a blow from his concubine: nay, she has even taken the diadem from his head, and placed it on her own; and, dreading to give her offence, he has submitted to all her caprices, and yielded to her varying humours."

Having said thus much in favour of women to the great admiration of the noble company, Zerubbabel proceeded to the last point in question, which was that of truth. "Neither kings nor women can be put in competition with the power of truth. Admitting the amazing magnitude of the earth, the elevation of the heavens, the astonishing rapidity of the sun's motion, and that the whole is influenced only by Divine Providence, it must follow that the Almighty is just and true, against which nothing can ultimately prevail; for it supercedes every power that can enter the conception of man. Truth alone is perfect and immutable: the advantages we derive from it are not subject to the vicissitudes of fortune, but are pure, irreproachable, and eternal."

The strength of truth, and decision in its favour.

The whole company bestowed the most liberal acclamations on Zerubbabel, and universally acknowledged that he had proved truth to be the only blessing under the sun, not liable to change or diminution. The king, as a testimony of his entire satisfaction, assuring him he would perform his promise, adding, "That, in consideration of his superior understanding, he should enjoy the first place in his esteem, be next in honour to himself, and be adopted a branch of the royal family."

Zerubbabel gains the palm, is applauded by the company and honoured by the king.

Zerubbabel could not but avail himself of so fair an opportunity of reminding the king of a former vow he had made, which was, that, if ever he came to the throne, he would immediately undertake the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the holy temple, and order restitution to be made of all the sacred vessels and utensils that Nebuchadnezzar had taken from thence and carried to Babylon. He therefore thus addressed him: "Since, O king! you have done me the honour of assuring me of your royal favour and esteem, I have now only most humbly to request, that you will be pleased to discharge your vow." The king raised him cheerfully from his bended knees, embraced him, and dispatched mandates to his governors and great officers, to conduct Zerubbabel, and those that were to accompany him, to their journey's end, and to assist him in the rebuilding of the city and temple. He also sent letters, under the royal signet, to the rulers of Phœnicia and Syria, to provide carriages for transporting the cedar to Jerusalem, that was cut down in Libanus, and to give their utmost assistance to the main undertaking. He also gave them in charge to exempt the Jews, that should return out of this captivity, from the burthen of any public tax or duty, and to leave them in full liberty, both as to person and property, without restraint on the one, or tribute on the other. He likewise commanded the Edomites, Samaritans, and people of Coelo-Syria, to restore all those lands to the Jews that were formerly in their possession, and to contribute fifty talents towards erecting the temple, in such way and manner as might seem to them most expedient. Out of his own proper bounty he assigned to them whatever should be found necessary for sacerdotal habits and other articles, for the administration of every ceremony in due order and form. He likewise furnished them with organs to accompany the voices of the Levites, and allotted a certain portion of land for the maintenance of the officers and keepers both of the city and temple, by way of annual pension. In fine, he confirmed every former resolution of Cyrus concerning the restoration of the Jews, and the rebuilding the city and temple of Jerusalem.

General assembly of the Jews at Jerusalem. They build an altar, and offer sacrifices.

When Zerubbabel had met with this gracious reception from the king, he no sooner left his presence, than he returned thanks to the God and giver of all good and perfect gifts, for that degree of understanding by which he had acquired both honour and esteem beyond the rest of his competitors, which he gratefully acknowledged to be the distinguished effects of his Divine bounty; and having concluded his thanksgiving with a prayer for the success of the undertaking, hastened to his countrymen, at Babylon, with the joyful news of their deliverance, and the liberal grants he had obtained from the king. Upon the report of these happy tidings, they immediately joined in an universal thanksgiving for the promise of restoration to their native country. After this solemnity they celebrated a festival of seven days continuance, and indicated every token of joy and transport that they could have possibly done if the day of their redemption had been even the first day of a new life.

The heads of the tribes made choice of those that were to go upon the expedition, providing horses and other beasts of burthen, as well as carriages for their wives and children, and taking with them those troops which Darius had appointed for a convoy. They passed the time of their journey cheerfully, exulting with vocal and instrumental music, and exhibiting every token of rapturous complacency. There was a select number called out from each of the tribes; but, as a particular nomination of them would not only be deemed prolix by the reader, but break in upon the order of my narrative, I shall only give an account of them in general. There were of the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, from twelve years old and upwards, four millions, six hundred and twenty-eight thousand. After these came four thousand and seventy Levites; and a promiscuous multitude of women and children, to the number of forty thousand, seven hundred and forty-two. Of the stock of the Levites there were an hundred and twenty-eight singers, an hundred and ten porters; and of others that served and assisted in the sanctuary, three hundred and twenty-two. There were also six hundred and fifty-two that called themselves Israelites, but could not prove extraction. There were others also who had taken wives, whose genealogy could not be traced either from the Levitical or sacerdotal records; and these were deemed unqualified for the holy function; to the number of five hundred and twenty-five. The train of servants that attended them was computed at seven thousand, three hundred and thirty-seven; singing men and women, two hundred and forty-five; camels four hundred; other beasts of carriage five hundred and twenty-five. The leader of this multitude was Zerubbabel, the son of Salathiel, of the tribe of Judah, and the race of David; and with him was Jesus, the son of Josedec, and Mardocheus and Serabreus, which two were chosen to the command, by the suffrages of the tribes, and contributed, at their own charge, an hundred pound of gold; and five thousand of silver, towards the expence of this expedition. This was the form and order of the procession of the priests and Levites; and that part of the people that went with them on their return from Babylon to Jerusalem, and the rest following after by degrees, till, in the end, they all went back to their own country.

In the seventh month, after their departure from Babylon, Zerubbabel, their leader, and Jesus, the high priest, sent messengers express throughout all the land, to summon a general assembly at Jerusalem. The people repaired thither with the greatest alacrity. Upon this occasion they erected an altar for sacrifice, according to the institution of Moses, and it was raised upon the same spot where it stood before. This proceeding highly offended the neighbouring nations, who had an utter aversion both to the people, their religion, and laws. They also celebrated the feast of tabernacles at that time, as the legislator had ordained. After that followed the daily oblations, and the sacrifice of the sabbaths, and of the new moons of all holy feasts. All those who had made any vow came likewise to perform it, from the first day of the seventh month.

They entered thereupon the rebuilding of the temple, and expended vast sums of money upon the artificers in general, both for materials and sustenance.

The Sidonians generously promoted the undertaking, bringing down cedar-planks in abundance from Libanus, and afterwards stowing them in boats, which they brought into the port of Joppa, as they had been first directed by Cyrus, and after him by Darius.

It was now the second month of the second year, after the return of the Jews, when the foundation of the temple being already laid, they began, on the first day of the second month, with the superstructure, committing the superintendence of it to the whole family of the Levites of twenty years of age and upwards; and likewise to Jesus, the high-priest, with his kindred; and to Zolimiel, the brother of Judea, and son of Aminadab, and to his sons. These exerted themselves with such unremitting assiduity in the discharge of their commissions, that the fabric went on beyond the most sanguine expectations.

When they were advanced thus far, the priests came and officiated in their vestments, with musical instruments; and the Levites, and sons of Asaph, sung some of the hymns of David to the glory of God, according to the first institution. But the priests and the Levites, and the elders of the families, who had seen the splendor and magnificence of the former temple, and reflected how inferior the present was in comparison with it, became disconsolate; while those who had never seen the former, and consequently could not be affected by the disproportion, contented themselves with the present state of things, and rejoiced at the arrival of so happy an event.

When the Samaritans, who were still enemies to the tribes of Judah and Benjamin, heard the sound of trumpets with a confused clamour, they flocked in great numbers to learn the cause of it, and finding it was occasioned by the return of the Jews from their captivity at Babylon, and that they were now at work upon the rebuilding of their temple, they immediately applied to Zerubbabel and Jesus, with the chief of the tribes, desiring that they might be admitted into the undertaking upon terms in common with the rest; observing that "They worshipped the same God, gloried in the same profession, and the love and practice of the same religion, from the days of Salamaneser, king of Assyria, who transplanted them out of Chuthia and Media into this land." The unanimous answer to the request was, that they could not possibly be admitted into any share of the undertaking, because formerly Cyrus, and after him Darius, had assigned the work to their particular conduct and care; but that they should have liberty, if they thought fit, to worship there without exception; and that it should be open to all people indiscriminately, who were disposed to worship the true God in the true manner.

The Chuthites (for so we call the Samaritans) were so incensed at this reply, that they incited the Syrians to remonstrate with the leading men, as they had done first under Cyrus, and then under Cambyfes, in such manner as to cause a stop to be put to the undertaking, by slackening the diligence of those who were entrusted with the superintendence of it. In consequence of this proceeding, there went up, at this time, to Jerusalem, Sisinnus, governor of Syria and Phoenicia, and Sarabazanes, with some others, and demanded of some of the principal men by what authority this temple was to be built? And also, as it had rather the appearance of a castle than a temple, to what end the walls of the city were made so strong, and the gates so fortified. Zerubbabel and Jesus replied that they were the servants of the great God, to whose honour this temple was to be built, and to his service dedicated by the greatest, the happiest, and the wisest prince that ever set on a throne. That it stood firm for many ages, till, in the end, for the wickedness of their forefathers, the city, by Divine permission, was taken by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon and Chaldaea, the temple pillaged and laid in ashes, and the people carried away captive into Babylon. But that when Cyrus came to the government of Persia and Babylon, he commanded, by royal proclamation, the rebuilding of the temple, and restitution of all the vessels and donations that had been taken away by Nebuchadnezzar; which were delivered to Zerubbabel, and his treasurer, Mithridates, to be transported to Jerusalem, and laid up again in the temple there: that, by the command of the same king,

The Samaritans demand of the Jews authority for their undertaking. The Jews reply.

Abaslar

Abassar was sent to that city, to endeavour to expedite the work, and accordingly was present at the laying the foundation; but that ever since that time, by one artifice or another, their enemies had found means to obstruct and retard it; and that, for the truth of these allegations, they might write to Darius, to the end, that, by consulting the public records, it might be known whether or not what they had asserted was a just representation of facts.

Sisinnes and his associates did not think it expedient to interrupt the proceeding without the knowledge of Darius himself, and therefore agreed to write to him immediately upon the subject. The Jews hereupon were very apprehensive that the king, upon this application, would countermand the order he had given; till Aggæus (a) (Haggai) and Zachariah, two prophets, among them at that time, bade them be of good cheer, and fear nothing from the Persians; for they were certainly informed of the Divine will and pleasure touching that important affair. The people were soledated by the encouragement given them by the prophets, that they doubled their diligence, and wrought without the intermission of a single day.

When the Samaritans had written a letter of remonstrance to Darius, objecting to the fortifying of the city, and the erecting of a strong place, that had more the appearance of a citadel than a temple, and produced the epistle of Cambyſes, by which he had forbidden and obstructed it before, as a practice neither profitable nor safe for the public, he gave immediate orders, on the receipt of the letter, that the records should be searched, which being done, a decree was found to the following purport:

"In the first year of the reign of king Cyrus, it was ordained that the temple of Jerusalem should be rebuilt, the height of it to be sixty cubits, and the breadth of the same measure, and that an altar should be constructed within the edifice: that the walls should be formed by three ranges of polished marble, and one range of wood, the produce of the country; and the charge of it defrayed out of the king's treasury: that the sacred vessels, taken into Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, be restored, and placed in such parts of the temple as they were formerly accustomed to be: that the superintendance of the work should be committed to Abassar, governor of Syria and Phœnicia, and his officers; with orders not appear at Jerusalem themselves, but to quit the place, and leave the building of the temple to the Jews, and the chief of their tribes: that they supply them out of the taxes upon the province, and furnish them, for their sacrifices, with oxen, lambs, kids, meal, wine, and whatever else the priests should desire, who were to put their prayers to the Almighty for the welfare and happiness of the king and his people: that whosoever should presume to act contrary to this mandate, be forthwith taken and hanged up, and his goods confiscated to the king's use."

On the discovery of this record, Darius ordered a copy of it to be immediately taken; which being done, he wrote to Sisinnes and his colleagues to this effect:

"King Darius to Sisinnes, governor, Sarabazanes, and the other magistrates, greeting.

"I hereby transmit you a copy of a letter extracted from the records of Cyrus, and it is my royal will and command that you strictly adhere to the directions contained therein."

Sisinnes and his colleagues, understanding the king's resolution, agreed to obey his commands in

(a) Concerning these prophets we refer the reader to those books in the Bible which bear their respective names. They are both thought to have been born at Babylon during the captivity, and both, with united zeal, encouraged the people to go on with the work of the temple. On the accession of Darius to the throne, Haggai, in particular, by reproaching the people for their indolence and insensibility, by telling them that they were careful enough to lodge themselves very commodiously, while the house of the Lord lay buried in its ruins, and by put-every particular point; so that undertaking to assist the Jews, according to the tenor of the mandate, the business was carried on with such unanimity and assiduity, that the building was erected and finished within the space of seven years, according to the prophecies of Haggai and Zachariah, and at the command of kings Cyrus and Darius. In the ninth year of Darius, and the twenty-third day of the eleventh month, which we call Adar, and the Macedonians Dystrus, the priests and Levites, together with the people of Israel, offered, in sacrifice, an hundred bulls, two hundred rams, five hundred lambs, and twelve goats, as sin-offerings for the twelve tribes, in acknowledgment for the blessing of their deliverance from captivity, and their restoration to their former state, and to God's holy worship in a new temple. The priests and Levites had their porters at every gate according to the law, the Jews having erected galleries round about the temple.

The feasts of unleavened bread was near approaching, and in the first month (by the Macedonians called Xanthicus, and by us Nisan) the people assembled from every quarter in the city, where they celebrated that festival with their wives and children, according to the law of their country, and the practice of their forefathers, with all possible solemnity. Upon the fourteenth day of the first month they held the passover, and kept festival for seven days afterwards, offering up sacrifices to God for restoring them to the possession and enjoyment of their native country, and their ancient laws and religion, and for disposing the heart of the king of Persia so favourably towards them. They spared no cost in the celebration of this festival; and having resumed their former power in Jerusalem, adopted an aristocratical form of government; for the sovereign power was lodged in the high-priest, till the Asmodean family, upon a change of affairs, converted it into a monarchy. Before the captivity, for the space of five hundred and thirty-two years, six months and ten days, from the time of Saul and David, they were governed by kings: before that, the administration of their political concerns was in the hands of rulers, called judges, and that form of government continued upwards of five hundred years after the time of Moses and Joshua. This was the state of the Jews on the restoration under Cyrus and Darius.

But the Samaritans, who were still most implacable enemies to the Jews, valuing themselves on the alliance they claimed to the Persians, and being a powerful and rich people, as well as of an haughty and malignant disposition, proved exceedingly vexatious, and exerted their utmost endeavours to annoy and perplex them. By the decree of Cyrus, which was confirmed by that of Darius, the tribute of Samaria had been assigned to the purpose of rebuilding the temple; but the work being now finished, the Samaritans pretended that the end of this assignment was ceased, and therefore refused making any contributions towards defraying the expences of the usual sacrifices.

The dissensions continuing, the senate and people of Jerusalem drew up a memorial of complaint, and deputed Zerubbabel, with four of his colleagues, to present it to Darius. The king of Persia, having duly attended to the subject matter of the memorial, returned them an answer, by the deputies, to the following effect:

"King Darius to Tangar and Sambaba, our governors in Samaria, Sadrack Bobelin, and the rest of the inhabitants, greeting.

"Whereas I am given to understand by Zerubbabel, Ananias, and Mardocheus, on the part of the Jews, that you stand accused of discouraging and ting them in mind that the calamities of drought and famine (wherewith God had afflicted them since their return from their captivity) were owing to their neglect in not repairing the temple, he prevailed with them to set about the work in good earnest; so that, by virtue of these reproofs, and the encouragement they received from Darius after his accession to the throne of Persia, they brought the whole to a conclusion in much shorter time than, in all probability, they would have otherwise done.

This letter put an effectual end to all contests between the Jews and Samaritans, the latter paying the tribute demanded for the service of the temple without farther opposition; and this is the last good office that Darius did the Jews, as he died soon after, universally lamented by his subjects.

CHAP. V.

Called in scripture Artaxerxes.

Xerxes, the son and successor of Darius, is well disposed towards the Jews. Transactions and death of Esdras and Nehemiah.

Xerxes succeeds his father Darius on the throne of Persia.

ON the death of Darius, Xerxes, his son, succeeded to the government: a prince who inherited his father's piety and virtue, and confirmed all that his predecessors had done in favour of the Jews and their religion, being firmly attached to both.

Esdras intends to go to Jerusalem.

Joachim, the son of Jehu, was at this time high-priest. But the name of the high-priest of the Jews, who resided at Babylon, was Esdras, a man of most exemplary piety and justice, and universally beloved and respected by the people. He was so well versed in the Mosaic law, as to stand high in the king's esteem on that account. Upon a resolution formed to go to Jerusalem, and take with him several of the Babylonian Jews, he desired such a letter from the king as might recommend him to the governors and lieutenants of Syria, which he accordingly obtained. It was couched in terms to the following effect:

Esdras 7. Obtains the sanction of Xerxes.

"Xerxes, the king, to Esdras, the priest, and reader of the holy laws of God, greeting:

"Whereas it is decreed by me, and my seven counsellors, that whatever Israelites within my dominions, with their priests and Levites, shall think fit to bear you company to Jerusalem, I have, out of my royal clemency, granted them free liberty to go to Judæa to worship, according to the laws of their country; and likewise to take along with them all the gold and silver, that your people throughout Babylon shall willingly contribute towards that service, for the purchase of sacrifices to offer upon the altar to your God, and for making such vessels of gold and silver, as you and your brethren shall judge meet. It is also my royal will and pleasure, that what is thus given you be dedicated to your God. If you should have occasion for any thing else, use your own discretion, and supply yourself out of the public treasure. To this end I have already written to the commissioners of Syria and Phœnicia, expressly commanding them to furnish whatever Esdras, the priest, and reader of the laws of God, shall desire, without any delay. In order to obtain the Divine blessing on myself and family, I desire to have an hundred measures of wheat dedicated to sacred services, according to the provision of the law. And I do strictly charge and require of the magistrates, that they exact nothing from the priests, Levites, holy singers, or others, attendants on the temple, nor lay any burthens upon them. And I do hereby give you, Esdras, full authority, according to the wisdom you have received from above, to constitute judges to execute justice to all the people throughout Syria and Phœnicia, who understand the law, and are conscientious in the discharge of their duty. At the same time do you instruct the ignorant, to the end that all transgressors against the laws of God may be punished according to their demerit; some with pecuniary fines, and others with death, according to the nature of the crimes, as upon due examination may appear. Farewell."

Upon the receipt of this letter, Esdras acknowledged the Divine goodness, ascribing to the interposition of Providence all the benefits conferred on the Jews through the instrumentality of the king. The people were summoned to a general meeting on this occasion at Babylon, where the letter was read, and a copy of it transcribed, and sent away to be communicated to all the Jews in Media; but Esdras reserved the original. When the Jews understood the piety of Xerxes towards God, and his affection for Esdras in particular, and their nation in general, they not only expressed infinite satisfaction, but hastened in great numbers with their effects to Babylon, with full purpose of returning to Jerusalem. But there was another sort of Israelites, who, being accustomed to the place, and settled in their habitations, chose rather to continue where they were. This is the reason wherefore there are but two tribes to be found in Asia and Europe under the Roman emperor. As to the other ten tribes, they are all planted beyond the Euphrates, and so prodigiously increased in number, as to be almost beyond computation.

The publication of this recommendatory testimonial brought over vast numbers of people to Esdras; not only priests and Levites, but temple-porters, singers, and other attendants appertaining thereunto. He appointed a rendezvous for such as were disposed to return from captivity into their own country at the Euphrates, where, after a three days fast, and offering up solemn vows and prayers for a prosperous voyage (Esdras having declined the guard of soldiers offered him from a reliance on the Divine protection) they began their journey on the twelfth day of the first month, in the seventh year of the reign of Xerxes, and arrived at Jerusalem in the fifth month of the same year, when Esdras immediately delivered out the money he brought to the priests who had the custody of the holy treasure. It amounted to six hundred and fifty talents of silver, an hundred talents of silver vessels, twenty talents of vessels of gold, and twelve talents of fine brass, that was deemed more precious than gold itself. These were the presents of the king and his counsellors, and of the Israelites that continued in Babylon.

When Esdras had acquitted himself of his trust, he offered up burnt-offerings, according to the laws; twelve bulls for the whole people of Israel, seventy-two sheep and lambs, and twelve goats for a sin-offering. He communicated also the king's letter to the governors of Phœnicia and Cœlo-Syria, who held the Israelites in great honour, and readily supplied all their wants, when they found they could not dispense with the king's injunction. These matters were accomplished under the conduct of Esdras, who, doubtless, obtained the Divine favour and protection for his exemplary piety and virtue.

Soon after these happy events, a charge was exhibited to Esdras, that some of the priests and Levites had deviated from the law, and, of course, from their duty, in marrying into foreign families, and thereby polluting the sacerdotal race. Application was made to him at the same time, to support and assert the laws, lest the Divine vengeance should fall upon the whole body of the people for the iniquity of a few. Esdras, upon this complaint, rent his clothes, tore the hair from his head, and cast himself on the ground, despairing of effecting a reform, as the principal men were concerned in this abomination, and it would be in vain for him to lay an injunction on them to part with their wives and children.

Those who retained any sense of piety and humanity, both condoled with him and participated in his afflictions. In this state of despondency he fervently addressed the Almighty, expressing "His shame to look towards heaven, because of the sins that the people had committed, while they had forgotten what their forefathers had undergone on account of their wickedness." He besought "God, who had saved a remnant out of the calamity and captivity they had been in, and restored them again to Jerusalem, and to their own land, and had disposed the hearts of the kings of Persia to have compassion on them, that he would also forgive them the sins they had now committed, which, though they deserved death, yet he might mercifully condescend to remit the punishment due to them."

After Esdras thus expressed his grief for the transgression of his countrymen, and implored the Divine mercy and forgiveness, in the hearing of a promiscuous multitude, there came to him one Jechonias, a leading man in Jerusalem, with a public confession of the crime alledged against them, advising him, at the same time, to adjure all those who had married strange women, contrary to the law, to cast them out, together with their children, upon pain of the severest punishment, on refusal of submission. Esdras approved the counsel; and exacted an oath from the chief of the priests and Levites, and all the principal men of Israel, that they would put away their strange wives, with their children, according to the counsel of Jechonias. When this was over, he went from the temple to the chamber of Joanan, the son of Eliafhib, where he spent the whole day, without taking any sustenance, through an excess of grief and agitation of mind.

He next issued a proclamation, by which all those who were returned from captivity, were enjoined to meet at Jerusalem in the course of two or three days, on the penalty of excommunication, and confiscation to the holy treasury, in case of failure, either through neglect or contempt. Within three days the tribes of Judah and Benjamin assembled, on the twentieth day of the ninth month, called, by the Hebrews, Thebeth, and, by the Macedonians, Apelloeus. When they had placed themselves in the upper part of the temple, the elders being present, Esdras arose, and told them, that, "Whereas they were guilty of an heinous crime, by marrying with strangers, in contempt of the express law of their country; there were no other means of obtaining the Divine forgiveness, and security from the Divine vengeance, than by putting away the strange women with whom they had so intermarried." They unanimously signified compliance with the requisition; but observed, that as their number was great, and the season rigorous, a matter of such importance would require mature deliberation. Upon this suggestion it was proposed, that a commission of enquiry might be issued out to a select number of leading men, who were innocent of the charge in question. The motion passed without a dissentient voice; and, upon the first day of the tenth month, they entered upon the inquiry, which fully employed them till the first day of the month following. Upon the scrutiny, they found numbers of the kindred of Jesus, the high-priest, as well as of other priests and Levites, and the rest of the Israelites, who, having a greater regard to the observance of the law than even to natural affection, immediately put away their wives, and the children born of them. After the solemnity of this abdication, they offered up rams, according to custom, for peace-offerings, so that it is deemed unnecessary to specify either their characters or names. Esdras, upon the whole, produced a general reformation; and established a precedent as an universal rule of conduct for future generations.

At the celebration of the feast of tabernacles, in the seventh month, when a great multitude of the Israelites were assembled in that part of the temple which looks towards the east, Esdras, at their request, read aloud to them the laws of Moses, repeating the same from morning to noon. This public reading tended much to the edification of the hearers, as they were not only thereby taught a line of conduct for present and future observance, but their reflection was directed to the calamities their forefathers had suffered for the violation of those very laws, to which their obedience would have secured to them permanent peace and happiness. Esdras, perceiving them melt into tears at this affecting consideration, advised them to refrain from inordinate sorrows, as incompatible with the present festive occasion, on which they should indulge themselves in innocent mirth; while they retained in their minds such sense of past misdemeanours as to prevent a future relapse. The people, encouraged by his candid and friendly advice, celebrated the feast with cheerful conviviality, and then returned to their own habitations; but not till they had paid most grateful acknowledgments to Esdras for the important reformation he had wrought in a point so essential to the laws and religion of their country. this meritorious service, he lived with honour, and died full of years, and much regretted, at Jerusalem, where he was interred with a solemnity suitable to his sacred character. Joachim, the high-priest, died also about the same time, and was succeeded by his son Eliafhib.

Death of Esdras, and of Joachim, the high-priest.

There was amongst the Jewish captives a certain person whose name was Nehemiah. This person, who was cup-bearer to Xerxes, walking one day near Susa, the metropolis of Persia, overheard some travellers, that were entering the city after a long journey, conversing in the Hebrew language. This excited him to enquire whence they came. Upon their replying from Judaea, he put several questions to them respecting the state of the people and city of Jerusalem; when they gave for answer, that things, in general, were in a bad state, as their walls had been demolished; and the Jews had sustained the greatest injuries from the neighbouring nations, which annoyed them day and night, overrunning and laying waste their country, in so much that great numbers were led captive out of Jerusalem itself, and the roads in the day time were found strewn with dead bodies. Nehemiah burst into tears of commiseration for the calamities of his countrymen, and, in a suppliant posture, humbly enquired of the Almighty, "How long he would be pleased to disregard the miseries of the Hebrew nation, and suffer them to be made the prey and spoil of all men."

Nehemiah's concern for his country.

While he was thus deploring the wretched state of his country, word was brought him, that the king was about to sit down to supper; upon which he hastened, in much disorder and confusion, to attend the duties of his office as cup-bearer. The king, being more cheerful than common after supper, cast an eye upon Nehemiah, and observing his countenance dejected, demanded the cause. Having put up an ejaculatory prayer to heaven to give an energy to his words, he replied to this effect:

His lamentations for their miseries.

"How is it possible for me, O king, to appear otherwise than dejected, when the place of my nativity is laid waste; Jerusalem reduced to an heap of rubbish, the gates burnt, the tombs and monuments of my ancestors broken up, and the ashes of the venerable dead sacrilegiously profaned. Deign thou, O king, to grant the boon I humbly prefer, that I may have your royal permission to repair to Jerusalem to assist in the rebuilding of the walls, and in the remaining work of finishing the temple."

Petition to the king to go to Jerusalem.

The king granted his petition; and having promised him letters recommendatory to the governors of the several provinces through which he was to pass, with orders to treat him with due respect, and supply him with every necessary he might require, dismissed him with an injunction to cast off his melancholy, and proceed in the discharge of the duties of his office with his usual cheerfulness. Nehemiah, upon this gracious reception and assurance, returned himself, and acknowledged the blessing of Providence, that had so remarkably interposed in his favour.

On the following day the king sent for him, and gave him letters of credit and recommendation to Sadæus, governor of Syria, Phœnicia, and Samaria, with instructions to receive and assist him according to promise. He went first to Babylon, and from thence, with as many of his countrymen as voluntarily offered to bear him company, proceeded to Jerusalem, in the twenty-fifth year of the reign of Xerxes; and having first exhibited his credentials to the inspection of his private friends, he delivered them to Sadæus and his colleagues, according to the superscription. He then summoned a general assembly up to Jerusalem, and addressed them in the temple to the following purport:

Nehemiah arrives at Jerusalem, and calls an assembly of the people.

"Ye must see and know, O men of Judea, that we ourselves are, at this day, under the superintending providence of the same Almighty and merciful Being, who brought about so many wonderful events, from a gracious regard to the piety and virtue of our forefathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. I am now to declare to you, that it is through favour of that Being that I have obtained permission of the king to enter on the rebuilding of your walls, and the finishing of the work of the temple."

"interrupting and rebuilding of the temple, and refusing to bear your part in the charge of the sacrifices, which, by my command, you ought to have done: this is to will and require you, upon sight of this letter, forthwith to supply them out of my treasury, in Samaria, with whatever they shall want for the use of their sacrifices and worship, to the end that they may offer up daily prayers and oblations both for myself and for my people."

This letter put an effectual end to all contests between the Jews and Samaritans, the latter paying the tribute demanded for the service of the temple without farther opposition; and this is the last good office that Darius did the Jews, as he died soon after, universally lamented by his subjects.

CHAP. V.

Called in scripture Artaxerxes.

Xerxes, the son and successor of Darius, is well disposed towards the Jews. Transactions and death of Esdras and Nehemiah.

Xerxes succeeds his father Darius on the throne of Persia.

ON the death of Darius, Xerxes, his son, succeeded to the government: a prince who inherited his father's piety and virtue, and confirmed all that his predecessors had done in favour of the Jews and their religion, being firmly attached to both.

Esdras intends to go to Jerusalem.

Joachim, the son of Jehu, was at this time high-priest. But the name of the high-priest of the Jews, who resided at Babylon, was Esdras, a man of most exemplary piety and justice, and universally beloved and respected by the people. He was so well versed in the Mosaic law, as to stand high in the king's esteem on that account. Upon a resolution formed to go to Jerusalem, and take with him several of the Babylonian Jews, he desired such a letter from the king as might recommend him to the governors and lieutenants of Syria, which he accordingly obtained. It was couched in terms to the following effect:

Esdras 7. Obtains the sanction of Xerxes.

"Xerxes, the king, to Esdras, the priest, and reader of the holy laws of God, greeting:

"Whereas it is decreed by me, and my seven counsellors, that whatever Israelites within my dominions, with their priests and Levites, shall think fit to bear you company to Jerusalem, I have, out of my royal clemency, granted them free liberty to go to Judæa to worship, according to the laws of their country; and likewise to take along with them all the gold and silver, that your people throughout Babylon shall willingly contribute towards that service, for the purchase of sacrifices to offer upon the altar to your God, and for making such vessels of gold and silver, as you and your brethren shall judge meet. It is also my royal will and pleasure, that what is thus given you be dedicated to your God. If you should have occasion for any thing else, use your own discretion, and supply yourself out of the public treasure. To this end I have already written to the commissioners of Syria and Phœnicia, expressly commanding them to furnish whatever Esdras, the priest, and reader of the laws of God, shall desire, without any delay. In order to obtain the Divine blessing on myself and family, I desire to have an hundred measures of wheat dedicated to sacred services, according to the provision of the law. And I do strictly charge and require of the magistrates, that they exact nothing from the priests, Levites, holy singers, or others, attendants on the temple, nor lay any burthens upon them. And I do hereby give you, Esdras, full authority, according to the wisdom you have received from above, to constitute judges to execute justice to all the people throughout Syria and Phœnicia, who understand the law, and are conscientious in the discharge of their duty. At the same time do you instruct the ignorant, to the end that all transgressors against the laws of God may be punished according to their demerit; some with pecuniary fines, and others with death, according to the nature of the crimes, as upon due examination may appear. Farewell."

Upon the receipt of this letter, Esdras acknowledged the Divine goodness, ascribing to the inter-

position of Providence all the benefits conferred on the Jews through the instrumentality of the king. The people were summoned to a general meeting on this occasion at Babylon, where the letter was read, and a copy of it transcribed, and sent away to be communicated to all the Jews in Media; but Esdras reserved the original. When the Jews understood the piety of Xerxes towards God, and his affection for Esdras in particular, and their nation in general, they not only expressed infinite satisfaction, but hastened in great numbers with their effects to Babylon, with full purpose of returning to Jerusalem. But there was another sort of Israelites, who, being accustomed to the place, and settled in their habitations, chose rather to continue where they were. This is the reason wherefore there are but two tribes to be found in Asia and Europe under the Roman emperor. As to the other ten tribes, they are all planted beyond the Euphrates, and so prodigiously increased in number, as to be almost beyond computation.

The publication of this recommendatory testimonial brought over vast numbers of people to Esdras; not only priests and Levites, but temple-porters, singers, and other attendants appertaining thereunto. He appointed a rendezvous for such as were disposed to return from captivity into their own country at the Euphrates, where, after a three days fast, and offering up solemn vows and prayers for a prosperous voyage (Esdras having declined the guard of soldiers offered him from a reliance on the Divine protection) they began their journey on the twelfth day of the first month, in the seventh year of the reign of Xerxes, and arrived at Jerusalem in the fifth month of the same year, when Esdras immediately delivered out the money he brought to the priests who had the custody of the holy treasure. It amounted to six hundred and fifty talents of silver, an hundred talents of silver vessels, twenty talents of vessels of gold, and twelve talents of fine brass, that was deemed more precious than gold itself. These were the presents of the king and his counsellors, and of the Israelites that continued in Babylon.

When Esdras had acquitted himself of his trust, he offered up burnt-offerings, according to the laws; twelve bulls for the whole people of Israel, seventy-two sheep and lambs, and twelve goats for a sin-offering. He communicated also the king's letter to the governors of Phœnicia and Cœlo-Syria, who held the Israelites in great honour, and readily supplied all their wants, when they found they could not dispense with the king's injunction. These matters were accomplished under the conduct of Esdras, who, doubtless, obtained the Divine favour and protection for his exemplary piety and virtue.

Soon after these happy events, a charge was exhibited to Esdras, that some of the priests and Levites had deviated from the law, and, of course, from their duty, in marrying into foreign families, and thereby polluting the sacerdotal race. Application was made to him at the same time, to support and assert the laws, lest the Divine vengeance should fall upon the whole body of the people for the iniquity of a few. Esdras, upon this complaint, rent his clothes, tore the hair from his head, and cast himself on the ground, despairing of effecting a reform, as the principal men were concerned in this abomination, and it would be in vain for him to lay an injunction on them to part with their wives and children.

Those who retained any sense of piety and humanity, both condoled with him and participated in his afflictions. In this state of despondency he fervently addressed the Almighty, expressing "His shame to look towards heaven, because of the sins that the people had committed, while they had forgotten what their forefathers had undergone on account of their wickedness." He besought "God, who had saved a remnant out of the calamity and captivity they had been in, and restored them again to Jerusalem, and to their own land, and had disposed the hearts of the kings of Persia to have compassion on them, that he would also forgive them the sins they had now committed, which, though they deserved death, yet he might mercifully condescend to remit the punishment due to them."

But taking it for granted, that neighbouring nations are not only averſe to, but determined to counteract you in the deſign, I commend it to you, in the firſt place, to rely ſolely on the power of the Almighty, who will certainly defeat all the efforts of your enemies; and next, that you exert yourſelves in the proſecution of the work night and day, without intermiſſion, while the ſeaſon affords opportunity.

Nehemiah further the undertaking

Having delivered this addreſs, he gave orders to the magiſtrates to ſurvey the ground, take meaſure of the walls, and, from due computation, make an equal diſtribution of the work amongſt the people, according to the proportions of the inhabitants in city, town, or village, promiſing, at the ſame time, the aſſiſtance of himſelf, and all that belonged to him, in the ſervice, and then diſcharged the aſſembly.

The Israelites called Jews the firſt time.

The authority of Nehemiah had ſuch an effect upon the people, that they applied themſelves moſt aſſiduously to the undertaking. From this time the country was called Judea; and ſo termed from the tribe of Judah, that formerly poſſeſſed that quarter of the world.

The deſign is counteracted by enemies.

The report of this undertaking no ſooner reached the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Samaritans, and the Cœlo-Syrians, than they determined to leave nothing unattempted, either by force or treachery, to counteract it. Accordingly they lay in ambuſh for the Jews up and down in every quarter, and took off many of them by ſurprize. They kept aſſaſſins in pay to attempt the life of Nehemiah; and alarmed the multitude with menaces of invaſion to ſuch a degree, that, through apprehenſion of impending danger, they were ready to deſiſt from their work. But Nehemiah maintained his ground with undaunted reſolution, and, under the ſecurity of a ſlender guard, proſecuted the work, without ſenſe of wearineſs, or apprehenſion of danger. Nor was he anxious for his own ſafety merely in the proviſion of a guard for his perſon; but it aroſe from an aſſurance that if he ſhould be cut off, the men would never finiſh the building. He therefore ordered that, in future, all the men ſhould work with their ſwords by their ſides, and their bucklers at a convenient diſtance, to have them in readineſs. He alſo appointed trumpeters to be poſted within five hundred paces of each other, to give the alarm upon any diſcovery of an enemy, that the people might have time to ſtand to their arms, without any danger of a ſurprize. He went round the city almoſt every night, and became ſo inured to labour, abſtinence, and watching, that he ſurmounted all thoſe difficulties, taking of food and ſleep no more than was requiſite to ſupport nature. This was the courſe of his life for two years and three months; at the expiration of which the walls were finiſhed, in the twenty-eighth year and ninth month of the reign of Xerxes.

The walls are finiſhed in ſpite of all oppoſition.

Upon the perfecting of the work, Nehemiah, and the people, offered up ſacrifice, and kept a feſtival for eight days; an event highly unwelcome and diſpleaſing to the Syrians. Nehemiah, obſerving that the city was thin of inhabitants, perſuaded all the prieſts and Levites, who lived contiguous, to take up their reſidence in town, promiſing to furniſh them with houſes at his own expence. He likewiſe ordered people in the country, who followed huſbandry, to carry their tents into the city, for the maintenance of the prieſts and Levites, that they might not be diverted by any worldly concerns from attending the duties of their office. This was readily agreed to; and by theſe means the city became better peopled.

Nehemiah takes meaſures to people the city.

After theſe and many other great and glorious actions, worthy of eternal honour, Nehemiah, in an advanced age, departed this life. He was a man of unfeigned piety, ſtrict probity, and unſullied virtue; eminent for genuine philanthropy and patriotiſm, as appears from the whole of his tranſactions reſpecting the people and city of Jeruſalem. This may ſuffice as a brief narrative of events during the reign of Xerxes.

Death and character of Nehemiah.

C H A P. VI.

Cyrus, otherwise Artaxerxes, ſealed in ſcripture Ahaſuerus, ſucceeds his father.

Xerxes is ſucceeded by his ſon Artaxerxes, under whoſe reign the nation of the Jews was in danger of being extirpated. Particulars concerning Eſther, Mordecai, &c.

ON the death of Xerxes, the government deſcended to his ſon Cyrus, whom the Greeks call Artaxerxes, in whole reign over the Perſians, the whole nation of the Jews, with their wives and children, were in great danger of being deſtroyed, as we ſhall ſhew in due time and place. It is neceſſary that we ſhould previously attend to ſome particulars that related to the king himſelf, concerning his marriage with a woman of the blood royal of the Jews, and who is repreſented in the annals of hiſtory as the protectreſs of our nation.

When Artaxerxes had aſcended the throne, and ſettled the government of an hundred and twenty-seven provinces, between India and Ethiopia, he made a molt magnificent and ſumptuous entertainment at Suſa, in the third year of his reign, where he regaled his noble gueſts, in a manner becoming the dignity of ſo great a monarch, during the term of an hundred and fourſcore days. After this he prepared another entertainment for ſeveral foreigners and their ambafſadors, for ſeven ſucceſſive days, which was conducted in the following manner. There was a tent erected, upon gold and ſilver pillars, covered with purple and finelinen, and ſufficiently capable for the reception of ſome thouſands of people. The wine was ſerved in golden cups, ornamented with precious ſtones in ſuch a manner, as at once to excite curioſity, and afford exquisite delight. Orders were given to the ſervants not to ply the gueſts with wine inceſſantly, after the Perſian cuſtom, but permit every man to drink at liberty; and proclamation was made throughout the king's dominions, that they ſhould ſet a certain number of days apart for the celebration of a feſtival for the ſafety and proſperity of the kingdom.

Artaxerxes makes a ſplendid entertainment at Suſa.

The pomp and order of the feſtival.

Queen Vaſhti alſo had her apartments in the palace. She was ſo remarkably beautiful, that the king, deſirous of ſhewing her to his gueſts, ſent for her to come into the grand chamber, where they were convened. But as the laws of Perſia do not allow wives to be ſeen by any beſides their domeſtics, from a regard to that prohibition ſhe reſuſed to go to the king, not only once, but perſiſted in the denial, notwithſtanding ſeveral orders brought her by the eunuchs to the ſame purpoſe. The king was ſo incenſed at this obſtinacy, that, after the feſtival was over, he ſent for the commiſſioners that were expreſſly appointed for the interpretation of the Perſian laws, to adviſe him in what manner he ſhould puniſh the contumacy and obſtinacy of his queen, complaining that ſhe had not only once, but repeatedly diſobeyed his commands. One of them, whoſe name was Muchæus, gave it as his opinion, "That it was not only an indignity offered to royal authority, but a precedent of dangerous conſequence to all his ſubjects, ſince other women might thereby be encouraged to contemn and diſobey their huſbands; and that therefore ſo heinous an offence ſhould be puniſhed with a proportionable degree of ſeverity; in fact, with nothing leſs than baniſhment from the king's preſence for ever, by virtue of his royal will and pleaſure, publiſhed by proclamation." The king was ſo divided between the love he bore the queen, on the one hand, and the regard he had for his dignity, on the other, that he remained ſome time in a ſtate of moſt tormenting ſuſpenſe. While he was in this anxiety of thought, his counſellors endeavoured to divert him from the reſolution of making himſelf miſerable for the unprofitable love of one woman, while he might make his choice from a collection of the firſt beauties through the ſeveral provinces of his dominions, and ſelect her as a wife to whom, in a general view, he ſhould find the warmeſt attachment.

The queen diſobeys the king's command.

He adviſes with his counſellors upon the execution.

Is adviſed to diſcover the queen.

The king, on ſecond thought, approved the advice, and immediately diſpatched commiſſioners throughout his dominions, to ſelect the moſt celebrated beauties they could find, and bring them up to him. The commiſſioners were very diligent in the execution of their charge, and, amongſt others, diſcovered a virgin in Babylon, whoſe name was Eſther. Her parents being dead, ſhe was brought up in the houſe of her uncle Mordecai, a man of rank amongſt the Jews. This virgin ſo far excelled the reſt, for the beauties and graces of her perſon, that ſhe was an object of general attraction and admiration. She was committed to the care of one of the eunuchs, treated with all poſſible delicacy and reſpect, and preſented with eſſences, perfumes, and all curioſities of of art used by the sex, as ornamental embellishments. Thus was Esther, together with four hundred virgins, treated, for the space of six months, in which, being prepared for the king's bed, they were individually and separately introduced by the eunuch to the king, who having received them into his arms, sent them by the same eunuch.

When Esther was presented, he was so transported with the charms of her person, the elegance of her deportment, and the allurements of her conversation, that he immediately resolved to take her to wife; and the nuptials were accordingly celebrated in the seventh year of his reign, and the twelfth month, which is called Adar, with the greatest pomp and magnificence. A most splendid entertainment was given upon the occasion to the great men of the Medes and Persians, and other nations, for the space of a whole month. When the queen entered the royal palace, the king placed the crown upon her head, and treated her in every respect worthy of her dignified situation, wholly regardless of her country or extraction. Her uncle Mordecai removed from Babylon to Susa; and would often enquire, at the gate of the royal palace, concerning the welfare of Esther, who was as dear to him as his own child.

The king, at this time, caused a law to be enacted, prohibiting any of his domestics from approaching him while he sat upon his royal throne, unless they were called or sent for, upon pain of losing their heads; and there were officers appointed to be in readiness to exact the penalty. In the mean time he had a golden sceptre in his hand; and when he was disposed to pardon any who had transgressed the law so enacted, he held that sceptre forth; and, upon their touching it, they were exempted from the penalty.

There was formed, some time after this, a conspiracy between Bigathar and Teresh, two attendant eunuchs, against the person of the king. Barnabazabuz, a servant to one of them, and a Jew by extraction, discovered their treacherous design to Mordecai, the king's uncle, and he, by means of Esther, to the king himself, who put the criminals to the question, and, upon conviction, delivered them both up to justice. The king gave Mordecai no other reward than that of appointing his service to be registered upon the record, and allowing him admittance to the palace, with the privilege of one of his domestics.

Haman, the son of Ammedath, an Amalekite, being now advanced by the king, and coming frequently to court, the Persians, as well as strangers, paid him the greatest reverence; indeed, it was the king's will and pleasure that it should be so. Mordecai was the only person that refused to do him the homage, that mode of respect being contrary to the practice of his country. This exasperated the haughty Amalekite to such a degree, that he asked him what countryman he was; and finding him to be a Jew, he broke out into a violent exclamation at the insolence of such a wretch, who, when all the nations, and the free-born Persians, made no hesitation at doing him the honour commanded by the king, he should presume to disobey. In this fit of rage he took the desperate resolution not only to be revenged on Mordecai, but to destroy the whole race of Jews in the dominions of Persia. He might, indeed, be farther induced to carry his design into execution, by recollecting that his ancestors, the Amalekites, had been formerly beaten out of the land, and exterminated by those people. To perpetrate his malicious design, he attended the king, according to usual custom, and took an opportunity of representing the Jews to him in the most odious and contemptible light, exclaiming against them as a vile generation, unfociable in their disposition, barbarous in their manners, devoted to superstitious laws and ceremonies, lurking up and down in every quarter of his dominions, and, upon the whole, discovering themselves, in every instance of word and deed, the common enemies of mankind. He begged leave, therefore, to observe, that such being their known character, it was inconsistent with the rules of policy to allow them any further toleration. He then submitted to the king's wisdom the propriety, nay the necessity, of extirpating them out of the Persian empire: and lest the loss of so many subjects should be thought to diminish the king's revenue, he proposed making up the defect out of his own private fortune.

The king was prevailed on, by the artful insinuations of this wicked and arrogant favourite, to submit the disposal of the Jews to his entire discretion, and, at the same time, dispense with his promise of making up the deficiency of the revenue, which was estimated, in the treasury account, at forty thousand talents of silver. Haman, thus authorized, immediately published an edict, in the king's name, and dispersed it throughout all his dominions, to this effect:

"The great king Artaxerxes to the hundred and twenty seven governors of the provinces between India and Ethiopia, greeting.

"Whereas it hath pleased God to give me the command of so many nations, and a dominion over the rest of the world as large as I myself desire: being resolved to do nothing that may be tyrannical or grievous towards my people, and to bear a gentle and easy rule over them, with an eye more especially to the preservation of their peace and liberties, and to settle them in a state of tranquillity and happiness not to be shaken: all this I have taken into mature deliberation; and being given to understand, by my trusty and well-beloved friend and counsellor Haman, a man of tried faith, prudence, and justice, and whom I esteem above all others, that there is a mixture of inhuman people among my subjects, who take upon them to govern by their own laws, and to prescribe ways to themselves, in contempt of public order and government; men, depraved both in their customs and their manners, and enemies not only to monarchy, but to the methods of our royal administration: This is therefore to will and require, that, upon notice, given you by Haman, (who is to me a father), of the persons intended by this my proclamation, you put all the said persons, men, women, and children, to the sword, without any commiseration or favour, in strict pursuance of my decree. And it is my further command, that you put this in execution on the thirteenth day of the twelfth month of the present year, to make but one day's work of the destruction of all mine and your enemies, in order to the future peace and security of our lives."

A decree for the extirpation of the Jews. Esther. iii.

This edict was rapidly dispersed throughout the whole empire; and the people prepared themselves accordingly for the abolition of the Jews, on the day appointed; but the inhabitants of Susa, the place of the king's residence, were particularly strenuous for carrying it into execution. The king and his favourite, in the mean time, passed their hours in conviviality; while the few humane amongst the Persians shuddered at the idea of so horrid a massacre as that approaching.

When Mordecai was informed of the tenor and purport of this proclamation, he rent his garments, put on sackcloth, covered his head with ashes, and passed through the streets of the town, exclaiming against the flagrant iniquity of this horrid and barbarous design against the Jews. In this manner he proceeded till he came to the gate of the palace, where he was obliged to stop, no man being permitted to enter in such a garb. Mordecai's example was followed by all the Jews in the several cities within the Persian dominions, who, upon notice of the king's decree, were overwhelmed with despair.

Lamentation of Mordecai for the Jews. Esther. iv.

Intelligence of this reaching the queen, (who was a stranger to the decree being passed), she was greatly affected thereby, and sent a messenger to Mordecai, entreating him to lay aside that mournful habit, and resume the dress that was consistent with his situation. But he told the messenger he could not comply with the queen's request, till the cause of his melancholy appearance was removed. In consequence of this answer, the queen sent Hetach, one of the king's eunuchs, who was at that time in her presence, to learn the reason of Mordecai, wherefore he assumed such an appearance, and refused to put it off at her particular request. Mordecai then related the whole transactions in due form and order, setting forth that the king, at the instigation of Haman, had issued his royal proclamation, throughout all his dominions, for the extirpation of the Jews, and that Haman had offered ferred a vast sum of money, by way of compensation, to induce him to do it. He then gave Hethach a copy of the decree to deliver to the queen, imploring that she would make an humble application to the king, and intercede with him in their behalf, as the lives of the whole nation were now at stake. He represented the necessity of waving delay, as Haman was incessantly calumniating the Jews, and would continue to exasperate the king against them till he had gained his point.

This account was faithfully delivered by the eunuch to the queen, who immediately returned an answer to Mordecai, in which she excused herself from engaging in the affair, setting forth that an ordinance had been passed, inhibiting any person, whether man or woman, on pain of death, from approaching the king when seated on his throne of state, without being called to attend him, unless he would vouchsafe to hold forth his golden sceptre. When Mordecai heard this, he pressed the queen once again, by the same messenger, representing, that it was not her own personal safety that was in question, but the security of the whole race; and admonishing her by no means to neglect the least opportunity of performing an office incumbent on her by every relative tie, and every dictate of humanity. He further intimated his reliance on the Divine interposition in behalf of a people who were unjustly condemned to death by the vile artifices of an arrogant and ambitious man.

This message roused Esther, who immediately dispatched the eunuch to Mordecai with this order and promise, that he, and all the Jews in Susa, should fast for three days, as would herself and servants, and offer up their humble supplications to the Almighty, that he would be pleased to prosper her in so hazardous an undertaking; at the expiration of which she would not fail to address the king, though at the hazard of her life. Mordecai duly attended to the queen's instructions, and having circulated the same amongst the Jews, they strictly observed the fast, and humbly besought the Almighty to defeat the malicious designs of their enemies, to extend his mercy according as he was wont to penitent offenders, and finally deliver them from the destruction denounced against them. The whole multitude joined, indeed, in one common address, imploring the Almighty to vouchsafe them his protection, and avert that dreadful judgment from the Israelites that now hung over their heads. Queen Esther also humbled herself before God after the manner of her country, prostrating herself on the earth, assuming a mourning habit, abstaining from every sensual gratification for three days, and imploring the Divine interposition in her behalf, that the king might be disposed to attend to her intercession for a miserable and persecuted people, so that it might prevail, to the confusion of their enemies, and all their malicious designs upon her distressed countrymen.

After three days thus spent in fervent supplication for the Divine mercy and compassion, the queen put on her royal attire, and, with two attendants, bearing up her train, advanced towards the king, her face being covered with a blush expressive both of majesty and grace, though, at the same time, not without some indication of doubtful apprehension. The dazzling lustre of the king seated on his throne, and an imagination that his countenance expressed displeasure, so affected the gentle Esther, that she immediately fell into a swoon, and would have sunk to the ground, had she not been supported by her attendants. The king, alarmed at her situation, descended from his throne, embraced her in his arms, and, in tenderest phrase, consoled her with an assurance that no advantage should be taken of the law to her prejudice, though she came uncalled; that decree extending only to subjects, and consequently not to her, whom he esteemed as the partner of his empire. He then laid his golden sceptre gently on her neck, as a token of his affection, as well as confirmation of the assurance he had so lately given. These tender proofs of love and esteem brought her back to the use of her reason and speech, when she explained to the king the cause of her swoon, which arose from the impression of the awful appearance of his sacred person, and an apprehension that his countenance expressed displeasure. These words were uttered in such a tone of voice, and accompanied by such a disposition of feature, as afforded a most lively representation of her sensibility, and thereby acted so compulsively on the king, that, in the most explicit terms, he bade her prefer her request, declaring he would grant it, even if it was one half of his kingdom.

Upon this declaration Esther told him, all she desired, at present, was that he would be pleased to come to a banquet with her that day, and that he would permit Haman to accompany him. Her suit was granted; they came together, and when the entertainment was nearly over, with which the king expressed the highest satisfaction, he again asked Esther what request she had to make, repeating his former promise, that whatever it should be, he would grant it, though it were half his kingdom. The queen, not thinking this a proper time to open the secret to the king, told him, that her desire, at present, was no more than that he would honour her the next day at a like entertainment, accompanied by Haman, when she would take the freedom to present her petition. The king was highly pleased with the proposal; but the distinguished honour conferred upon Haman, being invited to accompany the king to the queen's banquet, so increased his pride and ambition, that he expected nothing less than a respect and homage to be paid him as the second person in the kingdom. Nor were his expectations ill-founded, except in the person of Mordecai, who, as he passed him at the palace gate, on his return, neglected to pay him obedience. As soon as he got home, he recounted to his family, and particularly to his wife Zeresh, the many instances of esteem he had received, not only from the king, but likewise the queen, having been at a banquet provided by the latter, and that the next day he was to be present at a like invitation, accompanying the king as before.

He could not, however, forbear complaining of the affront and disrespect which Mordecai had put upon him; and advising with Zeresh, his wife, and his relations and friends, concerning the manner in which he should chastise his insolence, they proposed to him, as the best expedient, to order a gibbet to be erected fifty cubits high, and the very next morning go to the king, and obtain a grant for the execution of Mordecai upon it. This advice was perfectly agreeable to Haman, who, imagining the king would not refuse his request, gave orders for the gibbet to be immediately erected.

But that Omniscient Being who disposes of all events, was pleased to direct things in such a manner, as to frustrate the design of the proud and cruel Haman; for, when he went to court the next morning, he found matters turn out very different to what he expected. It happened that the king that morning awoke much sooner than usual, and not being able to compose himself again to sleep, in order to pass the time in some degree profitable, as well as entertaining, he ordered his secretary to bring the memorials and state papers, as well ancient as modern, and read their respective contents. The king found, upon the reading them, the name of a person who had great honours and possessions given him as a reward for a glorious and memorable action; also of another, who obtained the bounty of his prince for his fidelity. The secretary proceeded till he came to the passage which made mention of Mordecai's discovery of the conspiracy of the two eunuchs, Bigthar and Teresh, against his person; and when the king, upon enquiry, was given to understand, that the man, for so signal a service, had not received any reward, he seemed exceedingly angry, and commanded the secretary to stop at that record, and enquire of the centinels what hour it was. Answer being brought that it was break of day, he demanded to know who waited without, and being told Haman, ordered him to be called in, and, upon his entrance, thus addressed him: "From a persuasion of your loyal attachment to my person and government, I would ask of you what token of honour you would advise me to bestow on the man to whom I have the greatest obligation imaginable, and that conscientiously with the dignity of my royal character?" Haman, not doubting but his own interest was concerned in the solution of the question, presuming that he alone must be the person referred to, gave it as his opinion, that he

QUEEN ESTHER fainting before KING ARTAXERXES

King ARTAXERXES presenting to MORDECAI the RING which he had formerly entrusted with the treacherous Haman, as a token of his royal Favours.

the king should clothe the man whom he desired to honour with his own royal apparel, mount him on his own horse, present him with a golden chain, and cause an herald to make proclamation throughout the city, "Thus shall be done to the man whom the king vouchsafes to honour."

No sooner had Haman delivered his opinion, than the king, quite contrary to his expectation, commanded him to take the horse, apparel, and chain, find out Mordecai, the Jew, array him in this attire, and when mounted, to march before him, making proclamation in quality of an officer; because, as the king's favourite, he was the fittest man to advise with, and to execute his own counsel. He concluded that Mordecai merited these honours, since to him he was indebted for his life.

This order cut the imperious Haman to the very heart, as it was so contrary to his expectation, his thoughts having been wholly employed on his own advancement. But the king's word was a law, and he knew there was no disputing it. Being, therefore, obliged to comply, he went with the horse, habit, and golden chain, in quest of Mordecai, and finding him at the palace gate, in his garb of humiliation, bade him divest himself of the sackcloth, and put on the purple. The Jew, ignorant of what had passed, imputed this parade of ceremony to mockery, and reprobated Haman as an hard-hearted, intolerant wretch, who delighted to sport with the miseries of mankind. But Haman reasoned with him on the matter, and at length convinced him that the king had commanded this honour to be done him, in recompence of the service he had rendered him, in detecting the conspiracy of the eunuchs, and thereby saving his life. Being thus satisfied, he put on the purple and the golden chain, mounted the king's horse, and paraded through the city, Haman making proclamation before him, "Thus shall it be done to the man whom the king desireth to honour." Mordecai, after this, was ushered into the royal presence, while Haman departed to his own house, stung with vexation, disappointment, and despair, being assured, from the late transactions, that all his efforts to avenge himself on the Jews would prove fruitless, as the king had thus received Mordecai into his immediate favour and protection.

While Haman was relating these doleful tidings to his family, lamenting the disappointment and great mortification he had met with, in being forced to pay to signal an honour to his most hated enemy, the queen's eunuchs came to call him away to supper. One of them, whose name was Sabuchades, observing a gibbet erected in the court, asked one of the servants the meaning of it, and being told it was prepared for Mordecai, for whose execution Haman had obtained permission of the king, he rested apparently satisfied.

When the king and Haman were set down to the banquet, and highly pleased with their entertainment, the king asked Esther again what her request was, at the same time renewing his promise that he would not fail to grant it her, though it should extend to the half of his kingdom. The queen, availing herself of this opportunity, with blushing modesty, represented to the king, "That her petition was for the security of her own life, and the lives of her people, as there was a plot laid against them; for their general destruction. Had they (she observed) been made slaves, that calamity might have been tolerable; so that her suit was, that he would be graciously pleased to interpose, and avert the imminent extirpation of the whole race."

The king no sooner heard Esther's petition, than he asked, with great emotion, who it was that durst put such a design on foot? The queen, without prevarication, replied, that Haman was the author of that advice, and that it proceeded from the impulse of malice to the people. The king, rising up in a great passion, immediately left the apartment, and retired into the garden, in order to give vent to his resentment. Haman, by this time finding the storm gathering, took the opportunity of the king's absence for supplicating the queen for his life, acknowledging his error, and prostrating himself on the bed (a) before her in the most humiliating manner. At this juncture the king returned, and seeing Haman in such a position, was more exasperated by that circumstance than all the rest, and reviled him as the basest of men, for so insolent an attempt on the honour of his queen. The eunuch then informed the king of the gibbet of fifty cubits in height, which, by order of Haman, was erected for the execution of Mordecai, as he was made to understand by one of his servants when he went to give him an invitation to the queen's banquet. The king immediately fixed a resolution of inflicting the same punishment upon Haman that he had prepared for Mordecai, and ordered him immediately to be executed upon the same gibbet.

I cannot pass over this extraordinary event without a comment on the infinite justice, wisdom, and power of the Almighty; not only in bringing Haman to deserved punishment, but causing him to fall by the very snare he had laid for the life of an innocent man, and thereby justly retaliating so execrable a design on the base inventor.

This was the end of the imperious Haman, who had so flagrantly perverted the king's peculiar favour and bounty. His body was delivered up to justice, and his wide estate given to the queen, who appointed Mordecai her steward. The queen had, by this time, made it known to the king, that Mordecai was her near relation; upon which he sent for him, and delivered him the ring with which Haman had been entrusted before. The possessions of Haman, which the king had granted to the queen, she transferred to Mordecai; and then presented a second petition to her royal consort, that he would be pleased to deliver the Jews from that apprehension for their lives which still prevailed, reminding him of the edict which Haman had dispersed, in his name, throughout the empire, and enforcing her request, by declaring that her own life depended upon the safety of her nation. The king gave her his royal word, that nothing should be done to the Jews without her knowledge. He farther granted her the liberty of drawing up any decree or mandate in his name, with assurance that the same should be signed, sealed, and dispersed, by his command, throughout his dominions; which, when confirmed by the royal signature, their authority would be unquestionable. Upon this he commanded the attendance of his secretaries, and enjoined them to draw up the following mandate in behalf of the Jews, to the magistrates of all the provinces that lie between India and Ethiopia, under the command of an hundred and twenty-seven governors.

"Artaxerxes, the great king, to our trusty governors and magistrates, greeting.

"Whereas it is too general a practice for men, whose fortune hath been greater than their merit, to insult both their inferiors and benefactors, and to extinguish, as far as lies in their power, all sense of gratitude and benevolence, and likewise to pervert the power vested in them, and this under such guises as they vainly imagine can elude the penetration of the Great Searcher of Hearts; nor is it any new matter for favourites, by misrepresentation of men and things, to gratify their private passions to the injury of their masters, and thus endanger the lives of honest men by their ill offices with the prince: this I declare, not only on the credit of historical report, but on perfect demonstration within my own knowledge. For the future, therefore, let no regard be paid to slanderous accusations, but let facts be carefully enquired Mordecai is honoured by the king. Esther viii.

The mandate of Artaxerxes for rescinding the former law against the Jews.

(a) In all the eastern nations, even to this day, the people lie on a couch while they eat; and Esther being at that time in the same position, Haman took the opportunity of prostrating himself before her, and, according to the custom of the Persians, embraced her feet. It cannot be imagined that Haman could, at such a time, attempt to violate the chastity of the queen; but the resentment of Artaxerxes was then so great, that he had laid hold of this circumstance, in order to give a plausible colour to what he intended to do. In the Book of Esther it is said Haman's face was covered, which was consistent with the practice of the east, from the most early ages of time; for when a criminal was brought before a judge or his sovereign, to receive sentence, his face was always covered, lest the natural emotions of his grief should operate too strongly in his favour.

"into, and let full proof of the innocence or guilt of the party acquit or condemn.

"You are not unacquainted with Haman's not being a Persian, but an Amalekite by extraction, nor how affectionately I have treated, and what honour done this man, having called and regarded him as my father, and ordering my subjects to obey him next to myself. Now his pride had induced him to depart from his duty, and prompted him to think of succeeding to the government, by the destruction of Mordecai, to whom I owe my life; and even by the destruction of the queen; the end of his plot being to usurp my authority, when his plans against the lives of my friends had succeeded.

"And whereas the designs of this wicked man to destroy the Jews are notorious, I hereby certify that, far from finding them seditious, I approve of them as people worshipping that God to whom I and my family owe the possession and support of our dominions.

"These letters are therefore to command that you do not exercise or put in force that severity on the Jews as commanded by Haman, whom, as a sacrifice to justice, I have caused to be executed on a gibbet before the gates of Susa.

"And I further command that copies of these letters be transmitted throughout my dominions, and that you afford them help against those who may oppress them.

"And as the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, that is to say, the month Adar, is fixed for the extirpation of these people, it is my royal will and pleasure, that you now fix on this time as the moment of their deliverance, assured that this proceeding will satisfy my friends, and afford a cautionary example to future traitors.

"Be it farther known to the parties herein concerned, in all our cities, towns, and villages, that military execution shall be the consequence of disobedience to the commands, of which all our subjects are to take notice, and the Jews shall be ready to avenge themselves on their enemies at the time appointed." Couriers were immediately sent express with these letters mandatory to all quarters.

Soon after the king had put the royal signet to this decree, Mordecai came out of the palace, dressed in the royal robe, gown, and chain; the sight of whom gave the highest satisfaction to the Jews, who thereby imagined themselves safe, and that Haman's decree against them was totally rescinded. The Jews likewise, who resided in the different parts of the kingdom, when they heard the contents of the king's last decree, were elated with joy; and some of the natives, thinking themselves in danger, underwent circumcision; supposing that might be a means of securing them, should the Jews become predominant; as they were greatly animated by the king's assigning them the same day for their revenge that had been designed for their execution, that is to say, the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, which the Hebrews call Adar, and the Macedonians Dystrus. Upon the obtaining of this mandate, the princes, governors, and magistrates, all paid a more than ordinary reverence to the Jews, through fear of the power of Mordecai.

When the decree was dispersed, the Jews put five hundred of their enemies to the sword at Susa, and the king shewed the queen the number of them; but no account was yet taken of those that were slain elsewhere. At the queen's special request, that the Jews might have one day's revenge more upon their enemies, and that the ten sons of Haman might be executed on the gibbet, the king appointed the day following for that purpose. So that they assembled in great numbers, and slew near three hundred more of their adversaries, without so much as touching any of their property. But, throughout the whole empire, the number of the slain, as accounted enemies, was computed at seventy-five thousand. This slaughter was on the thirteenth day of the month; and the next was celebrated as a festival by all the Jews throughout the Persian dominions. These days are still observed with the same solemnity by the Jews, who make it a point, on their annual return, to regale and present each other with donations of various kinds. Mordecai, indeed, sent orders throughout the empire to all his countrymen, requiring them most strictly to observe those days of festival, and to transmit them to posterity, in order to perpetuate the memory of their signal deliverance from the massacre designed by the flagitious Haman, and the advantages which they gained in the result over their most inveterate enemies. For this cause those days are still observed by the Jews, who call them Phuræa, or Purim, that is to say, Feasts of Conversation. Mordecai retained his influence with the king, being the first person in administration, and equally respected by him and the queen. The affairs of the Jews continued to prosper under the auspices of Artaxerxes, whose name therefore stands with honour in our records, and as such will be handed down to future ages.

Days of Purim.

CHAP. VII.

John, the high-priest, slays his brother Jesus in the temple. Bagoses offers many injuries to the Jews.

ON the demise of Eliashib, the high-priest, his son Judas, by right hereditary, succeeded to the office, as did his son John, by the same right, at his decease. This said John was the cause of the violation and profanation of the temple afterwards, by Bagoses, commander in chief of the troops of another Artaxerxes, called Mnemon. Bagoses imposed a tribute on the Jews, obliging them to pay, out of the public treasure, fifty drachmas a day for every lamb they sacrificed before they entered upon their daily oblations (a). John, the high-priest, had a brother, whose name was Jesus, and Bagoses, the general, being much attached to him, had promised to exert his influence to advance him to the supreme sacerdotal office. Jesus, relying on the assurance and authority of Bagoses, had the audacity to enter into a contest with his brother John in the temple upon this subject, who was excited by his provocation to such a degree of rage, that, in his fury, he slew him.

Eliashib, the high-priest, is succeeded by Judas, and Judas by John.

Bagoses instigates Jesus to offend his brother John in the temple.

John slays Jesus.

The religion of the Jews could not possibly sustain a greater disgrace, than the commission of so heinous a crime in so sacred a place, by so sacred a character: indeed, as an aggravation of its enormity, there never was a similar instance among the Greeks, or even the Barbarians. The Almighty, however, did not suffer it to pass unpunished; for, on that very account, the people were enslaved, and the temple was profaned by the Persians. When Bagoses heard that the high-priest had spilt the blood of his brother in the very temple, he exclaimed with contempt and indignation against the Jews, as the most daring and abandoned wretches, in perpetrating the most heinous crime of murder, in a place of all others the most solemn and sacred. Being opposed in his attempt to enter the temple, he cried out, "Am I not purer in body than he who was slain within?" and with these words forced his way. Bagoses accordingly made use of this pretence for treating the Jews with the utmost severity and rigour, for the space of seven years.

The Jews are disgraced for their sacrilege.

John, the high-priest, was succeeded, at his death, by his son Jaddus. This Jaddus had a brother, whose name was Manasses, to whom Sanballat, who was sent by Darius, the king of Persia, into Samaria, understanding Jerusalem to be a famous city, and that the kings of it had put the Syrians to many difficulties, frankly gave his daughter Nicasa in marriage, as a test and earnest of the friendship he wished to cultivate and maintain with the Jews. Sanballat was by birth a Chuthite, from whom the Samaritans derive their origin.

Alexander the Great overthrows the Persians. Makes his entry into the city of Jerusalem; and, instead of destroying according to expectation, confers many benefits on the Jews.

Philip of Macedon slain, and succeeded by his son Alexander.

ABOUT this time Philip, king of Macedon, was treacherously assaulted and slain, in the city of Ægæa, by Pausanias, the son of Cerastes, of the family of Orestes. He was succeeded on the throne of Macedon by his son Alexander, who crossing the Hellepont, obtained a signal victory over the army of Darius at the river Granicus; after which he subdued Lydia and Ionia, and passing his army through Caria, entered into Pamphilia, as is recorded in another place.

Manasses gives offence by marrying a strange woman.

The elders of Jerusalem were at this time much concerned at the conduct of Manasses, the brother of Jaddus, the high-priest; who had taken to wife a strange woman. Indeed, their indignation arose to such a pitch, as to have been almost productive of an insurrection; for they deemed it a step towards the abolition of the laws of their country respecting marriages, and concluded, if they suffered it to pass unnoticed, it would, by degrees, become an established custom. Nor could they be unmindful that this was the very cause of their former captivity, and of all the calamities that ensued thereupon. They were too sensible that the transgression which drew down those heavy judgments upon them, was their intermarrying with strange women; and therefore they peremptorily demanded of Manasses, that he should either dismiss his wife, or never more approach the altar.

Manasses is disposed to put away his wife.

In consequence of this Manasses repaired to his father-in-law Sanballat, governor of Samaria, told him all that had passed at Jerusalem, and declared that though he passionately loved his daughter, yet he was unwilling, for her sake, to be deprived of the priesthood, which was a native honour, and in the highest esteem among the Jews. Sanballat, in order to ease the mind of his son-in-law upon this head, told him that if he would but continue his affection to his daughter, and keep her as his wife, he would undertake not only to secure him the exercise of his function, but advance him to the pontificate, and establish him as prince of the whole country. He further promised to build him a temple upon mount Gerizim, that overlooks Samaria; and the rest of the mountains, not inferior to that at Jerusalem; all which should be performed by the permission and power of Darius. Manasses, relying on these promises, remained with his father-in-law; the consequence of which was, that many of the priests, as well as laity, of Jerusalem, who had engaged in these prohibited marriages, resorted to Samaria, and put themselves under his protection. Their removal, indeed, was far from being against their worldly interest; for the governor, to encourage his ambitious son-in-law, furnished them with houses, land, stock, and money; a circumstance which afterwards occasioned great disorder in the Jewish state.

Conquest of Persia by Alexander.

Darius, about this time, receiving intelligence that Alexander had passed the Hellepont, and obtained a complete victory over his generals at the river Granicus, to prevent his progress, immediately assembled his forces, with a resolution to give the Macedonians battle, lest they should over-run the whole of his territories, which they seemed inclined to do. He accordingly marched at the head of his troops beyond the Euphrates, and encamped on the side of mount Taurus, in Cilicia, determined to come to an engagement with the enemy in that quarter.

Sanballat encourages Manasses in his intention to follow of his country.

This was agreeable news to Sanballat, who, in full confidence of success, assured his son-in-law Manasses, that, on the king's return, he would ratify all he had promised, as he, and all the Asiatics, were fully persuaded, that Darius would obtain an effectual conquest over the Macedonians, who, with their handful of men, could never sustain the first shock. In this, however, he was fatally mistaken; for though the army of Alexander was, as represented, very inferior to that of Darius, the Persians were totally routed; a great part of their army was lost; the king's mother, wife, and children were taken prisoners; and he was obliged to save himself by a precipitate flight. Alexander, encouraged by this success, marched directly into Syria, took Damascus and Sidon, and laid siege to Tyre. From thence he wrote to the high-priest at Jerusalem, giving him to understand, that he expected the same assistance from them which they had formerly given to Darius, and that they should provide a market for the supply of his army, where he might have necessities for his money; assuring them they should have no reason to repent of such their services. The high-priest returned for answer briefly this, that they had bound themselves by oath not to take up arms against Darius, and that he was determined to keep that oath inviolable during his life.

Alexander pursues his conquest.

Requires the Jews to submit to him.

Alexander was much displeased with this answer; and though he determined to prosecute the siege of Tyre with the utmost vigour, he as firmly resolved, upon its surrender, to make an expedition against the Jewish high-priest, and, by his example, teach the world in general, how far oaths were to be preserved or broken. At length, after a siege of fatigue and danger, the Macedonians made themselves masters of Tyre by assault, and then proceeded to invest Gaza, a Persian garrison, under the command of a governor named Babermes.

Invests and takes the city of Tyre.

When Sanballat understood that Alexander lay before Tyre, he took that opportunity of going over to him with eight thousand men, whom he had assembled together out of his own province. The Macedonian here received him with great respect, desiring him to open his mind freely without the least restraint, as he was ready to grant any reasonable request he might make. This gave Sanballat a favourable opportunity of executing the design he had projected. He told Alexander he had a son-in-law, named Manasses, the brother of Jaddus, the high-priest of the Jews, who was following him with great numbers of people, to ask permission to erect a temple in that province for divine worship. He intimated, at the same time, how much Alexander's interest was concerned in this permission, as the Jews, who were very numerous, might, if he refused, be as troublesome to him, as they had heretofore been to the Syrians. Alexander readily granted Sanballat's request; upon which he immediately gave orders for erecting the temple on mount Gerizim; appointed Manasses, his son-in-law, to be high-priest; and ordered that his descendants, by his daughter, should succeed to that honour. The temple which Sanballat had obtained permission to build was soon completed, and Manasses appointed high-priest; but his father-in-law did not live long to see him enjoy that honour; for in about two months after he paid the debt of nature.

Sanballat revolts from Darius to Alexander.

Obtains permission for building a temple at Gerizim.

Death of Sanballat.

As soon as the victorious Alexander had subdued Gaza, he advanced at the head of his army towards Jerusalem, fully determined to punish the high-priest for non-compliance with his request. Jaddus, being apprized of Alexander's intention, and that he was marching with all haste to Jerusalem, was greatly alarmed; and knowing how incapable he was of making any resistance against so powerful an invader, ordered prayers and sacrifices to be offered up for the general safety and prosperity of the people. On the following night it was revealed to the high-priest in a dream, that he should adorn the city with garlands and flowers, open the gates, and let the people, who should be dressed in white, go out to meet Alexander, himself and the other priests preceding in their proper habits. When Jaddus awoke, he was so highly pleased with what had been revealed to him in his dream, that having in the morning told the citizens what had passed, he proceeded to make the necessary preparations for meeting the king.

Alexander goes against Jerusalem.

As soon as Jaddus heard of the approach of Alexander, he, with the priests and people, left the city, in a solemn procession, and went to a place called Sapha, that is, the place of prospect, from its being so elevated as to command an uninterrupted view of the city and temple.

Jaddus prepares to meet Alexander.

The army of Alexander made no doubt of a speedy conquest, and flattered themselves with reaping great advantages by plundering the city. But in this they soon found themselves mistaken, things taking a very different turn from what they expected. As soon as Alexander saw the people marching in procession, and clothed in white, the priests in silken robes, and the high-high-priest in purple, embroidered with gold; wearing his mitre, and having on his forehead a golden plate, with the sacred name of the Deity inscribed on it, the majesty of the spectacle struck him with such reverential awe, that he advanced alone, paid homage to the inscription by falling on his knees, and saluted the high-priest himself. So unexpected a circumstance greatly surprized the Jews, who gathered in crowds about Alexander, and, with loud acclamations, proclaimed his praise. The king of Syria, and the great men of Persia, were likewise astonished at his behaviour on this occasion. One of them, named Parmenio, took the liberty to ask him in a familiar way, how it happened that he, who was adored almost by the whole earth, should now descend to bow to a priest of the Jews? The reply that Alexander made was this: "That he did not pay that adoration to him, but to the God whom he professed to serve. That while he was at Dion, in Macedonia, and deliberating with himself in what manner he should carry on the Asiatic war, and subdue the Persian empire, that very person, and in that very habit, appeared to him in a dream, encouraging him to enter boldly on the expedition, and not to doubt of success, because the Almighty would be his guide, and insure him a conquest: that therefore he made no doubt of gaining his point in all his undertakings to his utmost wish, as he made war under the direction of that Supreme Being, to whom, in the person of the high-priest, he paid adoration."

After this reply to Parmenio, the king embraced Jaddus; and the other priests escorting him into the city, he went up to the temple, and there offered sacrifice in form, according to order, paying also a singular veneration to the high-priest, who shewed him, when the ceremony was over, the book of the prophet Daniel, and, in it, the prediction of the overthrow of the Persian empire by a certain Grecian king, whom Alexander interpreted to be himself. Pleased with this reflection, he offered to grant the people any request they should desire of him by their high-priest. Jaddus made answer, that they desired only to enjoy their own country laws, and possess the same privileges as their brethren did in Media and Babylon, with an exemption from the seventh year's tribute, as, according to the Mosaic law, they neither ploughed or sowed at the stated returns of that period. Alexander readily complied with their request, and offered moreover, that if any of them should be disposed to take up arms in his service, they should be received into his army, and enjoy the free exercise of their religion as before. From this act of generosity and indulgence, many were ready to accompany him in his wars.

Having thus settled matters at Jerusalem, Alexander marched with his army from place to place among the neighbouring cities, at all of which he was received by the people with great testimonies of friendship and submission. The Samaritans, whose capital at that time was Shechem, at the foot of mount Gerizim, and inhabited by Jewish deserters, hearing how kindly Alexander had treated the people of Jerusalem, resolved to take advantage of it by veering about, and returning to their former professions. It was a common practice with them to assert or deny their origin, as best suited their interest or convenience. When at any time they observed the affairs of the Jews in a prosperous state, they boasted that they were of their nation, and descended from Manasseh and Ephraim. But when they thought it was their interest to affirm the contrary, they would solemnly disclaim all affinity to them. Resolved, however, to profess themselves Jews on the present occasion, in order to answer their intended purposes, they went with great eagerness as far as the territories of Jerusalem to meet Alexander, whom they no sooner saw, than they expressed their satisfaction by the loudest acclamations. The king commending their zeal, these Samaritans (Shechemites) preferred their humble suit, that he would vouchsafe to honour their city and temple with his presence. Alexander told them, that the situation of affairs required his speedy departure; but that, on his return, he would not fail to comply with their desires. Upon their requesting that he would grant them an exemption from the seventh year's tribute, he asked them if they were Jews. They replied they were Hebrews, but that they were called Shechemites by the Sidonians. The question was then put explicitly, whether they were Jews or not? Upon their reply in the negative, they were dismissed with this answer: "The favour you ask I have granted to the Jews. When I return, and have better information, I shall indulge you in whatever may be thought reasonable." Alexander, however, took Sanballat's men with him into Egypt, allotting them a distribution of lands to live upon there, which they had afterwards in Thebes, where they were put into garrison.

After the death of Alexander, the empire was parted amongst his successors; but the temple on mount Gerizim remained untouched. If, at any time, the Jews at Jerusalem were found guilty of the violation of their laws, as in eating forbidden meats, breaking the sabbath, or any other crime of the like nature, they took sanctuary with the Shechemites, upon pretence that they were unjustly accused. About this time Jaddus, the high-priest, died, and was succeeded in the pontifical dignity by his son Onias. Such was the then state of Jerusalem.

Ptolemy takes Jerusalem by surprize, and transplants many of the Jews to divers colonies in Egypt. Perpetual animosity between the Jews and Samaritans.

Division of the Macedonian empire.

WHEN Alexander, king of Macedon, had put an end to the dominion of the Persians, and settled the affairs of the Jews in the manner already described, he departed this life, and his empire was divided into distinct principalities. On this division, Antiochus took the sovereignty of Asia, Seleucus that of Babylon and the bordering countries, Lyfimachus governed the Hellespont, Cassander reigned over Macedon, and Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, succeeded his father in the government of Egypt. These respective princes, not satisfied with their different allotments, continued at war with each other for some years, in the course of which great numbers of lives were sacrificed, and many capital cities utterly destroyed. The whole track of Syria was abundantly sensible of the ravaging effects of this discontent, under the government of Ptolemy, otherwise called Soter, or Saviour; though never was character more reverse to such domination.

Ptolemy

treachery.

Having a design upon Jerusalem, he took the advantage of storming it upon a sabbath-day, under colour of devotion, as if he would offer sacrifice, and then treacherously possessed himself of the city without any opposition, or the least apprehension of danger; for it being a day of rest, the Jews would not act on the defensive, which facilitated a conquest he applied to the most tyrannical and barbarous purposes. Agatharchides, of Cuidus, who recorded the acts of the successors of Alexander, reproaches us with superstition, as if through it we had lost our liberty and our country. His words are these:

Agatharchides.

"There are a people known by the name of Jews, who have their habitation in a strong and populous city, called Jerusalem. These men fell into the hands of Ptolemy, and subjected themselves to a cruel slavery, upon a fantastical scruple of conscience, that would not suffer them to "take up arms against an oppressor in their own defence upon what they call their sabbath-day." This is what Agatharchides relates of our nation.

Ptolemy carried away a great many captives out of the mountainous parts of Judea, from about Jerusalem, Samaria, and the mount Gerizim, whom he transported into Egypt, and settled there. As he knew that the people of Jerusalem were most faithful in the observation of oaths and covenants, (and this from the answer they made to Alexander, when he sent an embassy to them, after he had vanquished Darius in battle), he disposed of them in strong holds, garrisons, and places of trust, upon their oath of fidelity to him and his successors, granting them also immunities and privileges in common with the Macedonians; so that, tempted by Ptolemy's liberality, on the one hand, and the pleasures and convenience of a fruitful country, on the other, there came over great numbers of Jews into Egypt from other parts.

Ptolemy

But the Jews and Samaritans could never be reconciled upon the subject of their antient laws and constitutions; the one insisting that the temple at Jerusalem was the only holy place, and the Jews, on that account, not being allowed to send their sacrifices any where else; while the Samaritans as peremptorily and confidentially affirmed the same with respect to their temple at Gerizim. And this was the cause of much bloodshed.

Ptolemy Philadelphus, son of Ptolemy Soter, succeeds to the kingdom of Egypt, and causes the Jewish laws to be translated into Greek. Liberates many captives, and presents many gifts for the use of the temple.

ON the death of Ptolemy Soter, or the Saviour, Philadelphus, his son, succeeded of course to the kingdom of Egypt. He reigned thirty-nine years, and gave orders for translating the Mosaic laws into the Greek tongue. There were, at that time, captive Jews, in Egypt, to the number of an hundred and twenty thousand, whom this Philadelphus commanded to be set at liberty, upon the following occasion: Demetrius Phalerus, having the king's library under his care and custody, from a natural curiosity, determined, if possible, to procure a collection of all the books extant, and that upon any terms. This being his peculiar propensity, he bought up all the choice books he could hear of, and which he thought might be worthy a place in the king's study and good opinion. Upon the king's enquiry how many thousand volumes he thought he had collected, he replied, about two hundred thousand; but that he hoped, in a short time, to make them five hundred thousand, as he had certain information, that there was an incredible number of choice manuscripts among the Jews, concerning their laws, customs, and ceremonies, that were deserving not only of perusal, but the honour of a place in the royal library; but being written in their own language and characters, it would be a matter of great difficulty and trouble to translate them into Greek. He observed that though there might seem to be some resemblance and affinity between the language and writing of the one and the other, yet there were several niceties peculiar to each other: not that he introduced this remark to discourage the translating them out of the Hebrew, and depositing them in the royal library, as long as money could be found to defray the expence.

Ptolemy at the advice of his librarian endeavours to procure a translation of the Jewish laws into Greek.

The king highly commended the purpose of Demetrius concerning such a collection, and wrote to the high-priest of the Jews, to assist him in providing those copies. There was, amongst the attendants of the king, one Aristæus, a man whose modesty and candour recommended him to the confidence of his master. This Aristæus long and heartily desired to obtain the liberty of the Jews, and embracing this occasion as the most convenient opportunity of applying to the king on that subject, went first to Sosibius, Tasantinius, and Andraæas, three captains of the guards, to sound their inclinations; and finding them well affected towards his design, he intreated their concurrence in so humane an office. Upon this assurance, he modestly addressed himself to the king, in words to the following effect:

Address of Aristæus to Ptolemy, in behalf of the Jews.

"If I may presume, with all deference and humility, to submit my thoughts to your royal pleasure, respecting the laws of the Jews, you will permit me to observe, that I cannot see how it can be done, while so many of that nation are in bondage under your government, from whom you expect to derive so necessary an assistance. I presume it is an act worthy of your magnificence to deliver those unhappy people from their present state of misery, as I apprehend the same Divine Being, under whom you rule, is the author of their laws. We and they worship one and the same Creator, and adore the same Almighty Power, though we differ in name and title. Permit me, therefore, to intreat that, from a reverence to that Divine Being whom they love and worship with a zeal and affection beyond all other mortals, you will be pleased to restore these wretched exiles to their own country, that they may end their days in their own place. I interpose not, Sire, in their behalf, from a principle of partiality, but from a consciousness that the same God is the Creator of us all, and that such an act of clemency must be acceptable to the Father of all Mercies."

The king's great liberality.

The king, highly pleased with the liberality of this address, asked Aristæus how many thousands he thought there were who would crave this indulgence? Answer being made, about an hundred and twenty, and enforced, by observing, that it would be an action worthy of so great a monarch, to shew mercy to miserable captives, as an acknowledgment of the power he had derived from above, the king gave orders, that an hundred and twenty drachmas should be paid to the soldiers for every Jew they had in custody, on the next pay day, over and above their usual stipend. He also promised to grant the request of Aristæus in every particular point, and to ratify the whole by a public decree, comprehending not only those who had been led away captive by his father and his army, but those also that, either before or since that time, had been taken into captivity. When it was represented to him, that their redemption would be attended with an expence amounting to at least four hundred talents, he solemnly declared it should be done, as will appear from the following decree, which is preserved as an instance of the magnanimity of this illustrious monarch.

Ptolemy's decree for setting the Jews at liberty.

"It is our royal will and pleasure that all the Jews whatever, who have been made captive by any of my father's forces upon their incursions into Syria and Phœnicia, and those brought away, or sold into any part of my dominions, and all those likewise, that, either before or since that time, have been sold and enslaved, be all set free upon the payment of one hundred and twenty drachmas for every slave; the soldiers to receive this redemption-money, together with their pay, out of the treasury. I cannot suppose that my father either intended or approved of the forcing away so many thousands into captivity, or the ravaging of their country by the soldiery, for the mere sake of plunder, contrary to the great law of equity. Out of regard, therefore, to justice, and in commiseration of those who suffer under oppression, I do hereby expressly charge and command, that all the Jews, who are at this time in servitude, be immediately dismissed upon the payment of the sum aforesaid to their respective masters, in obedience to our own mandate, without fraud or collusion. It is also our royal will and pleasure, that this our proclamation be made public for three days successively after the receipt of it; and, in the mean time, that the aforesaid masters bring in a list of their slaves to such officers, and in such manner as shall be prescribed, and all this upon peril of confiscation, if any man shall be found to act contrary to the tenour of this our decree."

The king's excellent bounty towards Jews.

Upon a revival of this decree, it appeared to the king, that the provision for the liberty of the Jews, who were taken either before or after the time specified, was not expressed in such explicit terms, but it might be evaded; so that, from a motive of generosity, he superadded clauses of indulgence. Nay, such was his liberality, that he gave orders to the collectors of his tribute, and the officers of his treasury, to have the money ready for the ransom of the Jews; by which means, in the course of only seven days, the business was dispatched at the king's charge, amounting to four hundred and sixty talents; the masters insisting on the same rate for the discharge of children they had for the adult; though the king's edict extended no farther than to those who were brought away prisoners, without comprehending such as were born there.

He ordered Demetrius to transcribe the translation.

Having thus far conducted the business, with a munificence that did him the highest honour, the king commanded Demetrius Phalerus to publish his purpose concerning the transcript of the Jewish records in due form and order; so that a copy of the petition of Demetrius was registered, as also of the letters written upon that occasion, together with an account of the donations and donors towards the work; so that from hence might appear both the excellency of the design and the execution. The petition was couched in terms to the following purport.

"Demetrius to the great King.

Petition of Demetrius to King Ptolemy.

"Since it is your royal will and command, that I should contribute my utmost endeavours to supply what yet may be wanting towards the perfection of your library, and to find out what curious and useful books and copies may have hitherto escaped my search, this is humbly to inform you, that, after much study and recollection, I do not find any thing so conducive to that laudable purpose as the book of the Jewish legislation, but being written in Hebrew characters, and in an Hebrew idiom, it will be difficult for us to understand them. Besides, our present version is not so correct as it should be, through want of royal patronage. It will, therefore, I presume, be necessary to have them accurately translated, as a body from their Divine original, of the wisest and most perfect laws that are extant. For this cause it is, that, according to Hecataeus, of Abdera, we find in none

ish laws.

"none of the poets or historians any mention of those laws, or the administrators of them, the origin and institution of them being sacred, and not to be prophaned by unhallowed lips.
"You will, therefore, Sire, if you judge it meet, be pleased to write to the high-priest of the Jews, to send you out of every tribe six elders, whom he shall choose as men best skilled in the knowledge of their constitution; so that, by their assistance in the interposition and exposition of their writings, we may be able to produce something worthy of your royal approbation."

Letters written to the Jewish high-priest, accompanied with mulificent presents.

Upon this motion of Demetrius, the king gave directions for letters to be written to Eleazar, the high-priest of the Jews, agreeable thereunto, inserting in them the general release of all the captives in Egypt. These letters were accompanied with a present of fifty talents of gold, together with precious stones of immense value, to be submitted to the disposal of lapidaries, and converted, with the addition of an hundred talents, to the use of sacrifices, and other sacred services of the temple. I cannot pass over, in silence, the magnificence of the whole proceeding; but shall previously present the reader with a copy of the letter, written to Eleazar, prefixing an account of the manner by which he attained to that dignity.

Upon the demise of Onias, the high-priest, his son, Simeon, succeeded to that office. He was a man of singular piety towards God, and exemplary benevolence towards mankind, inasmuch that he obtained the honourable appellation of "Simeon the Just." This excellent man did not long hold the pontifical dignity; and leaving, at his death, an infant son, he was of course succeeded by his brother Eleazar, to whom Ptolemy wrote the following letter.

"King Ptolemy to Eleazar, the high-priest, sendeth greeting.

The epistle of king Ptolemy to Eleazar, the high-priest.

"Whereas there were great numbers of Jews in my dominions, that were brought hither captive by the Persians, while they were in power; and whereas these were honoured by my father, in reposing confidence in them, vesting them with places under his government, and particularly appointing them to garrisons, as a check upon the Egyptians, with extraordinary pensions for their services; be it known unto you, that as from the time of my succession to the throne, I have ever retained an affection for your people, I have lately manifested the same, in setting at liberty above one hundred thousand of them, and paying the charge of their ransom out of my own coffers. Some of them I have employed in a military, and others in a civil capacity, according to their respective character and abilities, deeming it a service acceptable to that Supreme Being to whom I owe both my existence and my crown. From a desire of shewing my regard for the Jews throughout the habitable earth, I have proposed to procure a translation of your laws into the Greek, to be deposited in my library. In order to accomplish this design, you will do well to select out of your several tribes six elders from each tribe, well skilled in the laws, and send them to assist in this translation, as I think, if it is well executed, it will redound to my immortal honour. The persons I depute to treat with you on this affair, are Andræas, an officer of my body guards, and Aristæus, my most faithful counsellor. I have charged them with a present of an hundred talents of silver, as first fruits dedicated to the sacred services of the temple. Your answer to this epistle will be highly acceptable."

Eleazar complied with the king's request, and wrote him in return to the following effect.

"Eleazar, the high-priest, to king Ptolemy, greeting.

Eleazar's
answer.

"If you, your queen Arsinoë, and your illustrious family are well, it is highly grateful to the Jews. We acknowledge the receipt of your most gracious letter, which was read in full assembly, and afforded infinite joy and satisfaction, not only as an instance of your clemency towards a distressed people, but your piety and reverence for the worship of the great God. We have received, by the hands of Andræas and Aristæus, (persons highly worthy of esteem and honour), twenty golden cups, thirty of silver, five goblets, and a table, to be dedicated to the service of the altar, together with an hundred talents towards the charge of sacrifices, and other ceremonies of the temple. We have represented these circumstances to our brethren in the most affectionate terms of respect and gratitude; and we are all so sensible of the obligations you have been pleased to lay upon us, that you may depend on our most implicit obedience to your commands, as a due acknowledgment of your gracious condescension. Pursuant to a just sense of our duty, we have recommended to God, in our public prayers, the protection of your royal person, sister, and children, together with all that are near and dear to you, wishing peace and prosperity to yourself and people; and beseeching the Almighty that the work you have now in hand of compiling a collection of our laws, may be of as much satisfaction and advantage to you as your heart can desire. To promote this desirable end, I have sent you six elders out of every tribe, with the law, to attend your pleasure; relying on your piety and justice for their remittance to us after the transcription, and recommending you to the providential care of the Almighty."

Such was the answer of Eleazar, the high-priest, to king Ptolemy's letter; upon which occasion the names of the seventy-two elders were subjoined; but it is deemed unnecessary to enumerate them. But the magnificence and curiosity of the donations for the service of the temple cannot be omitted without doing great injustice to the king's piety and bounty, considering with what liberality he promoted the work, the encouragement and countenance he gave to the prosecution of it, and the great attention he paid to those who were employed in it. In these particulars, therefore, I am bound in duty to be more minute; not as a branch of the history, but a memorial of the king's magnanimity, that will stand upon record to his eternal honour. To begin with a description of the table.

two elders to interpret the law, &c.

With respect to the dimensions, the king sent artificers to measure the former table at Jerusalem, and see whether the place would not contain a larger. They informed him he might make it as large as he pleased, upon which he proposed at first to have it made five times as large as the other. But reflecting that so great a bulk would render it unwieldy for daily use, and have the appearance of ostentation rather than service, he came to a resolution, that it should not exceed the former table in size, but in the elegance and variety of its materials. The king had a competent knowledge of human nature, and the reason of things, and great presence of mind, devising expedients, and forming inventions; so that he commonly planned his own designs, and prescribed to the workmen the rules of proportion. With respect to this table in particular, he gave orders that it should be two cubits and an half in length, and one and an half in height, all of solid gold; and round about it a border of an hand's breadth, set out on three sides with curious carving of flower work, and other agreeable figures, which being triangular, every angle had the same disposition of sculptures, and the same form presented itself when turned about without any variation. This table, in fine, was curiously wrought all over, but especially that part which was most in view, with an intermixture of precious stones, looped together by golden buckles, at equal distances from each other. The outside of it was set with other rich stones of an oval cut, and embossed work of twigs and branches surrounding it. There were also various sorts of fruit wrought together under the figure of a crown, as bunches of grapes, ears of corn, all in their proper and natural positions, and expressed by stones set in gold, bearing the native colour of what they represented. Under this crown was another row of ovals, which, for the matter, the order, and ornament, was so like the former, and so exactly uniform from top to bottom, that one part could not be distinguished from another. There was drawn also upon this latter, the resemblance of a meander,

Description of the gold-den table.

the crown, the crown which was marked with stones of such a kind that sparkled like stars, as rubies, emeralds, and whatever else was most precious and excellent in the kind. Along this meander were divers pieces of sculpture in boughs and knots, that, in some degree, resembled the figure of a lozenge; and they were so enlivened by a regular disposition of crystal and amber for the advantage of the view, that it exhibited all together one of the most finished spectacles that can be imagined. The cornices of the feet resembled the first budding of lilies, the stem upright, with the leaves and tendrils winding under the table. The basis was an hand's breadth over, garnished with rubies, and a border round about it, two hands distant betwixt the feet that rested upon it. The graving work of these feet was incomparable, being the fancy of a foliage of the vine and the ivy, finished so exquisitely to the life, that it was difficult to distinguish the artificial from the natural; for, upon the least breath of air, the leaves would move and play, as if they had been the produce of nature. This table consisted of three parts, put together with such skill that there were no joints to be discerned; and the thickness of it was half a cubit. This great prince, by the magnificence of his present, the value of the materials, and the exquisite curiosity of the whole work, demonstrated that though it was abated in size and proportion from the first design, it was abundantly supplied by a most munificent expence in ornament and art.

The golden cup.

There was also a large pair of golden cups, wrought half way up the bowls in form of a scollop, and inlaid with all sorts of precious stones, ranged into the resemblance of a meander of a cubit over, with elegant figures of twigs, branching out in a kind of net-work up to the brim, and garnished with jewels also. The borders were set out with an intermixture of lilies, flowers, vines, grapes, and the like around the lips of the vessel. This was the form of these goblets, which contained each between three and four gallons. The silver pieces were so radiant, that they exceeded in brightness the clearest crystal.

The king contributes to the perfection of the work.

Besides these, the king furnished thirty golden vessels more, richly decorated with precious stones, and overshadowed, in the parts which were not filled up, with vine and ivy leaves in curious sculpture. Nor was the excellence of these curious pieces to be wholly ascribed to the design and execution of the artificer, who took a commendable pride in contributing to the perfection of the work, making it his business to superintend the matters themselves in their several performances, which rendered them more intent, as they saw the king had the design at heart, than they otherwise would have been.

The king holds conference with the elders.

Upon the delivery of these donations, and the dedication of them to the use and service of the holy temple at Jerusalem, Eleazar treated the king's commissioners with all due honours, and dismissed them with presents and good wishes to their master. When the king received intelligence of their arrival at Alexandria, and that they had brought the elders with them, he sent for his two ambassadors, Andræas and Aristæus, from whom he received Eleazar's letter, and derived particular satisfaction as to many important questions. His mind was so intent upon an immediate conference with the elders of the tribes, that no person had access to him even on the most urgent affairs; though, contrary to his custom of giving private audience once in five days, and public once a month.

Marked the perfect preservation of the elders.

Having thus secured himself from the importunity of these casual interruptions, he only waited the arrival of Eleazar's deputies, who attended him soon after with presents from the high-priest, and with certain manuscripts of the Jewish laws, written upon parchment in letters of gold. Upon the king's asking for the books, they were produced, to his great admiration at their exquisite workmanship; for the leaves were put together with such art, that there was no discerning where one skin was joined to another. The king expressed his regard for the persons who brought him that curiosity, a greater for the person who lent it him, but the greatest of all for the author of those laws that were now brought him. The deputies, and their attendants, gave him, with one heart and voice, in their joint prayers and acclamations, such striking instances of their zeal for his service, that he could not refrain from tears of joy at the sincerity of their respect.

The writings were then put into the hands of the officers, who were to take them in charge; and the king embracing the deputies, told them he would first confer with them on the business they came upon, and then take their persons into his peculiar care; as he looked upon the day of their arrival to remarkably auspicious, that he determined to have it observed during his life, as an annual festival in commemoration of so great a blessing. It happened, indeed, to be upon the very day of his naval victory over Antigonus.

The care of entertaining and providing for strangers was properly the province of Nicanor, who appointed Dorotheus under him in this, in other cases, to see that nothing might be wanting. For his own honour, and the accommodation of the strangers, the king commanded that they should be served after the manner of their country; and such instructions were given, with respect to the elders, that they might not be disgusted with novelty. The conduct of this business was committed to Dorotheus, as a person versed in the customs of the Jews. There were placed two seats, one on the king's right-hand, the other on his left, by his own order, for the accommodation of the deputies. When the guests were seated in due form, the king commanded Dorotheus to serve them in the same manner as he had done their countrymen upon a former occasion; so that the Egyptian priests and officers, who attended the king's table, were all dismissed; and one of their own deputies and priests named Elisa, was called upon by the king to give thanks. After the solemnity of a benediction, and fervent prayer for the prosperity of the king and his people, to the infinite satisfaction of all present, the company cheerfully partook of the entertainment, during which the king took occasion to start several philosophical questions, in order to sound the abilities of the deputies. Their answers were so pertinent, that the king was highly delighted with their conversation, inasmuch that the festival continued for the space of twelve days. Those who may be desirous of knowing the particular points that were discussed, are referred to a book written by Aristæus upon the very occasion.

Menedemus the philosopher.

The conversation of the deputies had a great effect not only upon the king, but Menedemus, the philosopher, who was brought over to acknowledge an over-ruling Providence, and gave up the controversy on that subject in their favour. The king, in token of a due sense of the edification he had derived from their learned disquisitions, and particularly respecting the art of government, ordered them a gratuity of three talents each, after which they were conducted to their apartments.

At the expiration of three days, Demetrius escorted them over a causeway of several furlongs, and a bridge of communication betwixt the island and the continent. From thence he proceeded to the northward, and settled them in a mansion by the sea side, quietly and commodiously situated for study and contemplation. Having thus disposed them in a manner most convenient for the promotion of the undertaking, he requested their immediate attention to it, wished them success, and took his departure.

They prosecuted their studies with unremitting assiduity, from earliest morn till the ninth hour of the day, which was a time of relaxation, when they were served by Dorotheus, at the king's order, with the choicest delicacies from his own table, over and above their ordinary allowance. They came to court every morning, and saluted the king, and thence betook themselves to their business, having first washed their hands with sea-water.

The version of the law was finished within the compass of seventy-two days, when Dorotheus called all the Jews together into the place where it was translated, and, in the presence of the interpreters, read over the laws, the whole assembly unanimously approving the translation, and applauding Demetrius for proposing a work of such essential benefit to the community. He desired also that it might be read by the eminent men of the nation; after which the high-priest, the elders, and magistrates of the people, propounded, that, since the translation was so happily executed, its authority might be ratified, and the text remain unalterable for ever. They were unanimous with respect to the proposal, but came to this resolution, that the work be subject to a further examination and revise; and that if any superfluity or omission should be discovered; upon mature deliberation, it should be laid before them and corrected; and it was judged expedient that it should so stand valid for ever.

Judgment inflicted on Theopompus, the historian.

Also on Theocritus, the tragic poet.

The king's bounty on the dismissal of the interpreters.

The king was charmed with having gained his point, and succeeded in an undertaking so conducive to the public interest. When it was read to him, he was transported with wonder at the wisdom of the law-giver, and expressed his astonishment to Demetrius, that neither of the poets or historians should make mention of so incomparable a system. Demetrius replied, that their origin being so manifestly divine, and the subject of them so venerable, none had been hardy enough to attempt a description, especially when reflection brought to mind the heavy judgments inflicted on several people for their temerity in prophaning them. He cited the case of Theopompus, who, as a plagiarist, having published texts of holy writ, affirming himself to have been the author, was struck with lunacy for the space of thirty days; but that, in the interval of his phrenzy, being conscious of his guilt, and imploring the Divine pardon, he was, upon repentance and amendment, restored to his right mind, though not without a revelation in his sleep, that it was his audacity in confounding sacred things with prophane, that brought the lunacy upon him. Thus it was also with Theocritus, the tragic poet, who having, in a certain dramatic representation, introduced some passages of sacred scripture, was struck blind; but, upon confession and repentance of his crime, restored again to his sight.

The king, upon the receipt of the books from Demetrius, paid adoration to the Divine Author, and gave strict command for preserving them safe and entire, desiring the interpreters to visit him as frequently as they could make it convenient, assuring them it would be his highest pleasure, upon all occasions, to promote their honour and interest. He observed, that their present dismissal was indispensable: but that if ever hereafter they should be disposed to return, they should meet with such reception as was due to the characters of wise and good men, and becoming the dignity of an opulent and powerful prince. He then bestowed on each of them three rich suits of raiment, two talents of gold, the value of one talent in cups, and couches to sit and eat upon. He also sent by them, as presents to Eleazar, the high-priest, ten beds with silver feet, and suits of furniture properly adapted; a chalice of thirty talents, ten purple robes, a crown of inestimable value, and an hundred pieces of fine linen; besides cups and goblets of divers sorts, and two golden vessels expressly dedicated to the service of the temple. In a letter to the high-priest he desired him if any of the deputies should be disposed to pay him a visit, he would give them permission, as he highly esteemed the conversation of learned men, and took a pleasure in rewarding literary merit. Thus, to his immortal honour, did Ptolemy Philadelphus, king of Egypt, towards the Jews.

CHAP. III.

The kings of Asia favourable to the Jews. Antiochus the Great particularly espouses their interest and honour.

Privileges granted to the Jews by Seleucus Nicator.

THE Jews were held in great honour and esteem by the princes of Asia, both for their fidelity and skill in martial operations; insomuch that Seleucus Nicator gave them the privileges of freemen in all the cities he built throughout Asia and the Lower Syria; nay, in the metropolis of Antioch itself, declaring it his royal will and pleasure, that they should enjoy the same rights and immunities with the Greeks and Macedonians, of which they are possessed to this very day. For instance, the Jews being interdicted the use of foreign oil, the officers, who had the superintendence of that commodity, were obliged, by government, to allow them so much money in lieu of it. In the course of the following war the people of Antioch insisted on the abrogation of that custom; but Mutianus, who was then governor of the province of Syria, would not admit of it.

No. 16.

In the reign of Vespasian, and his son Titus, the people of Alexandria contended for the disfranchisement of the Jews; but such were the honour and justice of the Romans, and especially of those two magnanimous princes, that they could not obtain it. They certainly did not want pretence for revenge upon a people who had so resolutely opposed them throughout the course of a troublesome war; but they still held their rights and privileges to be sacred, and therefore nobly refused to gratify either their own passions, or yield to the importunity of two great nations, in suffering a vindictive act of injustice. In their generous breasts the recollection of their ancient merit preponderated the sense of their late misdemeanours. Nor could they be influenced by interested views to violate their honour; observing, that those who had taken up arms against the Romans, had suffered sufficiently by the calamities of war, without any other forfeiture; and that to punish those who had not offended, would be equally repugnant to justice and common sense.

Extreme generosity of Vespasian, and his son Titus, towards the Jews.

It is also evident, from the testimony of history, that Marcus Agrippa was favourably disposed towards the Jews: for when the Ionians, from a principle of animosity against those people, besought Agrippa that they, and they only, might have those privileges of citizens, which Antiochus, the grandson of Seleucus, whom the Grecians surnamed "the God," had bestowed upon them, and requested that, if the Jews were to be joint partakers with them in the same privileges, they might be obliged to worship the same gods as they worshipped, these Ionians, when the question was brought to trial, could not obtain their suit, nor prevail against the Jews, whose cause was ably defended by Nicolaus, of Damascus, who caused judgment to be given in favour of the right they claimed to the free exercise and enjoyment of their own laws and customs. Agrippa pronounced definitively, that he could not agree to any innovation in that point. Those who would wish to have full information respecting this matter, may read the whole story at large, in the 123d and 124th books of the history of this Nicolaus. Indeed, the determination of Agrippa does not appear so much a matter of wonder, as at that time our nation was not at war with the Romans; while the candour and generosity of Vespasian and Titus are astonishing beyond expression; nor can their names be mentioned but with infinite honour, as men who, amidst the outrages of a fierce and bloody war, could not be transported beyond the bounds of humanity and moderation.

Marcus Agrippa favours the Jews.

Nicolaus, of Damascus, espouses their cause, with success.

Encomium of Josephus on the character of the Roman emperors Vespasian and Titus.

Under the reign of Antiochus the Great, Asia, Judæa, and Cœlo-Syria, were perpetually harrassed: for Antiochus at that time being in actual hostility with Ptolemy Philopates, and his son Ptolemy Epiphanes, whoever were conquerors, the Jews, betwixt the prosperous and adverse fortune of Antiochus, were sure to be sufferers, like a ship in a storm exposed to the fury of the billows on either side. Antiochus, however, prevailed in the end, and took possession of Judæa.

The Jews are harrassed during the war of Antiochus.

In process of time, after the death of Philopates, his son sent a formidable army into Cœlo-Syria, under the command of Scopas, his general, who took several of their cities, and reduced Judæa by force; but Antiochus, in a short time, obtained a signal victory over Scopas at the head of the river Jordan, and recovered the places in Cœlo-Syria and Samaria of which the enemy had taken possession. The Jews, upon this success, delivered themselves up, received the army into their city, (Jerusalem), provided plentifully for the elephants, and valiantly assisted in the attack of the castle, where Scopas had left a body of men in garrison. Antiochus, deeming it reasonable to gratify the Jews with some honourable token of the sense he retained of their good will and services upon this occasion, wrote to the generals of his army and leading men, giving testimony of their meritorious conduct, and informing them of the rewards he intended to bestow on them. Copies of the epistles will follow what we shall produce concerning the testimony of Polybius, of Magalopolis, in the sixteenth book of his history, where he thus writes: "Scopas, the general of Ptolemy's army, made an expedition, in the winter season, into the heart of the country, and

"and subdued the nation of the Jews." He writes in the same book, that, "When Scopas was conquered by Antiochus, the victor took possession of Batthamæa, Samaria, Gadela, Gadara, and Abila; after which the Jews of Jerusalem, and of the glorious temple there, went over to him." He adds, "That he should say more on the subject, but that he reserved it for another opportunity." Having thus cited the testimony of Polybius, we return to the epistle of Antiochus.

King Antiochus to Ptolemy, greeting:

Epistle of Antiochus the Great to Ptolemy in favour of the Jews.

"Whereas we have received several demonstrations of the good disposition of the Jews towards us and our service, from the time of our first coming into their country, in the respect of their elders and magistrates in attending us on the way, and the splendid reception of our person and army into the city, as well as making such ample provision both for our horses and elephants; these good offices duly considered, we hold ourselves bound in duty to acknowledge, by bestowing on them some marks of our favour and esteem, contributing towards the reparation of their demolished city, and recalling their captive countrymen to their former habitations. In order to effect these necessary purposes, we have, in the first place, assigned twenty thousand pieces of silver towards the charge of their sacrifices, wine, oil, and frankincense; and for fine flour, according to the custom of the place, one thousand four hundred and sixty measures of wheat, and three hundred and seventy-five measures of salt. And it is our will and pleasure that all this be executed and made good according to order. It is our further will and pleasure, that whatever may be wanting towards the repairs of the temple, porch, or galleries, be supplied either from Judæa, Libanus, or elsewhere, without any tax or duty. And we do likewise grant the same immunity for all other materials that shall be applied to the use of the holy temple, with permission moreover of an universal liberty to live and govern themselves according to their own customs and laws. And we do hereby respectively discharge their elders, priests, scribes, and singing-men, of poll-taxes, royal duties, and all other tributes whatsoever. And, as a further encouragement to the speedy re-peopling of this city, we do, by our royal authority, grant unto all the present inhabitants of the same, and to such others as shall come over to take up their residence there, at any time betwixt this and the month Hyperberetæus next ensuing, an exemption from all public impositions, for the space of three years to come; and likewise from that time forward, an abatement of all taxes, in consideration of their part of damages and sufferings. And finally, whereas great numbers of these people have been carried away captives, and remain to this day in bondage, we do farther command that they be forthwith let at liberty, with restitution of what hath been taken from them."

This generous declaration in favour of the people was followed by an edict in honour of the temple, which he caused to be published throughout his dominions. It was to this purport: "It shall not be lawful for any foreigner to enter the temple, but with consent of the Jews, and without being purified and qualified beforehand for his admittance. No man shall presume to bring into the city either the flesh of horses, mules, or asses, or of panthers, foxes, hares, or any creatures that the Jews are forbidden to eat. Nor shall their skins be brought, nor one of these animals be bred in the city. Let them only use such as their forefathers, according to Divine appointment, applied to the purpose of sacrifices. He that transgresses any of these orders shall be fined, for every such offence, three thousand drachmas, to be paid by the offender to the priests for their use and benefit."

The king took another occasion of bearing testimony to our piety and allegiance. Upon the breaking out of a commotion in Phrygia and Lydia, Zeuxes, the commander in chief of his forces, being at the head of an army in the upland provinces, he commanded him to send away from Babylon a number of Jews into Phrygia, and gave him his instructions in a letter to this effect:

"The king Antiochus to Zeuxes, his friend and general, greeting:

"Whereas I am given to understand that seditious practices prevail in Phrygia and Lydia, and it behoves me therefore to be upon my guard: I am now to acquaint you that I am advised by my council to take two thousand Jewish families out of Babylon and Mesopotamia, and to transport them into Phrygia with their goods, and whatever property they may possess, and there to place them in strong holds and garrisons, being thoroughly satisfied of their zeal and allegiance, not only from the principles of their religion, but proofs of their fidelity to my ancestors. Wherefore it is my will and pleasure, notwithstanding all the difficulties with which it may be attended, that they be forthwith transplanted, giving them all assurances that they shall enjoy the liberty of their own laws and customs. Upon their arrival there, you are to assign them lands and possessions, with all sorts of conveniences for building, planting, and tillage, with an exemption from all taxes and contributions out of the profits for ten years to come. In the mean time, till they may be able to support themselves out of the fruits of their own industry, you are to allow them a competent provision of wheat for the maintenance of themselves and their families; by which kind treatment they will be encouraged to act more cheerfully in our service. You are finally to take care that they be not exposed to any sort of molestation or trouble. And so we bid you farewell."

King Antiochus's epistle to Zeuxes, his general, in behalf of the Jews.

These testimonials are produced to shew the esteem and friendship Antiochus the Great bore to the Jews, as well as commemorate actions noble in their nature, and consequently most worthy of imitation.

Soon after this transaction, a league of friendship and alliance was entered into between this king and Ptolemy Epiphanes, king of Egypt, upon a marriage with his daughter Cleopatra, who had yielded up to him, by way of dowry, Cœlo-Syria, Phœnicia, Judæa, and Samaria. The revenue was in partition between the two kings, and farmed out to some of the principal men in the respective provinces, who superintended the collections, and paid their proportions into the king's treasury according to contract.

Antiochus gives his daughter Cleopatra in marriage to Ptolemy.

At this juncture the Samaritans were in a flourishing state and condition, and greatly harassed the Jews by vexatious incursions, carrying many of them away captives; and these ravages were chiefly committed during the time of the high-priest Onias: for after the death of Eleazar, his uncle Manasses succeeded; and after his death Onias, the son of Simon the Just, which Simon was the brother of Eleazar, as before observed. This Onias was poor in soul, weak in intellects, and covetous in disposition; so that by refusing to pay the customary tribute which his ancestors had done, he incensed Ptolemy Euergetes, the father of Philopates, to such a degree, that he sent ambassadors expressly to Jerusalem, with a menace to demand the payment, upon peril of having an army quartered upon their country at discretion, and a new plantation of soldiers settled there, if they did not immediately comply. The Jews were greatly alarmed at the purport of this embassy; but Onias was so fondly avaritious, that with him no menaces could have any effect.

The Jews are distressed by the Samaritans.

Onias, the high priest, offends the king of Egypt, by refusing to pay tribute.

CHAP. IV.

Joseph, the nephew of Onias, the high-priest, intercedes for his uncle with king Ptolemy, and advances himself and family. His death.

THERE were at that time one Joseph, a man who had acquired great reputation among the people of Jerusalem for his prudence and justice. He was the son of Tobias, by the sister of Onias, the high-priest. Being informed by his mother, while he was at Phicola, the place of his birth, of the menacing message delivered by the ambassador, he hastened to Jerusalem, and reproved Onias for not attending to the safety and welfare of his countrymen, as well as exposing exposing the nation to imminent danger, by refusing to pay the tribute-money according to the custom of his predecessors. He reminded him that, for that very important purpose, he had received the authority he held, and been appointed high-priest. But that if his heart was so clogged by avarice, that he would sacrifice his country and friends, rather than refund a part of what was committed to his trust; he advised him to make a dutiful application to the king, and endeavour to persuade him to remit either the whole or a part of the sum demanded. Onias replied, that he was not so much attached to his office, considered either in a civil or sacerdotal capacity, but that he would resign both, if he might be permitted, rather than apply to the king upon so disagreeable a concern, which he therefore desired to wave, as wholly averse to his inclination.

Determined to go on an embassy to Ptolemy.

Joseph then asked him if he would permit him to go upon the commission, as an ambassador, in behalf of the nation? Having obtained his hearty concurrence, Joseph went up to the temple, and calling the multitude together, exhorted them not to be alarmed by terrifying apprehensions from the remissness of his uncle Onias, as he would attend the king in their name, and exert his utmost endeavours to effect a reconciliation of the point in dispute. The whole multitude gave him thanks for the proposal, and left the business entirely to his direction. Upon this he went to the king's commissioner, and having entertained him splendidly for several days, and made him valuable presents, dismissed him to his master, with an assurance that he would speedily follow him. He became more and more anxious for this expedition, not only from the invitation and engagement of the king's commissioner, but the promise he had given to use his influence with his master, by which he made no doubt that the young adventurer would gain his point. Indeed he was so captivated with the grace of Joseph's person, the elegance of his deportment, and the gravity of his manners, that, upon his return to Egypt, he represented the sordid temper of Onias, and the agreeable disposition of Joseph, in such terms to his master, as greatly prepossessed both him and his queen in favour of the latter before they saw him. Joseph sent to his friends for money for his equipage, which, in clothes, horses, carriages, plate, and other necessaries, amounted to twenty thousand drachmas, and, being properly equipped, set out for Alexandria. He happened, in his way, to fall in company with a train of the rulers and principal men of the cities of Syria and Phoenicia, who were going to the king to treat with him concerning the farming of the revenue, according to annual custom. These grandees treated Joseph with a jocular severity, and made him and his retinue the subjects of their derision: nevertheless, he prosecuted his journey.

Alexandria.

Finding, upon his arrival at Alexandria, that king Ptolemy was at Memphis, he immediately set out for that place, in the way to which he had the good fortune to meet the king, the queen, and Athenion, his particular confidant, on their return to Alexandria. This Athenion was the person who was deputed with the embassy to Jerusalem, and there so honourably treated by Joseph. He therefore no sooner saw him, than he gave the king to understand, that he was the young man in whose commendation he had spoken so highly on his return from Jerusalem. Ptolemy then saluted him, took him into his carriage, and mentioned how ill he had been treated by Onias, the high-priest. Joseph respectfully answered, "Sire, an old man is a second time a child: impute nothing to Onias but what his age will excuse. As for us, who have youth, and the power of our faculties, we will give proof of our loyal attachment." The king was so pleased with this candid as well as dutiful reply, that, induced thereby to conceive the highest opinion of the ability and discretion of the speaker, he gave orders, on their arrival at Alexandria, that he should be lodged in the palace, and entertained every day at his own table. This singular token of respect excited the envy of the Syrians, when they observed the honours that were paid to Joseph at Alexandria.

The day of auction being now arrived, when the several branches of the revenue were to be put up, the Syrian and Phœnician noblemen, whom Joseph had seen on his way to Alexandria, endeavoured to undervalue them, offering no more than eight thousand talents for all the duties of Cœlo-Syria, Phœnicia, Judea, and Samaria. Joseph censured the contractors, for offering a composition so inferior to the real value of the revenues, and proposed doubling it himself, over and above the forfeitures which these publicans had reserved for themselves. The king was so highly pleased with this proposal for the improvement of his revenue, that he asked Joseph what security he could give? Joseph told him, his securities were undoubted. The king ordered him to name them; and upon his answering, that he doubted not but his majesty and the queen would be mutually bound for his justice and honour, the king, from the high opinion he entertained of him, immediately appointed him receiver-general of all those provinces; a circumstance which greatly mortified those whole intentions were to have purchased the farming of the revenue at an under-value.

Joseph, on his appointment to this high office, desired a guard of two thousand soldiers to support him in collecting the duty, in case of opposition; and thereupon, having borrowed five hundred talents of the king's friends in Alexandria, he proceeded towards Syria to execute his office. On his arrival at a place called Askalon, and demanding the king's tribute, the people not only refused payment, but insulted him in the most outrageous manner; upon which he punished twenty of the ringleaders, by bringing them to exemplary justice, raised a thousand talents out of their forfeited estates, and sent the treasure to the king, with an account of his proceedings. Ptolemy was so satisfied with the discretion of his conduct, that he left the whole business to him; and this recent example of severity upon the people of Askalon had such an effect on the rest of the Syrians, that they set open their gates in all places to Joseph, and paid their taxes without scruple.

The inhabitants of Scythopolis followed the precedent of those of Askalon, in an obstinate refusal of their customary imposts, and in contempt of the king's officers and authority; so that Joseph was under a necessity of dealing with the ringleaders there as he had done with the former upon the same occasion, confiscating their estates, and applying the forfeiture to the king's use, and the support of government. He sent valuable presents to the king, queen, and their principal adherents, by which means he conciliated many powerful friends.

In this situation did Joseph continue for the space of twenty-two years, and became the father of seven sons by one wife; and he had one other son, whose name was Hyrcanus, by the daughter of his brother Solymius, whom he took to wife on the following occasion:

Travelling to Alexandria with his brother, accompanied by his daughter, who, being marriageable, he took thither, in order to give her in wedlock to some Jew of quality. As he was at supper with the king, he became passionately enamoured with a beautiful maid that danced there for the entertainment of the royal guests. He made his brother the only confidant of the secret, desiring him, as he could not, by the Jewish law, marry a stranger, to be subservient to his desire of obtaining a private interview with the object of his affection. His brother seemed cordially to accede to the proposal, and arraying his daughter in suitable attire, conveyed her to Joseph's bed. Joseph, being disordered by the fumes of the regale, passed the first night with his brother's daughter, without discovering the error. This abuse was practised on him repeatedly, till Joseph, becoming more and more enamoured of his fair, though unknown, partner, complained to his brother of his hard fate, in being prohibited, by the law and religion of his country, from marrying the woman he most ardently loved. Solymius told him he need not perplex himself with so disagreeable an apprehension, as he might lawfully marry the object of his affection. He then discovered to him the whole affair, telling him, that, instead of the admired dancer, he had conveyed his own daughter to his bed, thinking it less criminal to sustain an indignity, in the person of his daughter, than suffer his brother to be guilty of so heinous and dishonourable an offence, as that of joining himself to a strange woman, in violation of one of the most sacred laws. The great surprize of this discovery, and the singular instance of the regard Solymius had shewn for the preservation of his religion and honour, had so prevailing an effect on the mind of Joseph, that he immediately married his daughter, and of her was born Hyrcanus, as before observed.

Hyrcanus is born, and in early life discovers singular talents.

This Hyrcanus, at the age of thirteen years, gave such proofs of superior genius, as well as superior virtue, that he became, as is too natural, the envy of all his brethren, from gaining an ascendancy over the minds of all to whom he had an opportunity of discovering his amiable qualifications. Joseph, in order to make an experiment of the ability and disposition of his several sons, sent them to such masters as had acquired the greatest reputation for instructing of youth; but the seven elder, through dulness or sloth, returned without making the least proficiency in useful or ornamental knowledge. He sent out last his youngest son, Hyrcanus, upon a seven day's journey into the desert, with 300 yoke of oxen, bidding him plow and sow there, having first privately taken away the lines that should join the yoke and plough together. When Hyrcanus came to the place, and wanted the necessary tackle, he was advised by the husbandmen to send home to his father for it; but being averse to losing his time, he projected a plan worthy of the most experienced age. He caused ten yoke of the oxen to be slain, and dividing the carcases amongst the husbandmen and servants, cut their hides into thongs, made the necessary tackle of the same, ploughed and sowed the land according to his father's appointment, and then returned home. His father was highly pleased with this instance of his sagacity, and shewed him such peculiar tokens of affection and favour, as excited the envy and hatred of his brethren.

Hyrcanus devises a most artful expedient.

About this time Joseph received intelligence that Ptolemy's queen, Cleopatra, was delivered of a son, to the joy of the subjects in general. As upon this occasion it might be required of him, amongst other great officers of state, to congratulate the king and queen, he determined, as a journey from Jerusalem to Alexandria would be too fatiguing to him in his advanced years, to send one of his sons in his stead. To try how they stood affected to this expedition, he called them together, and severally asked them which would chuse to engage in the business? The eldest positively refused; another apologized, by saying, he was totally unacquainted with the customs and ceremonies of a court; in short, the rest declined the undertaking, on some pretence or other, till at length it was resolved, as well with the approbation of Joseph, as the rest of his sons, that Hyrcanus should be sent, who, though the youngest, was, from his superior and distinguished abilities, the best qualified for such a negotiation.

Hyrcanus appointed to congratulate Ptolemy on the birth of a son, in lieu of his father.

This matter being adjusted, Joseph asked his son, what he thought would be sufficient to defray the expences of his embassy, and purchase the necessary presents for the king and queen. Hyrcanus told him ten talents; and recommended that, instead of sending the presents from Judæa, they should be purchased at Alexandria, for which purpose he might write to his agent there, to furnish him with what was requisite. Joseph complied with his son's request, and gave him letters of credit upon Arion, the person in Alexandria to whom he remitted the money collected in Syria, to be deposited in the royal treasury, which, at that time, did not amount to less than three thousand talents.

He makes an exorbitant demand on Arion his father's agent.

As soon as he arrived at Alexandria, Hyrcanus went to Arion, produced his letters of credit, and demanded, instead of ten, a thousand talents. Surprized at so great a demand, Arion refused compliance, saying, "What! do you want to waste it in luxury? Your father's fortune was made by industry, and you would do well to follow his example. I will give you only ten talents, and those I will see expended in the presents you are to make."

This abrupt reply highly offended Hyrcanus, who, for some time, expostulated with him; but finding him continue absolute in not complying with his demand, he, by his superiority of power, in consequence of his father's authority, had him committed to prison. The wife of Arion, who was on good terms with the queen, informed her of the treatment her husband had received from Hyrcanus, and the queen related the particulars of the whole to the king. In consequence of this, the king sent him a message, expressing his astonishment at his conduct, and ordering him immediately to attend, and clear himself of the charge alledged against him. Hyrcanus desired the messenger to inform his master, that as, by the Jewish law, no man was permitted to eat of the flesh of any thing that was sacrificed that had not been first in the temple, and offered sacrifice himself, so, in his case, he dare not presume to wait upon the king, till he had first presented the oblations, with which his father had entrusted him, in testimony of his gratitude and duty; and that, with regard to punishing a refractory servant, he thought himself justified, as the ill example of an inferior might at length effect the king himself; and where authority was despised, the precedent might be dangerous.

On his refusal, complaisance has him in prison.

Vindication of Hyrcanus to the king.

He obtains the thousand talents of Arion.

When the king received this answer, instead of being offended with Hyrcanus, he highly applauded him for the dignity of his sentiments; and Arion, finding he had no reason to expect favour or protection from the king, compounded for his liberty by paying him the thousand talents he had demanded. Three days after Hyrcanus went to court to pay his respects to the king and queen, where he had the honour, from the singular regard they retained for his father, to be admitted to the royal table. As soon as Hyrcanus had received the money of Arion, he contracted privately with certain merchants for an hundred of the most comely boys, and the like number of beautiful girls, at the price of a talent a head. Being invited after this to a magnificent entertainment given by the king, together with other persons of the first rank, the officers who had the conduct of the ceremony, and the arrangement of the guests, assigned Hyrcanus, on account of his youth, the lowest place at the table. That part of the company which sat next him looking upon him with contempt, resolved to shew their disrespect by laying their bones before him, and setting on Tryphon, the king's jester, to taunt him with ridicule. This the jester attempted to do, by desiring the king, with an impertinent sneer, to notice the circumstance, saying, at the same time, that as the son had scraped the bones before him, so had the father picked the bones of all Syria. The king could not but smile at the drollery of the conceit, and asked Hyrcanus how he came to have so many bones piled before him. "Sire, (replied he, looking stedfastly on the company), dogs eat bones as well as meat; but men put the bones aside." This facetious answer highly pleased the king; and, instead of the laugh being thrown on Hyrcanus, it fell on Tryphon, and the company that affected to treat him with contempt and mockery.

Is treated by the king's guests with railery.

His present

The next day Hyrcanus founded the servants of the great men, who came on the errand of congratulation on the birth of the prince, as to the sum their masters intended to present. Some said twelve talents, some more, and others less; while Hyrcanus, from design, affected to be uneasy, upon pretence that he could not come up to their proportion, as he could advance no more than five. This artful pretence of poverty was highly pleasing to the servants, who failed not to tell their masters of it; so that those grandees exulted in the thought how contemptible the youth would appear in the king's eye, by the smallness of his present. But they were soon mistaken; for, on the day appointed for the ceremony of their oblations, the largest gift was twenty talents, except that made by Hyrcanus, who presented the hundred boys to the king, and the hundred girls to the queen, and with each of them a talent for another present over and above. This was so unexpected and excessive a munificence, that it struck the king and company with astonishment; but Hyrcanus gave many, exclusive of this, to the king's ministers and officers, in order to avoid the danger he apprehended from those who were suborned to injure, nay, to destroy him.

The expense of his present conciliates the chiefs of the king and queen.

This distinguished liberality of Hyrcanus so wrought on the queen, that he became the greatest favourite at court, and was desired to prefer his request, with assurance of obtaining it. Of this generous offer he made no other use than to solicit the king for letters of of recommendation to his father and brethren. The king took an honourable leave of him, bestowed on him presents worthy the acceptance of a prince, and, with commendatory letters to his father, brethren, and his own governors and officers, dismissed him with every token of respect.

When his brethren heard of the magnificent reception he had met with from the king and queen, and how much his character was aggrandized by this embassy, they entered into a combination to go out of the town, meet him on his return, and take away his life, and this with the privacy of his father, who was greatly disgusted at the enormous expence of his late presents, and therefore, in reality, very little anxious for his preservation: though he dissembled the matter, through fear of the king.

It came, however, to this issue, that the brothers met and assaulted him on his return; but, through a valiant resistance on the part of himself and suite, they lost a considerable number of their train: two of the brethren were slain on the spot, and the rest escaped to their father at Jerusalem. Hyrcanus then proceeded to the city; but meeting with a very cool reception there, and being apprehensive of danger, he crossed the river Jordan for his security, and there spent the remainder of his life in collecting the king's duties from the barbarians.

This was in the reign of Seleucus, king of Asia, otherwise called Soter, or the Saracen, being the son of Antiochus the Great. About this time died Joseph, the father of Hyrcanus; a man of eminent piety and magnanimity, and inflexibly attached to the interest of his country, which he essentially promoted in the most important concerns. He executed the office of receiver general of the public imports in Syria, Phœnicia, and Samaria, for the space of twenty-two years, and acquitted himself with the utmost probity. His uncle Onias died about the same time, and left the priesthood to his son Simon, who was succeeded by Onias, to whom Arius, king of Lacedæmon, sent an embassy on the following terms.

CHAP. V.

Arius, king of Lacedæmon, cultivates the friendship of the Jews. Last memorable act of Hyrcanus, who falls by his own hands.

"Arius, king of the Lacedæmonians, to Onias, high-priest, sendeth greeting:

"WHEREAS there is come to our hand an ancient manuscript, setting forth that both the Jews and Lacedæmonians are of one stock, as derived from the stock of Abraham; it is, therefore, but just and reasonable for brethren, so nearly allied, to do all good offices one towards another. This, then, is to offer you the command of any thing within our power to serve you, as we shall look upon your concerns as our own, and that we are united in one common interest. You receive this epistle from our trusty subject and servant Demoteles, written on a quarto page, and sealed with the figure of an eagle holding a dragon in the claws." This was the purport of the epistle, in which the Lacedæmonians claimed kindred with the Jews.

Upon the death of Joseph, mutiny and sedition prevailed amongst the people, by means of a contest between Hyrcanus and his surviving brothers about the paternal estate. The multitude was divided; but the high-priest, and majority of the people, took the part of the brothers; so that Hyrcanus, not thinking it safe to return to Jerusalem, kept his retreat beyond the Jordan, where he was harassed by a perpetual war with the Arabians, many of whom he slew, and carried away others into captivity.

In this retreat Hyrcanus caused to be erected a strong castle, the walls of which were of white stone, with the figures of divers kinds of animals, of an extraordinary size and proportion, curiously carved on them. The castle was encompassed by a deep ditch or fifth pond; and vaults, of several furlongs in length, were cut through a mountain opposite to it; but, for the sake of security, they were only wide enough, at the mouth, for one man to enter at a time. Within the castle were lodging, dining rooms, and other places of entertainment, with stately buildings, courts, gardens, and fountains. To this place, thus completely finished, he gave the name of Tyre. It is situated upon the borders of Arabia and Judæa, beyond Jordan, not far from the country of the Essebonites. Hyrcanus held the government of those parts for seven years, that is, during the whole time that Seleucus reigned in Syria. Upon his demise, he was succeeded by his brother Antiochus, who was called Epiphanes. Ptolemy, who was also called Epiphanes, died about the same time, and left behind him two sons in their minority: the name of the elder was Philometor; that of the younger Phylcon. Antiochus was, at that time, a very powerful prince, and had a most powerful army, inasmuch that Hyrcanus, dreading his vengeance for his inroads upon the Arabians, laid violent hands upon himself, and Antiochus took possession of his goods and territories.

He gives it the name of Tyre.

Factions prevail among the Jews concerning the high-priesthood. Antiochus makes an inroad into Egypt, but is intimidated by the Romans.

ONIAS, the high-priest, dying about this time, Antiochus Epiphanes advanced to that office his brother Jesus, in the minority of his son then living, concerning whom we shall speak hereafter. This Jesus soon after incurring the king's displeasure, he deposed him from the pontificate, and transferred it to Onias, the younger brother. There were three sons of Simon, who all attained to the dignity of the high-priesthood, as we have already set forth. This Jesus took upon himself the name of Jason, ■ did Onias that of Menelaus.

On the death of Onias, Jesus, or Jason, succeeds to the pontificate.

In this fluctuating state of the pontificate, one brother raised a party against the other, and the people thereupon divided. The sons of Tobias espoused the interest of the new high-priest, Menelaus; but the majority of the people declared in favour of Jason, and, by superior power, so overcame their opponents, that Menelaus, and his adherents, the sons of Tobias, withdrew to Antioch, declaring they would be no longer bound by the laws and institutions of their country, but profess the religion of their king, and the Grecian laws and customs, desiring liberty, at the same time, to erect a gymnasium, or place for public exercises, in Jerusalem. Having obtained this licence, they devised means so to change their bodily appearance, that there was no visible difference between them and the Greeks. In a word, they totally abolished the religion, laws, customs, and manners, of their own country, and assumed a profession and practice of other nations.

Apostasy of Menelaus and his faction.

Antiochus, finding matters in general in a prosperous situation at home, was induced to try an expedition against Egypt, partly from an ambitious view of reducing the country, and partly from a presumption of the inability of the sons of Ptolemy to conduct a war of such importance. Thus resolved, he marched with a mighty army to Pelusium, where he circumvented Ptolemy Philometor by craft, and got footing into Egypt. He then advanced to Memphis, and other places adjacent, which having reduced, he proceeded to Alexandria, with a design at once of subduing both king and city. But, upon the peremptory command of the Romans, who threatened him if he continued to persevere, with the severest chastisement, he desisted from his design, relinquished his conquests, and took his departure from that country. I now deem it necessary to expatiate on the acts of this Antiochus, and fully set forth the manner of his taking Jerusalem and the temple, as they are subjects worthy of record.

ANTIOCHUS, after his precipitate retreat from Egypt, through terror of the menaces of the Romans, marched his army to Jerusalem, and entered tered the city in the hundred and forty-third year from the time that the kingdom of Syria fell into the hands of Seleucus. He made himself master of the city without striking a blow, the gates being set open to him by a party he had formed in the town, where, having exercised the greatest cruelties, and put numbers to the sword, without distinction of friend or foe, he carried away an immense booty to Antioch.

This calamity happened in the second year after the taking of the city, in the hundred and forty-fifth year from the first Seleucus, the twenty-fifth day of the month, which we call Chasleu, the Macedonians Appellæus, and in the hundred and fifty third olympiad. Such was the savage ferocity of the army of Antiochus, that they spared not even those who opened the gates, and thereby paved their admission to the temple, and, through treachery to their country, laid open their dearest possessions to the most rapacious plunderers.

The temple, in short, was entirely rifled, all the holy vessels and utensils taken away, with the golden candlesticks, the golden altar, and the table of shewbread. The curtains, and the embroidery of silks, fine linen, nay, the secret places, where they concealed an immense mass of treasure, were all laid open and exposed, inasmuch, that not a relic remained of this prodigious store of wealth. To consummate the misery of this wretched people, their daily sacrifices were forbidden, the city levelled with the ground, its inhabitants partly slain, and partly led away captives, together with their wives and children, to the number of ten thousand, their walls demolished, and their stately edifices consumed by fire. They erected in the city a tower, that overlooked the temple, into which, when they had fortified it, they put a garrison of Macedonians, but not without a mixture of execrable apostate Jews, who were more inimical to the citizens than their most inveterate foreign enemies.

They erected an idol altar in the temple, and sacrificed swine upon it, in palpable violation of the sacred laws and institutions of the Jews. Those who refused to renounce the worship of the true God, and pay adoration to idols, were subject to the greatest barbarities; and, throughout all the cities and towns of Judæa, they erected temples and altars for the daily sacrifice of swine. They laid a heavy penalty on those Jews who circumcised their children, retaining officers and informers, either to prosecute them for disobeying their injunctions, or extort from them obedience, by terror and threatening.

Awed by the dreadful apprehensions of the most horrid cruelties, the greater part of the Jews complied with the king's commands. Some there were, indeed; amongst them, of such inflexible piety and virtue, that they stood firm against the trials of the severest tortures, and even of death itself, rather than depart from the religion and laws of their country; having their bodies lacerated with whips, and then crucified alive, with their wives, and so many of their children as were circumcised, hanging about their necks, according to the king's command. The holy scriptures were destroyed wherever they were found, and it was made death for any person even to mention them.

When the Samaritans found the Jews reduced to so miserable a state of distress, they disclaimed all kindred with them, extolling the temple of Gerizim as the temple of God; so that they wavered according as their interest led them, as before observed. At this crisis they pretended to be of the race of the Medes and Persians, and that they would entirely detach themselves from so wretched a people as the Jews. To this effect they dispatched an address to Antiochus, couched in terms to the following import.

"To king Antiochus Epiphanes, the illustrious prince, memorial of the Sidonians, inhabitants of Shechem.

"That the ancestors of your memorialists, lying under the affliction of many grievous plagues in their own country, were partly wrought on by that calamity, and partly prevailed on by the superstition of ancient custom, to join in the religious observance of a certain festival which the Jews call the sabbath, and in the erecting of a temple upon

"mount Gerizim, where sacrifices were offered to a god without name. Now, since you have been pleased to order this wicked people to be punished according to their deserts, and to appoint officers, who, upon a supposition that we are all of the same stock, are thereby induced to involve us with the Jews in the same crime; and whereas we derive our origin from the Sidonians, as we can make appear by the public records, which are extant to this day; it is our humble request, that, out of your clemency and goodness, you would issue such order to Apollonius, our governor, and to Nicanor, his deputy, that they may not in future be molested, upon suspicion of any correspondence or confederacy with the Jews, to whom we are as much strangers in our manners as in our extraction. And we do further pray, that the temple that hath hitherto stood without any dedication at all, may, from this time forward, be called the temple of Jupiter of Greece, to the end that we may live in greater security and freedom, as to our own private concerns, and the advancement of your service and revenue."

In answer to this memorial of the Samaritans, king Antiochus thus wrote.

"King Antiochus to Nicanor.

"Having received a memorial from the Sidonians at Shechem, which we have annexed to this letter, this gives you to understand, that it appeareth unto us, and to our council, upon the information of the bearers hereof, that the Sidonians are in no instance guilty of the crimes charged upon them by the Jews; but, on the contrary, entirely govern themselves by the customs and manners of the Greeks: it is, therefore, our royal will and pleasure, that they be no farther molested concerning this matter. With respect to the temple, it is our will likewise, that, from this time forward, it be known and distinguished by the name of the temple of Jupiter of Greece. We have written to the same effect also to our governor Apollonius. Dated in the forty-sixth year, and the eleventh day of the month of Hecantombæon.

C H A P. VIII.

The zeal and resolution of Matthias and his sons for the religion of their country. Dying address of Matthias.

THERE dwelt at this time in Modin, a village of Judæa, one Matthias, a priest, of the family of Joarib, and a native of Jerusalem. This Matthias was the son of John, the son of Simon, and Simon the son of Armonæus. Matthias had five sons; Joannan, who was called Gaddis; Simon, who was called Thaffi; Judas, who was called Maccabæus; Jonathan, who was called Apphus; and Eleazar, who was called Auran. Matthias would frequently condole with his sons on the deplorable state of the Jewish nation, the desolating their city, the pillaging and prophanation of their temple, with numberless other calamities. They would often animate each other with this suggestion, that it would be more glorious to fall a sacrifice to the laws and religion of their country, than linger out a wretched life of the most abject servility. When the king's officers arrived in the village to enforce the execution of their master's commands, they began with Matthias as a person of authority, and one who might be a leading example to the rest. They pointed out to him the danger of disobedience, with the advantages and rewards that would attend compliance, and, upon those terms, warmly enjoined him, in the king's name, to worship as he was commanded. These injunctions he not only refused to obey, but moreover assured them, that, if every individual within their master's dominions would obey him in that particular command, he was determined not to submit, and it would be his constant advice to his sons never to abandon the laws and religion of their country.

Matthias had no sooner acquainted the officers with his resolution, but one of the Jews proceeded to sacrifice according to the manner prescribed. But Matthias thias, and his sons, were so incensed at the indignity of this offence, that, in a rage, they slew not only the apostate Jew, but the king's officer, Apelles, as he was compelling the people to that abominable worship. They also overthrew the idol altar; Matthias exclaiming to the people around him, "As many of you as have any regard for your religion or honour, follow me." Upon this the father and sons withdrew into the wilderness, leaving their goods and effects behind them. Many of the people, animated by so generous an example, fled with their wives and children into the same desert, where they lived some time in caves. When the king's officers received intelligence of this desertion, they drew the forces out of the citadel of Jerusalem, and marched after the Jews into the wilderness.

Massacre of the Jews on the sabbath day.

Upon overtaking them, they first expostulated with them mildly, recommending them to act with more moderation and compliance, and not lay the soldiers under the disagreeable necessity of proceeding to a military execution. But when they found that neither the harshest menaces, or the mildest persuasions, could prevail, they pitched on the sabbath day for the attack, and accordingly burnt and destroyed them in their caves without any resistance: for such was the reverence in which the Jews held that sacred day, and the zeal they maintained for the observance of their laws, that they chose rather to perish than prophane it. The number of men, women, and children, that were suffocated under ground, amounted to about a thousand; but great numbers made their escape, and enlisted under the banner of Matthias. This zealous defender of the religion and laws of his country pointed out to them the legality and necessity of opposing an hostile attack on the sabbath, as well as any other day, as such mere scruple would end in their total destruction; for their enemies, availing themselves of that superstition, would certainly fall upon them at a time when they were sure they should meet with no resistance. This argument had a most convincing effect: they were all fully satisfied of the lawfulness of taking up arms upon the sabbath in cases of necessity; and the practice, in such cases, continues to this day.

Matthias, in process of time, acquired such influence, and raised such numerous and powerful adherents, that he overthrew their idol altars, and slew all apostates, who violated the laws, wherever he could find them. He commanded circumcision, that had been forbidden, to be restored, and put to flight the king's officers who were appointed to suppress that ancient practice: many of them, indeed, had dispersed through fear of his vindictive power.

Having thus nobly asserted the laws and religion of his country, and removed every obstacle to the observance of their rites and ceremonies, during the course of a full year, Matthias fell into a disemper, which he apprehending to be mortal, called for his sons, and addressed them to the following purport:

Matthias addressing his sons
on his death-bed.

"My dear sons, as my life is verging to a period, I am now to charge you, as you tender my blessing, before I go hence, that you maintain, with unshaken resolution, the cause your father has asserted before you with dauntless perseverance. Remember my dying injunction, and fail not to execute it. Exert your uttermost ability in the support of the rights and laws of your country, and the restoration of a nation ready to fall a sacrifice to idolatry. Shun all connection with those who, either through fear or interest, have basely betrayed it. Approve yourselves worthy of such a father, and, in contempt of force and extremest danger, expose your lives, and yield them up with cheerfulness, if occasion should require, in defence of your country; bearing in mind that such resignation is acceptable to God, who, as the reward of your pious resolution, will restore to your country its former glorious privileges, and uncorrupted religion and laws. Our bodies, indeed, are mortal; but great and noble actions will immortalize our memory. To this glory I aspire; that is, the glory which, by your illustrious achievements, you will acquire in after ages. Preserve unanimity amongst yourselves, and yield to the judgment of each other in those points wherein you respectively excel. As for example: Simon possesses quick penetration "and discernment, I would recommend him as your counsel. Maccabæus, being of a warlike disposition, should be appointed general, as best qualified for the vindication of his country's cause, and the total overthrow of his enemies. Encourage and protect men of piety and virtue, and let these be the motives of your own conduct, and then fear nothing."

CHAP. IX.

Judas Maccabæus succeeds his father Matthias in the command.

WHEN Matthias had given this exhortation to his sons, he addressed his prayers to the Almighty for a blessing on their joint endeavours towards the redemption of their countrymen, and the recovery of their ancient rights and privileges. He departed this life soon after, and was interred with due pomp and solemnity. When the funeral obsequies were over, his son Judas, called Maccabæus, was vested with the public administration of affairs, in the hundred and forty-sixth year after Seleucus the first. He was so well supported by his brothers, that he expelled the enemy from their country, put the transgressors of its laws to the sword, and purged it from all the abominable pollutions with which it had abounded.

On the death of Matthias, Judas succeeds to the command, and acquits himself with honour.

CHAP. X.

Judas overthrows the forces of Apollonius and Seron, and slays the generals with his own hand.

THE news of this turn of affairs, in consequence of the valiant exertion of Judas, the son and successor of Matthias, in the military command, being made known to the Syrian court, Antiochus sent orders to Apollonius, his governor in Samaria, to raise what forces he could, and march immediately against the enemy. Apollonius obeyed the king's orders; but his attempt, happily for the Jews, proved not only fruitless, but destructive. Judas, apprized of his intentions, got his friends together, and prepared them in the best manner he could for battle, encouraging them to persevere in the opposition they were about to make, not only for the security of their own lives, but for the preservation of their descendants, and, above all, for their religion and laws.

1 Mac. 3.

Animated by this advice, the forces under Judas marched with great expedition to meet those under Apollonius; the consequence of which was, that a desperate engagement ensued, in which, by the distinguished intrepidity of the Jews, the Samaritan army was soon routed, great numbers slain, and the rest put to flight. The brave Judas, finding Apollonius detached from his army, engaged him in single combat, and, by his prowess, soon dispatched him, took away his sword in triumph, and, as a memento of this signal victory, generally made use of it in future encounters.

Judas defeats the army of the Syrians, and slays their general in single combat.

The news of this defeat soon reached Seron, governor of Coelo Syria, who, in consequence thereof, and the farther information he had received, that reinforcements were daily going over to Judas upon his late success, collected his forces, determined to come to immediate action, holding himself bound in honour to chastize mutineers, and bring rebels to obedience. To this end, with what men he could muster of his own, and the additional force of a rabble of fugitive Jews, he marched on as far as Bethrun, a village in Judæa, where he pitched his camp. In the mean time Judas made the necessary preparations to engage him; but finding his soldiers rather dismayed, from the superior number of the enemy, he endeavoured to dissipate their fears, by addressing them in words to this effect:

"Fellow soldiers, depend not on yourselves, but on the arm of Omnipotence, for victory. Repose not confidence in man, but in the Almighty God. This truth is confirmed by the history of our ancestors, who, with small numbers, have routed thousands, in defence of their religion, laws, and families."

Animates his soldiers.

— families. Truth shall prevail, and innocence remain invincible."

Judas slays Seron, and routs his army.

Having thus spoken, he led his men into the battle, which they maintained with such courage and resolution, that Seron, general of the Syrians, being slain by Judas, and his army totally routed, the scattered troops betook themselves to flight, as the only means of safety. The number of the enemy that fell in the battle was about eight hundred, and the rest made their escape towards the sea-side.

CHAP. XI.

Judas defeats Lyfias and Gorgias. Proceeds to Jerusalem, purifies the temple, and chastises the Philistines.

Antiochus prepares for an expedition into Judæa.

WHEN Antiochus heard of these disasters, he was so enraged, that he vowed revenge on the Jews; to obtain which, he raised a powerful army from amongst his own people, and, with the addition of some Greek mercenaries, determined to invade Judæa early in the next spring. Finding, however, upon mustering his men, that his revenues fell very short of defraying the expenses of so great an army (his tributes being much diminished by the frequent revolts and commotions in his own dominions) he thought it most prudent for himself first to go into Persia, and there endeavour to raise a supply of money to assist him in the prosecution of his design.

Leaves Lyfias to prosecute the war against the Jews, upon his going into Persia.

But, before he went on this expedition, he constituted Lyfias, an officer of approved fidelity, governor of all the country betwixt Egypt and the Euphrates, leaving him in charge of his son Antiochus, until his return. He also gave him particular orders, upon the reduction of Judæa, and the sale of all the inhabitants for slaves, to destroy the city, and extirpate the nation. Having adjusted these matters, he set out for Persia, and passing the Euphrates, advanced into the higher countries.

Lyfias raises an army to encounter Judas.

Lyfias, the better to execute his commission, took to his assistance three eminent commanders, Ptolemy, the son of Dorymenes, Gorgias, and Nicanor, whom he put at the head of 40,000 foot, and 7000 horse, with orders to march forthwith into Judæa. They advanced as far as Emmaus (a), and there encamped upon the plain, where there came over to them great numbers of auxiliaries from Syria, and other neighbouring countries, with abundance of fugitive Jews, and several merchants with manacles and fetters for the slaves they intended to purchase, being assured, in their minds, that the Jews would be totally defeated.

Though the enemy had raised a most formidable army, Judas exhorted his men to be of good courage, place their hope of victory in the Almighty, and make supplication to him, clothed in sackcloth, according to the custom of their country when in imminent danger, imploring mercy, favour, and protection. His next business was to arrange his men according to ancient order of battle, in regiments, troops, and companies, and dismiss such as were newly married, or had lately gained possessions, lest, by those considerations, they should be intimidated or interrupted in the discharge of their duty. When he had thus disposed his soldiers, in order to animate them to persevere in the undertaking, he addressed them in a speech to this purport.

Animating speech of Judas to his soldiers.

"My fellow soldiers and companions, we shall never again have such an opportunity of shewing our bravery in the defence of our country, and the contempt of all dangers, as we have now before us; for, upon the issue of to-morrow's combat, depends not only our liberty, but all the comforts and advantages that attend it; and over and above the blessings of such a freedom, our very religion lies at stake with it too, nor can we secure the one but by preserving the other. Bethink yourselves well, therefore, what it is you are to contend for, and you will find it to be no less than the sum and substance of the greatest happiness you ever enjoyed, that is to say, the peaceable possession of your antient laws, rights, and discipline. Now, whether you will rather chuse to perish with infamy, and involve the miserable remainder of your countrymen in the same ruin, or venture one generous effort for the redemption of yourselves and your friends, is the point in question. Death is the same thing to the coward that it is to the man of valour, and certain to one or the other; but there is a wide difference between them in point of honour and everlasting fame. The gallant man, who falls in vindication of his religious laws and country, dies to be perpetuated with honour; the pusillanimous coward, at his exit, is consigned to infamy. Take these considerations into your thoughts, and make this use of the meditation, You have nothing to trust to but the providence of God, and your own concurring resolutions; and, at the worst, while we contend for victory, we can never fail of glory."

This speech had the desired effect; the people unanimously declaring they would part with the last drop of their blood in defence of their religion and country.

Judas, soon after this, receiving intelligence that Gorgias was detached from the combined army, with five thousand foot, and a thousand horse, and some fugitive Jews, in order to surprize his camp by night, resolved to anticipate him, and countermine his plot by another of the like kind. In order to this, he called for supper, caused several fires to be left in the camp, and then marched at night towards Emmaus, where the enemy lay. Gorgias, in the mean time, finding the Jewish camp deserted, and presuming that their army had fled through fear to hide themselves in the mountains, imagined he had nothing to do but to go in quest of them. About day-break Judas reached the enemy's camp with only three thousand men, and those too ill-armed. Finding the enemy accoutred at all points, and their camp in good order, he told his people, for their encouragement, that they should not fear to attack them, even if they were entirely destitute of weapons, so long as they were certain of God's favour and protection, which would support them under all difficulties: with these words he ordered the charge to be sounded, and his men rushing in upon the enemy at the same instant, threw them into such surprize, that, after putting to the sword those that resisted, the rest betook themselves to flight, and the Jews pursued them as far as Gadara, and to the plains of Idumæa, or Azotus, and Jamina. The number of the slain was about three thousand.

But Judas would not suffer his people to take the spoil, as the troops of Gorgias were yet entire, which, when they had routed, he told them they might take possession of the booty at leisure. While he was uttering these words, the troops of Gorgias, discovering, from an eminence, the dead bodies of their fellow-soldiers, the havock that had been made in their tents, and their camp covered with sinoak, they took it for granted that the Jews were still embodied, and in condition to attack them. This occasioned so general a consternation, that they immediately fled, and dispersed themselves in different quarters. The victory being thus gained, without a blow, Judas suffered his men to proceed to the pillage of the field, where they found gold and silver, rich habits of purple and scarlet, and a booty of every kind in great abundance. With this they marched off triumphing, singing, and giving thanks to God, the blessed author of that victory, which proved both an earnest and a foundation of their future freedom.

The great success of Judas so mortified Lyfias, that, to redeem his credit, he brought into the field, the year following, an army of sixty thousand foot, and five thousand horse, all select men, and with this powerful body he entered into Judæa, by the way of the mountains, and encamped at a place called Beth-sura. Judas, undiminished by the superior number of the enemy, advanced against them with only ten thousand men, and having offered up a short and fervent prayer for success, he attacked the enemy with such resolution, that, upon the first check, he forced their lines, and killed upwards of five thousand men upon the spot. The army of Lyfias was so irritated at this disaster, that they told their commander they were determined either to conquer or die; but Lyfias, considering this only as a mark of despair, instead of continuing the battle, sounded a retreat, and, with his forces, withdrew to Antioch, where he posted himself, by the help of mercenaries, and other additional reinforcements, to be ready for the first opportunity of a revenge upon the Jews.

Animated by these repeated successes, Judas, after encouraging his adherents to rely on the continued protection of the Almighty, proposed marching to Jerusalem, and attempting once more to possess themselves of that ancient city, to offer up sacrifices and purge the temple, so that they might again restore the worship of the God of Israel. When they came thither, and found the gates destroyed, the temple abandoned, and the courts overgrown with weeds, they could not refrain from weeping at the deplorable situation of the place. The two great works he first entered upon, were the assault of the citadel, and the purging of the temple. The former he committed to his officers and soldiers, and reserved the care of the other to himself. He therefore immediately set people to purge it from those profanations with which, for some time, it had been defiled. This being done in due form, he furnished it with utensils, vessels, a candlestick, a table, and an altar of incense, all of pure gold. He likewise made new doors to it, and put up veils and hangings on the walls. The altar, which had been profaned by sacrifices and burnt offerings to idols, was also demolished and removed, and a new one, of unhewn stone, according to the Mosaic precept, placed in its stead.

Upon the twenty-fifth day of the month Casleu, they set lighted tapers in the candlesticks, offered incense upon the altar, laid the shew-bread upon the table, and proceeded to their oblations of burnt offerings. It so fell out, that this happened precisely upon the same day three years after the profanation of the temple by the cruel and abandoned Antiochus; the temple having been now deserted full three years. The desolation happened in the hundred and forty-fifth year, on the twenty-fifth day of the month Apelleus, and on the hundred and fifty third Olympiad. It was dedicated a-new on the same day, the twenty-fifth of the month Apelleus, on the hundred and forty-eighth year, and the hundred and fifty-fourth Olympiad, the prophet Daniel had expressly foretold four hundred and eighty years before this desolation came to pass.

Judas continued this festival eight days, with sacrifices, rejoicing and feasting, while the air resounded with thanksgivings and praises from the people, who, during the whole time, were indulged in all reasonable gratifications. The people, in fine, were so transported at the unexpected blessing of finding themselves restored to the religion and laws of their forefathers, that an anniversary was appointed of eight days solemnity to be strictly observed by their posterity ever after, which we have constantly celebrated from that time to this, under the title of the Festival of Lights, in allusion to that light which Providence was pleased to bestow on the children of Israel.

Judas, in the mean time, rebuilt the walls of the city, and fortified them with strong towers to keep off an enemy, settling a garrison in Bethsura, and putting the place into a state and posture of defence.

The neighbouring nations were so irritated at the growing power and confidence of the Jews, that they set their instruments at work by fraud and treachery to circumvent them, destroying many of them when they were off their guard. Judas, however, used the best means to prevent or disappoint their incursions. He fell at this time upon Acrahan, where he slew great numbers of the Edomites, the posterity of Esau, making himself master also of a great booty. He blocked up the sons of Baan, likewise their chief, in the strong places they were possessed of, and where they lay in wait to make sallies on the Jews: he took the places by assault, killed the defendants, and laid the forts in ashes. Having subdued these people, he carried his victorious arms against the Ammonites, who had then a numerous army under the command of Timotheus. These he also overcame, took the city of Jazar, carried away the wives and children of the inhabitants captive, and, after pillaging the city, set it on fire, and so returned to Judaea. The neighbouring nations no sooner heard of his return, than they availed themselves of his absence, and gathering together at Galaad, made an attempt on the adjacent Jews, who, being forced to take refuge in the fortress of Dathema, gave intimation to Judas, that Timotheus had a design to attack them, and requested assistance. While Judas was reading this intelligence, several messengers came from Galilee with remonstrances and complaints, that the people of Ptolemais, Tyre, and Sidon, and other bordering nations, were all joined in a confederacy against him.

The exploits of Simon, the brother of Judas, in Galilee. Conquest of Judas and Jonathan over the Ammonites. The Jews, with their families and effects, transported out of Galaad into Judaea. Joseph and Azarias disobey orders, and are defeated by Gorgias.

JUDAS, desirous of relieving his distressed countrymen in both places, sent his brother Simon, with three thousand chosen men, to succour the Jews at Galilee, and, with eight thousand more, marched, with his other brother, Jonathan, to Galaad, leaving the rest of the army under the command of Joseph and Azarias, as his lieutenants-general, with orders to avoid any enterprise, but stand wholly on the defensive till his return.

Simon, on his arrival at Galilee, engaged the enemy and defeated them, giving them chase to the very gates of Ptolemais, and killing about three thousand in the pursuit. His army took their spoils, and the Jews they had made captive, with their baggage, and returned to Jerusalem.

Simon succeeds in his expedition.

At the same time Judas, and his brother Jonathan, after three days march beyond Jordan, in the wilderness, were amicably received by the Nabathites, who gave them intelligence of the extreme distress and danger of many of their friends and countrymen, who were shut up in the towns and castles of Galaad, advising them to hasten, with all possible expedition, by way of the desert, to their relief. In their way to this expedition they took the town of Barala, putting to the sword such as were able to bear arms, and burning the city to the ground. Though night came on, Judas prosecuted his march to a castle, wherein he had intelligence the Jews were besieged. Upon his arrival in the morning, he found the enemy hard at work, with their machines and scaling ladders, to force the place; whereupon he distributed his troops into three divisions, animated his men to behave themselves resolutely for the relief of their countrymen, and, upon sound of trumpet, charged the enemy in the rear. When the army of Timotheus heard that Judas Maccabæus had the command of this action, a person of whose valour and conduct they had already had dreadful experience, they took such a panic at the very name, that they immediately fled. But Judas followed them, and slew about eight thousand in the pursuit. Turning aside they took a town of the barbarians, called Mallam, where they put all the males to death, and destroyed the city by fire. From thence he went and overthrew Casphan, Bosar, and other places in that country.

Soon after this Timotheus raised a formidable army, and, amongst other auxiliaries, had a band of Arabians. They crossed the river, and encamped near Raphon, where he exhorted his people to behave like men, and, in all events, prevent the Jews from crossing the river, as the whole depended upon that; for, by gaining the pass, they would certainly carry the day. When Judas understood that Timotheus was prepared, and determined to give him battle, he passed the river immediately with his army, gave the onset, put the enemy to the rout upon the first encounter, killed those that resisted, and scattered the rest, who casting away their arms, betook themselves to precipitate flight. Judas calls the captive Jews together to carry them to their own country.

Joseph and Azarias wage war contrary to order, and are defeated.

Having surmounted these difficulties, he gathered together all the Jews that were in the country of Galaad, with their wives, children, and the substance that belonged to them, in order to transport them to Judæa. The city of Ephron, lying so directly in his way that there was no avoiding it, without going a considerable space about, he sent a friendly message to the inhabitants for permission to pass with his army through the town. But the gates being shut, and the avenues cut off, the inhabitants, in plain terms, refused him a passage. Upon this repulse he animated his men, and put them in a position for an attack upon the town, immediately invested it, and, in a day and night, made himself master of it, laid it in ashes, putting all the males that were found in it to the sword. After passing the river Jordan, they advanced to a great plain near Bethsan, called, by the Greeks, Scythopolis, and from thence returned to Judæa, the people rejoicing on their way home in hymns and triumphal songs, and offering sacrifices of thanksgiving for the safety of the army; as they had not so much as lost one Jew in all these encounters.

When Judas, and his brother Jonathan, arrived at Jerusalem, they received a very disagreeable piece of intelligence, which arose from the misconduct of Joseph and Azarias, who were left in command in the absence of Simon, that was sent into Galilee against the people of Ptolemais. Hearing of the successes of Judas in Galaad, these commanders, animated thereby, contrary to orders given, in a fit of emulation, formed an ill-projected expedition against Jamnia; but Gorgias, who commanded in that quarter for the king of Syria, and who had under him a very considerable army, attacked them so forcibly, that their troops were thrown into the utmost disorder, two thousand were slain on the spot, and the rest pursued to the very borders of Judæa. This calamity was in consequence of their disobeying the order of their general, who had privately enjoined them not to engage the enemy upon any terms till his return. The result proved the propriety of the instructions given, from which if they departed, Judas, from his sagacity, knew they would justly suffer.

The valiant brothers prosecuted the war against the Edomites with the utmost vigour, annoying them in every part. They took Hebron by force, demolished its fortifications, laid the enemy's country waste, then proceeded to Marissa, and thence to Azotus, both of which they over-ran and pillaged; and, loaded with the honours and spoils of victory, returned triumphant to Jerusalem.

Judas, after many valiant exploits, returns to Jerusalem.

2 Mac 9.

Antiochus is repulsed from the siege of Elymais.

Pursued by the enemy to Babylon.

Dies in torture of mind and body, acknowledging the justice of his punishment.

ANTIOCHUS, in his progress through the upper parts of Persia, hearing there was a very opulent city called Elymais, with a most magnificent temple in it dedicated to Diana, in which were deposited divers valuable donations, and the very shields and breast-plates of Alexander the Great, was tempted thereby to lay siege to it: but the inhabitants, regardless of his power or design, made a noble resistance, and frustrated his towering expectation: nor did they merely repel him from the walls, but pursued him so closely on his retreat, that they cut off great part of the rear, and drove him before them like a fugitive for protection into Babylon. While he was lamenting this disappointment, tidings arrived of the defeat of his other troops, to whom he had committed the conduct of the war against the Jews, and of the daily increase of their number and power. At length one calamity following another, brought on him such insupportable anguish of mind, as was attended with a most nauseous and excruciating bodily distemper, till, finding his dissolution approaching, he called his friends around him, and told them the cause and quality of it. "I am thus justly, though severely, punished (said he) for the miseries I brought on the Jewish nation, for the sacrilegious rifling and profaning of their temple, and for a heinous con"tempt of the Almighty God." With these words expired the wicked and cruel Antiochus Epiphanes.

I cannot, upon this occasion, but take notice of a perversion of Polybius, of Megalopolis, (otherwise an historian of credit), in affirming that this judgment befell Antiochus for his design of rifling the temple of Diana, which was a sacrilege only in will, but never came to act. But if Polybius was of opinion that he deserved this punishment only for the design, he might much more reasonably have imputed it to the sacrilege of which he was actually guilty upon the holy temple of Jerusalem. But let facts speak for themselves. Truth and justice need no comment.

Josephus relates another error of Polybius.

C H A P. XIV.

Antiochus Epiphanes succeeded by his son Antiochus Eupator, and proclaimed by Lysias. Judas invests the citadel at Jerusalem. The armies of the Jews and Syrians engage. Bravery and death of Eleazar. Antiochus violates his faith on the surrender of Bethsura.

ANTIOCHUS, a short time before his death, sent for Philip, a confidential friend, and committed the regency into his hand, delivering up to him, at the same time, the crown, the royal robes and signet, with charge to preserve them for his son Antiochus, then in his minority, with the strictest injunction to attend to his education. The death, however, of Antiochus was no sooner made known to the public, than Lysias proclaimed his son Antiochus king, under the name of Eupator; for Lysias, at that time, had the tuition of the young prince.

2 Mac. 6. Antiochus appoints Philip governor and guardian of his son.

The Macedonians, who were at that time garrisoned in the citadel of Jerusalem, together with some Jewish runagates, greatly annoyed the Jews as they went up to worship at the temple, which they could do with ease, as the castle was upon an eminence, and of course commanded it. Judas therefore determined to reduce that fort for the common security of the nation, in their attendance upon their religious solemnities. To this end he caused machines and engines to be framed for battery, and the casting up of works. While this was in agitation, several of the runagates, with others as nefarious as themselves, repaired to Antiochus, and to him represented the wretched condition to which they were reduced by men of their own tribe, for their obedience to the king's command, in opposition to their own law, and that they were now in imminent danger of falling into the hands of Judas, without immediate relief.

Judas determines on the siege of the citadel of Jerusalem.

Is accused by revellers to Eupator.

The young prince, inflamed by this artifice, immediately gave orders to his officers to levy all the mercenaries they could raise, over and above the choicest forces they could select from his own subjects. His orders were executed with such alacrity, that, in a short time, they mustered a hundred thousand foot, twenty thousand horse, and thirty-two elephants. With this formidable army, under the command of Lysias, as general, the king marched out of Antioch, advanced to Idumæa, and thence to Bethsura, a well fortified place, both by nature and art. He sat down before the fort, and, to little effect, spent much time; for the besieged, betwixt sallies and stratagems, found means to burn or frustrate all engines of battery that were brought against it.

A formidable army raised against him.

Antiochus invades Bethsura.

Judas, upon this intelligence of the approach of Antiochus, raised the siege from before the citadel, and marched the ready way to meet him, pitching his camp upon the very entrance into the straits of Bethzachariah, about seventy furlongs from the enemy. Antiochus, upon this, quitted the siege of Bethsura, and encamped within distance of engaging Judas, appointing his army, at earliest dawn, to put themselves upon the march in order of battle: but the place being too narrow for the elephants to pass in front, they marched in a defile, with a thousand foot, and five hundred horse, upon the guard of every elephant. Each had a kind of tower or castle on the back, charged with archers. The rest of the troops mounted the hills on both sides, under the command of such officers as the king could best confide in. From this ascent they gave the attack, and that with so horrid a shout and clamour, that the the vallies all rang with the eccho; so that, with the hideous outcry, and the dazzling flashes of the golden and brazen bucklers, nothing could be more terrific in appearance and found. But the gallant Judas stood undismayed by empty pomp and noise, and, when they came to action, received them with such dauntless intrepidity, about six hundred fell upon the first onset. While they were thus engaged, Eleazar, otherwise called Auranes, the brother of Judas, taking notice of one elephant that was caparioned with richer trappings than the rest, with noble ardour made his way to that beast, supposing that the king himself was mounted upon it. Having hewn down his opponents on each hand, and forced the rest to clear his passage, he crept under the belly of the elephant, smote and slew him, perishing himself under the enormous weight of the beast upon his fall. He died, however, in the glorious prospect of victory, and encompassed with dead bodies of his slaughtered foes.

Extraordinary valour and death of Eleazar.

The Jews retreat, and reinvest the citadel of Jerusalem.

Bethsura surrendered upon terms, which the king violated.

He besieges the temple, which is bravely defended.

The Jews distressed for want of bread.

The king and Lysias are disposed to quit the siege.

He is engaged to assist the king's army.

Judas, finding himself greatly overpowered by numbers, drew off his army to the siege of the citadel at Jerusalem; while Antiochus lent part of his army to set down before Bethsura, and with the remainder proceeded to Jerusalem. The inhabitants of Bethsura were so daunted by the appearance of these troops, and so disheartened through want of provisions, that they found themselves under a necessity of delivering up the place. This they accordingly did, upon articles most solemnly ratified, that no violence or molestation whatever should be offered them. But the king preserved his faith no farther than the sparing of their lives; for they were all turned naked out of the town, and a garrison of his own was placed in their stead. The temple, it must be recorded to their honour, made most obstinate resistance, as all the effects of their machines and engines were still eluded by counter-workings and stratagems. Their greatest distress was want of bread; for having already expended their last year's store, and this event happening to fall upon the seventh year, in which, by the Jewish law, they could neither plow or sow, great numbers of the Jews went out of the town purely for want of provision, insomuch that there was not a competent number to defend the place.

The king, and his general Lysias, receiving intelligence at this time, that Philip was endeavouring to obtain the government, and was marching towards them at the head of an army out of Persia, they came to a private determination to quit the siege, and advance immediately against him. To effect this purpose, without the knowledge, even of the first officers in command, the king recommended to Lysias, to sound the opinion and disposition of the soldiers in general, respecting the continuance of the siege, representing the strength of the place, the dearth of provision, and the indispensable necessity of the king's departure, and, from these considerations, inferring the expediency of coming to some terms, and particularly the condition of allowing them the free exercise of their particular religion, laws, and customs, which being granted as the grand cause of all their rebellions, the king might return whenever he pleased. This Lysias had in charge to communicate to the army, and the soldiers in general approved of the proposal.

CHAP. XV.

Antiochus Eupator violates the league he made with the Jews. Onias, the high-priest, put to death. Philip vanquished by Antiochus.

Mac. 6.

When his intent was discovered.

MATTERS being thus concerted, Antiochus sent an herald to Judas, with an offer of peace, and free exercise of their religion and laws, which being accepted they left the temple, and the accommodation between them was ratified by oath. But when Antiochus, upon taking possession of it, found the strength of the fortifications belonging to the temple, without any regard to his oath, he ordered his soldiers to demolish the walls, and lay them level with the ground. This being accordingly executed, he returned to Antioch, taking with him Onias, otherwise called Menelaus. Lysias had represented to the king the absolute necessity of taking off Me-nelaus, if he would wish to conduce to the quiet of the Jews and his own peace; because it was at the instigation of this very Menelaus that his father forced the Jews to the transgressions of the religion and laws of their country; so that he was, of course, the author and promoter of all the evils that had befallen him. Influenced by the council of Lysias, the king sent Menelaus to Berhœa, in Syria, where he caused him to be put to death, after he had held the pontificate during the space of ten years. Onias, or Menelaus, was an infamous character, who, to secure the office of the high-priesthood to himself, had caused a general defection amongst the Jews from the religion and laws of their country. He was succeeded by Alcimus, who was also called Jacymus, a man as depraved in principle as his predecessor.

Menelaus is put to death.

When Antiochus found that Philip had usurped the government, he immediately attacked him with all his forces, and, in a short time, totally routed his army, slew great numbers of his men, took him prisoner, and ordered him to be put to death. But the son of the high-priest Onias, being left an infant on the death of his father, and finding that the king had conferred the dignity of the pontificate, at the instance of Lysias, on Alcimus, who had no relation to the sacerdotal family, he made application to Ptolemy, king of Egypt, by whom he was most graciously received, as well as by his queen Cleopatra, who bestowed on him a place of considerable trust in Heliopolis, where he erected a temple after the model of that at Jerusalem.

Antiochus vanquishes Philip, and causes him to be put to death.

CHAP. XVI.

Demetrius claims the crown of Syria, and orders Antiochus Eupator and Lysias to be put to death. On the complaint of Alcimus, sends an army against the Jews. Cruelties of Alcimus.

ABOUT this time Demetrius, the son of Seleucus, having fled from Rome, possessed himself of Tripolis, a city in Syria, took the crown upon him, and, with as many mercenaries as he could gather together, invaded the country, where he was received by the people with open arms. As a farther instance of their affection to his interest, they seized on the persons of Antiochus and Lysias, and brought them in custody prisoners to him, upon which Demetrius commanded them both to be put to death; Antiochus having reigned over Syria two years. He had in his party a great number of apostate Jews, who had been banished for notorious crimes, with Alcimus, the high-priest, at the head of them. These all joined in one common accusation against the whole people of the Jews, but more especially against Judas Maccabæus and his brethren, whom they charged not only with the destruction of as many of the king's friends as fell into their hands, but the very ejection of themselves out of the country. They therefore made it their request to Demetrius, that he would send certain particular persons, in whom he could confide, to examine into the truth of what they had alledged against Judas and his adherents.

1 Mac. 7. Demetrius seizes on the kingdom of Syria.

Antiochus and Lysias put to death.

Alcimus and his party accuse Judas to Demetrius.

In consequence of this representation, Demetrius, who, from the situation of Alcimus, was readily induced to give credit to all he said, was so exasperated, that he immediately ordered Bacchides, a very powerful man, and governor of Mesopotamia, to march with an army into Judæa, and having confirmed Alcimus in the priesthood, joined him in the same commission against the Jews. With this army Bacchides left Antioch, and marched directly into Judæa, where he gave Judas and his brethren a solemn invitation to come to a better understanding with him; but the design was under colour of a friendly and peaceable disposition to draw them into a toil, and to surprize them. Judas, however, upon his coming, attended with such an army, and in the posture of an enemy rather than a friend, kept upon his guard, without giving any credit to his pretensions: but there were some credulous people that went over to him, in confidence that their countryman and tribesman would do them no violence, especially as they received a solemn oath from both to that purport; but in this confidence they were fatally deceived; for no sooner had they got them into their power, than they caused them instantly to be put to death, thereby violating the the promise they had made for their safety; which barbarous perfidy served as a warning to the rest not to come near them.

He returns to Demetrius.

Bacchides, after this, removed his army from Jerusalem, and went to Bethzeth, where he found several deserters, and other disaffected people, all of whom he put to the sword. This being done, he commanded all the Jews, in his absence, to obey Alcimus; and, leaving part of his army with him for the security of the province, he returned himself with the rest to king Demetrius at Antioch.

Alcimus inimical and barbarous to the Jews.

In this situation the views of Alcimus were directed fully to secure himself in the pontificate, to effect which he endeavoured to ingratiate himself with the people by the popular arts of fair words and condescending behaviour. This so far answered his purpose, that he soon doubled the number of forces that had been left him by Bacchides; but they consisted chiefly of renegadoes, who destroyed all the Jews who were friends to Judas, wherever they found them.

Judas intends to retaliate.

As soon as Judas understood the cruelties exercised by the people under the command of Alcimus, against his brethren in Judæa, he marched from Jerusalem in order to give him battle; but Alcimus finding himself unequal to the contest, retired hastily to Demetrius at Antioch, whom he still farther irritated against Judas, setting forth the great mischief he had already done, and the further danger to be apprehended from him, unless a proper force was sent to check his proceedings. He added, that so long as Judas and his brethren were permitted to live, they would never suffer his authority to take place, nor could any lasting peace be established in that part of the country.

CHAP. XVII.

Demetrius and his adherents practise the most malevolent acts against Judas without success. Judas nobly perseveres in vindicating the cause of his countrymen. Miserable death of Alcimus. He is succeeded in the pontificate by Judas, who forms an alliance with the Romans.

Nicanor is

against the Jews.

IN consequence of this representation of Alcimus, touching the growing power and influence of Judas, Demetrius became apprehensive of the danger that might result therefrom, unless checked in time. To effect this desirable purpose, he sent another army against the Jews, under the command of Nicanor, one of the principal men of his court, with strict orders to make war upon the whole nation; and thoroughly establish Alcimus in the office of high-priest. Nicanor, in seeming obedience to the commands, left Antioch, and set out for Jerusalem, proposing to himself to preserve fair appearances, and try if he could inveigle Judas under countenance of peaceable inclinations. On his arrival in Judæa, he sent deputies to Judas with this message. "Wherefore should we risk all on the uncertain chance of war, when we may adjust matters better by negotiation? Peace alone is my object, as I am ready to attest upon solemn oath, and as you may judge by the friends I have brought with me only to possess you with the knowledge of my master's will and pleasure, and of his hearty good-will to the whole nation of the Jews."

Endeavours to inveigle Judas by disimula-
tion.

This well dissembled declaration wrought so powerfully on Judas and his brethren, that, unsuspecting of the design it was intended to veil, the parties interchangeably passed their oaths, and the Jews, with great frankness, received Nicanor and his whole army. After the first greeting between Judas and Nicanor, the latter gave a signal to his people to seize Judas; but the plot being discovered in time, he immediately made his escape to his own people. After the detection of this treacherous design, both sides determined on open hostility, without any appearance or pretence of negotiation or treaty. The armies accordingly drew out, and a battle ensued near a village called Capharsalama, where Judas was worsted, and obliged to save himself by a precipitate retreat to the castle of Jerusalem.

Jerusalem.

Animated with this success, Nicanor hastened with all expedition after Judas. It happened on a certain occasion, as Nicanor was passing by the temple, that he was met on the way by several of the elders and priests, who shewed him the sacrifices they had with them, and told him they were about to offer them up for the prosperity and welfare of Demetrius. Nicanor, in the fury of his rage, threatened them, with blasphemous revilings, that if they did not immediately deliver up Judas to him, he would raze the temple, and destroy the city. With these menaces he took his departure; and the priests were so alarmed at the declaration, that they addressed themselves to the Almighty, with prayers and tears, to protect the sacred place of his own immediate presence, and his ministers who belonged to it, against the outrages of the enemy.

Nicanor, finding no probability of reducing Jerusalem, left it in great rage, and encamped his army near a village called Bethoron, where he was joined by a very considerable reinforcement out of Syria. This, however, did not dismay Judas, who, though his army was greatly inferior in number, marched from Jerusalem, and encamped at a place called Adasi, within three furlongs of the enemy. In order to encourage his troops, he told them, that though the number of the enemy was great, they need not to fear, for they fought in the cause of God, whose power could crush multitudes; exhorting them not to trouble themselves how many they were to encounter, but to consider the bravery of those they were to encounter, with the honours and rewards that would most certainly attend them. "Attack them, therefore, courageously, (said he), and leave the issue to heaven."

men.

The Jews, thus encouraged by their leader, attacked the enemy with the most intrepid resolution, and the battle was desperate on both sides for some time, till at length victory declared in favour of Judas; for Nicanor being slain, with great numbers of his troops, the rest were so intimidated, that they immediately threw down their arms and fled. Judas availed himself of this advantage, by pursuing the fugitives, to whom he gave no quarters. In his pursuit he proclaimed his victory by sound of trumpet, in all the cities and towns through which he passed; the consequence of which was, that the country people gathered together from all parts; and such of the enemy that fell in their way, in endeavouring to escape, they put to death; so that, by means of them, and the close pursuit of Judas, not a single person of the Syrian army was left to carry home the melancholy tidings of their overthrow. This was upon the thirteenth day of the month which the Jews call Adar, and the Macedonians Dystrus; and, in commemoration of this signal interposition of Providence in our deliverance, we celebrate an anniversary thanksgiving upon it to this very day. The Jews, after this victory, had a short respite from war, and some glimmerings of an agreeable and permanent peace.

Alcimus had it in contemplation to pull down the old wall of the sanctuary, and demolish the works of the ancient prophets; but, in the very instant of his giving orders for the execution of it, he was smitten with so judicial a stroke, that he fell speechless on the ground, where he lay languishing some time in the acutest pain, and then made a wretched exit, after he had held the pontificate four years. Upon the demise of the impious Alcimus, the people unanimously chose Judas to succeed him in his office; when hearing of the great fame and power of the Romans, in conquering the Gauls, Spaniards, Carthaginians, and Grecians, together with the kings Perseus, Philip, and Antiochus, he was desirous of forming an alliance with them, in hopes thereby of obtaining some protection and relief against the oppression of the Syrians. Judas accordingly dispatched two of his most intimate friends and counsellors, named Jason and Eupolemus, whom he knew were capable of executing such an embassy, to Rome, to request of the senate, that the Jews might be admitted as their allies; and that a letter might be written to Demetrius, requiring him to desist from every further molestation of them. This proposal proved agreeable to the senate, who immediately drew up articles of treaty, the original of which they kept, and sent a copy of them to Jerusalem, which was highly approved by Judas. The purport of the articles was, "That no people subject to the Romans, should make war on the Jews, or supply their enemies with money, shipping, corn, &c. and that the Jews should be held

“to the same, in case the Romans should be attacked. That if the Jews demanded any future alteration of the agreement, the consent of the whole people should be necessary to ratify it.” This was the first alliance that was formed between the Jews and the Romans. This decree of the senate was written by Eupolemus, the son of John, and Jason, the son of Eleazar, Judas, the high priest, and his brother Simon, general of the army.

CHAP. XVIII.

The extraordinary valour of Judas and his brethren.

IN the mean time Demetrius, having received an account of the defeat and death of Nicanor, sent Bacchides again into Judæa, at the head of a very numerous army, to give battle to Judas, and with orders, if possible, to bring him to Antioch, dead or alive. The general immediately set out to execute the king's command; and the first place at which he encamped was Arbela, a town in Galilee, where he forced many Jews from the caves to which they had retreated, and cruelly put them to death. From thence he marched towards Jerusalem, and, upon intelligence that Judas and his people were at Bethseth, he posted away immediately with twenty thousand foot, and two thousand horse, to encounter him. Judas had no more than three thousand to oppose him, and these were so terrified at the strength and number of the enemy, that the greatest part deserted, so that he had not above eight hundred left.

Notwithstanding Judas was thus distressed for want of men, and had not an opportunity of recruiting his forces, yet he determined to hazard a battle, and therefore used the most powerful arguments he was master of, to prevail on the few he had to stand by him to the utmost extremity. They, however, expostulated with him on the impropriety and rashness of attempting to engage so very superior a number, and advised him rather to retreat with caution, and put off his design till he could augment his forces. To this he replied, “It never shall be said of me, that I turned my back upon an enemy. If it be the will of God that we now fall, let his will be done; but let us not, by an ignominious flight, destroy all the credit of a life of glory.” This speech so animated the soldiers, that they unanimously resolved to stand the combat, and every necessary preparation was made for opposing the enemy.

CHAP. XIX.

Judas falls in battle, after signalizing his prowess.

THE army of Bacchides was disposed of in the following manner. The front was composed of light armed men, and supported by a large body of Macedonians; while there were two wings of horse, the right being commanded by Bacchides himself. In this order of battle they advanced towards the army of Judas, which they no sooner approached than they sounded a charge, gave a loud shout, and began the attack. The forces of Judas sustained the shock with great intrepidity, and the battle continued desperate for some time; when Judas, seeing Bacchides, with his right wing, pressing hard on his men, relieved them with a band of courageous youths, who broke the right wing of Bacchides, and pursued them as far as Aza: but not having sufficient forces to keep the left wing in play during his absence, he was followed, and closely surrounded by the enemy. The action was very obstinate, and the Jews sold their lives at a dear rate. Their general did all that a gallant man could do, till at length, being overpowered with numbers, he was, with the greatest part of his men, slain; and the rest, intimidated by the loss of their leader, betook themselves to flight. Thus fell the great Judas Maccabæus, dying as he lived, a zealous asserter of the religion and laws of his country. He was pious, just, and valiant; and equally respectable in the various characters he filled with so much honour and dignity to himself, as well as glory and advantage to the Jewish nation.

Implacable hatred of the revolted Jews towards their countrymen. Jonathan succeeds to the government after Judas, and, together with his brother Simon, carries on the war against Bacchides.

THE means by which the Jews were delivered from their slavery under the Macedonians, and the exploits and character of their great patron and leader, Judas, who, after a life devoted to his country's service, nobly fell in a contest for the vindication of its liberties and laws, have been fully set forth in the foregoing book.

This illustrious person was no sooner taken off, than the whole party of profligate apostate Jews, contrary to the dictates of conscience, faith, and honour, abandoned the religion, laws, and customs of their nation, resumed their former animosities, and, at the instance, and with the assistance, of Bacchides, treated all the friends and adherents of the Maccabees, wherever they found them, with the greatest barbarity. At this time there happened to be a general famine throughout the land of Judæa, which aggravated other calamities, inasmuch, that, through distress for want of bread, on the one hand, and the difficulty of defending themselves against their enemies, on the other, many of the Jews were, in a manner, compelled to adhere to the faction of the Macedonians. At this juncture Bacchides sent a summons to all the apostate Jews, who were gone over to strange gods, and committed the care of the government principally into their hands; so that they made it their business to seize all the friends and late partizans of Judas, and deliver them up to the Syrian general to be tortured at his pleasure. In short, the Jews were never so deplorably miserable since the Babylonish captivity as at this period, inasmuch, that the late adherents to Judas joined in a request to Jonathan, not only to follow his brother's example, who had so freely sacrificed his life for the liberties of his country, but to take upon himself his command also, as the whole nation was under such desperate circumstances, that, without a leader to assist them in opposing their enemies, they must all be inevitably lost. Jonathan's answer was, he was willing to do or suffer any thing for the public welfare; upon which he was elected general of the Jewish army by the unanimous voice of the people.

Bacchides, hearing of this election, and reflecting that Jonathan was not less likely to give trouble to the king, and to the Macedonians, than his brother Judas, set about concerting measures to take him off by stratagem; but Jonathan, having intelligence of his design, collected what force he could, and, accompanied by his brother Simon, withdrew immediately into a neighbouring desert, and pitched his tent by the pool of Asphar. Bacchides, imagining this retreat into the desert to be no other than a direct flight, immediately advanced towards them with his whole force, and, encamping beyond Jordan, made choice of that place for a rendezvous. When Jonathan heard of this motion, he sent his brother John (otherwise Gaddis) to the Arabian Nabathites, being in friendship with him, for leave to deposit their baggage in their custody, till the battle with Bacchides should be decided. But, as John was upon the way, the sons of Amaraeus made a sally out of the city of Medaba upon the convoy, took all their carriages, with whatever else they had about them, and killed John upon the spot, with all his people. But his brothers soon had their revenge, as will appear in the sequel.

Bacchides, having intelligence that Jonathan lay encamped in the fenny grounds, near the river Jordan, immediately marched after him, and having made himself master of the pass that lead to their encampment, fixed on the sabbath-day for the attack, in confidence of the superstitious reverence for the law respecting that day, that he should not meet with the least resistance. In this, however, he found himself mistaken; for Jonathan, after reminding his men of the determination that was made in cases of necessity like the present, encouraged them to dispute it bravely, which, after a short and fervent supplication for the divine aid, they accordingly did; till they slew great numbers of the assailants on the spot. the encounter Bacchides pressed furiously upon the person of Jonathan, who, at the same time, aimed a stroke at him; but the other diverting it, Jonathan, and his party, took to the river, and the enemy declining to follow them, they got safe to the other side, without the loss of a single man. The Syrian general withdrew to the citadel of Jerusalem, with the loss of near two thousand of his men. He afterwards fortified several strong places in Judæa that had been demolished before, as Jericho, Emmaus, Bethoron, Bethel, Thamnatha, Pharaon, Techoa, and Gazara. These places he strengthened with walls and towers, and with strong garrisons, to be ready for excursions to fall upon the Jews. But especial care was taken, above all the rest, to render the citadel at Jerusalem impregnable; in which place the sons of the principal Jews were secured as hostages.

About this time the two brothers received intelligence, that there was a wedding to be celebrated between one of the sons of Amaraeus, and the daughter of an illustrious Arabian; that the sons of Amaraeus were to be present at the ceremony, and the bride to be conducted in splendid pomp from the city of Gabatha. Jonathan and Simon, thinking this the best opportunity for avenging the death of their brother, hastened towards Medaba, and lay in wait among the mountains in ambush for their enemies. Upon the coming up of the bridegroom with his bride, and a long train of their friends, as is usual in such cases, the party sallied out upon them, and cut them all off without exception, together with their wives, children, and friends, to the number of four hundred; carried away the booty entire, and did justice, at the same time, to the memory of John. After this exploit they returned to their quarters near the Jordan.

When Bacchides had settled the aforementioned garrisons in Judæa, he returned to Antioch; and, for the space of two years, those Jews, who were for preserving their ancient religion, lived in some degree of repose; but the apostates and dregs of the people, envying their happiness in their present state of tranquillity in Judæa, solicited Demetrius, by proxies, that Bacchides might be ordered to seize upon Jonathan, and reduce him absolutely within his power, which they affirmed might be easily done, by surprizing him and his adherents in one night.

The king approved the proposal, and dispatched Bacchides into Judæa upon the commission, sending letters, at the same time, up and down to all his friends and officers in the country, to give their assistance towards the seizing of Jonathan. They, in consequence, concerted means for ensnaring him; but finding, on repeated trials, that their most subtle devices were eluded through the caution of the Jewish general, the Syrian commander, in a transport of rage, imputed the whole miscarriage to the treachery of the apostate Jews, which he said had sported with the king's orders, and then, in revenge, ordered fifty of their chief men to be put to death. Jonathan and his brother, persuaded of their inability to withstand the superior numbers of the enemy, had retired into the wilderness, and raised walls round a village called Bethlaga, intending to make that a place of retreat on all emergent occasions.

Bacchides, having received intelligence of this retreat, marched towards them with all the forces he was able to raise upon the junction of his own troops with an auxiliary faction of the Jews. He opened his trenches immediately against the place, and, for some days, carried on his approaches; Jonathan, on the other side, making a very stout resistance. While matters were in this posture, he left the defence of the place to his brother Simon, and, with such a body of men as he was able to collect in the vicinity, stole away by night, and fell upon Bacchides in his quarters, killed many of his men; and, by the havock and confusion which ensued, his brother became acquainted with his design, made a sally upon their machines, cut off many of their people, and then returned. Bacchides was so alarmed at this assault upon his front and rear, and the miscarriage of an attempt of which he thought himself so sure, that it deranged his affairs in the greatest degree. He imputed, however, the whole of his disappointment to the Jewish renegadoes, who had prevailed with the king to send him upon this expedition. His main business, at present, was to deliberate on the best means of raising the siege, and drawing off the army, that he might thereby save his men, and retire without loss of honour to his master or himself.

CHAP. II.

The Syrian and Jewish generals adjust matters upon amicable terms.

WHILE Bacchides was deliberating in what manner he should proceed, Jonathan deemed it most expedient to avail himself of the present situation of affairs, and therefore sent an honourable message, with proposals of a mutual league of friendship, on condition of an exchange of prisoners. Bacchides found in the proposal so fair an opportunity of abandoning the siege without disgrace, that he immediately acceded, and formed an alliance with Jonathan, with a mutual exchange of oaths to deliver up and restore all prisoners on both sides, and from that moment cease from all acts of hostility against each other. This agreement being ratified, Bacchides returned to the king at Antioch; and so strictly did he observe the treaty of peace entered into with Jonathan, that he never returned with his army to Judæa. The wars being thus happily at an end, and every thing settled in an amicable manner, Jonathan took up his abode in Machmas, where he devoted his study and attention to the concerns of government, and the impartial administration of justice. He punished those who had apostatized from the religion and laws of their country, and, as far as in him lay, took every measure for the reformation of all abuses in church and state.

Hostilities between Alexander, son of Antiochus Epiphanes, and Demetrius.

SOON after these transactions Alexander, the son of Antiochus Epiphanes, laid claim to the Syrian empire, and took possession of Ptolemais, through a confederacy of the soldiers that were there in garrison, from an aversion they bore Demetrius, as a prince of a proud imperious disposition, who immured himself in a castle he had fortified near Antioch, and would suffer no person to have access to him. Indeed, such was his pride and indolence, that he seemed totally regardless of the interest of his subjects, which rendered him very unpopular, and stirred up many malcontents against him. However, being alarmed at the intelligence of Alexander's having seized upon Ptolemais, he assembled his troops with all possible expedition, and immediately marched against him.

CHAP. IV.

Demetrius forms an alliance with Jonathan, investing him with authority to levy men, provide arms, &c. He repairs and fortifies Jerusalem.

DEMETRIUS, in order to oppose his rival more effectually, thought it expedient to make his court to Jonathan, and to that end sent an embassy to him, with proposals of a league and an alliance betwixt them. The purport of the embassy was to vest him with authority to levy men, provide arms, and set the hostages at liberty that Bacchides had committed prisoners to the castle. Upon the receipt of the letter vesting him with this power, Jonathan left Machmas, and repaired to Jerusalem, where he publicly read the contents of the king's letter to the garrison, and the people in general. The apostate and fugitive Jews in the citadel, were much startled at this sudden reverse of fortune in his favour. Jonathan, however, proceeded to make his levies, and gave liberty to the hostages in the citadel, strictly ordering that they should be permitted to return in safety to their friends. He now resolved to fix his residence at Jerusalem, and, in consequence thereof, thoroughly repaired the city, fortified it on every side, and rebuilt those walls round the temple which had been destroyed during the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes.

Alexander Ballex courts the friendship of Jonathan, whom he appoints high-priest. Desperate engagement betwixt Alexander and Demetrius. Death of Demetrius.

IN the mean time Alexander, who was no stranger to the character of Jonathan, or to his exploits against the Macedonians, or to the indignities that had been offered him both by Demetrius and his general Bacchides, assembled his friends, and represented to them the advantages that would result to his cause from an alliance with a person of such eminent valour, and a mortal enemy to Demetrius from the highest provocations imaginable. His council unanimously agreeing with him in opinion, a letter was immediately dispatched to Jonathan to the following purport:

“Alexander, the king, to Jonathan, his brother, “greeting.

Alexander's epistle to Jonathan.

“Having been informed of your character, for honour, faith and courage, and deeming you every way worthy our best regard, we have dispatched ambassadors to offer you our friendship and alliance, and have commissioned them to treat for the same. By these presents, and our royal authority, we constitute and ordain thee high-priest of the Jews, and rank thee in the number of the king's friends: we likewise present thee with a crown of gold, and a purple robe, entertaining no doubt of a proper regard being made by you for this instance of our respect and esteem.

Jonathan

cate.

Jonathan immediately, on the receipt of this message, put on his sacerdotal robe, it being the day of the feast of tabernacles. This was four years after the death of his brother Judas, the office of high-priest having been so long vacant. He then applied himself to the levying of troops, and making a large provision of arms. Demetrius was, by this time, sensible of the error of his delay, in not embracing the opportunity of anticipating his competitor for an alliance with Jonathan. Nevertheless, he exerted his utmost to carry the point, as will appear from the following letter.

“Demetrius, the king, to Jonathan, and the Jewish “people, greeting.

Epistle of Demetrius to Jonathan, and the people of the Jews.

“As we have already entered into a treaty of alliance with you, we would wish to fix it on a lasting and uninterrupted foundation. Wherefore it is our pleasure that your tributes be remitted, and we hereby remit all the taxes formerly paid to our predecessors, or ourselves, (exclusive of the salt and crown taxes, with the thirds of your corn and fruits); and these duties we give up for all future times, as well as the poll-tax on the inhabitants, through Judæa, and the three governments of Galilee, Samaria, and Petæa. It is our pleasure likewise that Jerusalem and its dependencies be exempted from all tenths and tributes, be deemed holy, and have the privileges of a sanctuary. Let the citadel be delivered to Jonathan, the high-priest, with permission to place in it a garrison of such of his friends as he may think proper. We farther command, that, immediately on receipt hereof, liberty be given to all Jewish prisoners, in every part of our dominions, without any fees imposed, even on their cattle: that their sabbaths and solemn festivals, and three days preceding each, shall be deemed days of freedom to the Jews, throughout our dominions, that they may live at peace, and unmolested. That thirty thousand

“Jews, if so many shall be willing, may bear arms in our service, and receive the same pay as our own troops: that they be entrusted in garrisons, and near our person; and that our royal family receive the better sort of them as domestics. In Jerusalem, and the three dependent provinces, the Jews shall freely exercise their own laws; but the high-priest must take care that the temple of Jerusalem be the only one in which the Jews worship. Fifteen thousand shekels of silver we also grant annually towards the expence of their sacrifices; and we remit the ten thousand drachmas formerly paid to our predecessors by the priests and officers attending the service of the temple. We farther order that all debtors, repairing to the temple of Jerusalem, or the liberties thereof, on account of debt, shall remain unmolested, both in person and property. We also permit and require that the temple be repaired; that fortifications be made round it, and that such strong places as the Jews think proper to fortify shall have garrisons stationed in them; and all this shall be done at our own expence.”

At this critical juncture Alexander levied a mighty army, partly from his own mercenaries, and partly from those that went to him from Demetrius, in Syria, and marched with them against the enemy. At length they came to action, and the right wing of Alexander's forces were pressed hard by the left of Demetrius, who pushed their advantage even to the plundering of the camp; but Alexander forced the opposite column, where Demetrius fought in person, till it was totally routed. Demetrius, however, achieved wonders, killing and pursuing his enemies, and defending himself for a considerable time, till at length his horse plunging into a bog, and he being oppressed with multitudes, was obliged to yield, though not till his body was covered with darts and arrows. Thus died Demetrius, king of Syria, after having enjoyed the sovereignty of that empire for the space of about eleven years.

C H A P. VI.

Friendship between Onias and Ptolemy Philometor. The former obtains permission to build a temple in Egypt, resembling that at Jerusalem. This produces a dispute between the Samaritans and Jews, which is referred to the king, who decides in favour of the latter.

ONIAS, the son of Onias, the high-priest, lived in a kind of exile from his own country, with Ptolemy Philometor, at Alexandria. This Onias, finding Judæa so miserably ravaged by the Macedonians, and their kings, and, from an ambition to acquire immortal fame, resolved to try if he could obtain leave from king Ptolemy, and his queen Cleopatra, to build another temple in Egypt, after the plan and model of that in Jerusalem, and to supply it with priests and Levites of his own family. This thought was suggested to him by a prediction of the prophet Isaiah, of at least six hundred years before, presaging, that, in time to come, there should be a temple erected in Egypt to the honour of the great God, and that it should be the work of a Jew. Onias was so possessed with the impulse of this revelation, that he wrote a letter to Ptolemy and Cleopatra to the following effect.

“At the time when I had the honour to serve you in the field, I passed through several countries, and observed that, in the provinces of Cœlo-Syria, Phœnicia, and Leontopolis, in the land of Heliopolis, and several other places, that the Jews had no uniformity in their temples; and therefore could not agree amongst themselves about it. Such is the case with respect to the Egyptians, by reason of the multitude and variety of their temples, and the diversity of the forms of religion. Having discovered a certain place near the castle of Bubastes, upon the plain, where there is great store of materials for building at hand, and numbers of beasts ready for sacrifice, it is my humble request that you will grant me your royal licence

Onias to Ptolemy and Cleopatra.

"and authority to demolish ■ ruinous temple there, that was never consecrated to any deity, and, in its place, to erect another after the model of that of Jerusalem, with a dedication of it To the most High God, upon condition that prayers be constantly offered there for the safety and prosperity of your royal persons and family; to the end that all the Jews in your dominions may, by this means, be more united among themselves, and better enabled to render you service. This is what the prophet Isaiah has foretold, that God would have an holy place in Egypt, together with several particulars relative to that subject."

He founds it on the prediction of Isaiah.

The pious disposition of the king and queen will appear sufficiently evident by their answer to this petition of Onias, wherein they exculpate themselves from any concern in the impious violation of the law, and transfer the whole blame to Onias in the following terms.

"King Ptolemy and queen Cleopatra to Onias, send greeting.

The Epistle of Ptolemy and Cleopatra to Onias.

"We have read and duly considered your petition, wherein you request our royal licence and authority to purify an old ruinous temple at Leontopolis, near Bubastes, upon the plain, within the jurisdiction of Heliopolis. We cannot but express our wonder, that you should conceive it pleasing to God, to have a temple erected in a place so unclean, and haunted with such variety of detestable animals. But since you refer yourself for justification to the predictions of the prophet Isaiah, we do hereby grant you full permission, so far as in us lies, to execute our design, provided it be done without violating the Divine laws."

The temple is built in Egypt.

Onias had no sooner obtained this permission, than he assiduously applied himself to the raising of the temple and the altar, according to the model of that at Jerusalem, though much inferior to it in point of size and magnificence. As the dimensions of this fabric, and the holy vessels appertaining to it, are particularly described in my seventh book of the history and wars of the Jews, I shall pass them over in this place, and only say that Onias, having completed his design, did not want priests and Levites, of his own opinion and persuasion, to officiate in the ceremonies of the temple.

A dispute between the Jews and Samaritans. They appeal to the king.

In consequence of this transaction of Onias, there arose a violent contest between the Jews and Samaritans who erected the temple at Gerizim, in the days of Alexander the Great, concerning the form of the temple, and manner of worshipping. Both parties appealed to the king to take the matter into his own cognizance, and then pass judgment on the merits of the cause. The point in dispute was this. The Jews insisted that the temple at Jerusalem was the only temple extant that was authorized by the laws of Moses. The Samaritans strenuously contended for the temple at Gerizim. Both parties, as before observed, referred themselves to the arbitration of the king, together with his ministers and friends, desiring that council might be heard on both sides, and sentence passed upon the party that should be found guilty. Sabbæus and Theodosius pleaded the cause of the Samaritans; Andronicus, the son of Mesitalan, that of the Jews; binding themselves on oath on both sides, in the presence of God and the king, to advance nothing in proof of their allegations, but what was strictly consonant with the letter of the law, and desiring that the breach of that oath might be made death to the violator. The king then sat down with his friends and counsellors to try the cause.

The Jews of Alexandria were very apprehensive that their advocate would be incompetent to the business he had undertaken, and took it extremely to heart, to find the sacred authority of the temple at Jerusalem, the most antient and noble frame and institution in the whole world, brought into question. Upon a debate who should speak first, Sabbæus and Theodosius gave the precedence to Andronicus, who opened the cause, and traced the sanctity, practice, and venerable antiquity of the temple at Jerusalem, from its very origin, according to the law, setting forth the uninterrupted succession of the priesthood throughout all ages, with the honour and magnificence of the place, as it was celebrated from time to time, for the sumptuous and splendid donations of the kings of Asia. He observed in a comparative view, that the temple of Gerizim, then in question, was so obscure in every respect, that little more notice was taken of it than if no such fabric had been erected. By these, and other arguments of the like nature, the king was prevailed upon to give sentence in favour of the temple at Jerusalem, and adjudge Sabbæus and Theodosius to death, according to the conditions of the proposal. Such was the state of the Jews of Alexandria in the days of Ptolemy Philometor.

The king gives judgment for the Jews.

CHAP. VII.

Demetrius is succeeded by Alexander, who espouses the daughter of Ptolemy, and confers peculiar honours upon Jonathan.

DEMETRIUS being slain in battle, as before related, Alexander took upon him the government of Syria, and wrote to Ptolemy Philometor, desiring his daughter in marriage, and suggesting that it would be neither unreasonable or dishonourable, after the overthrow of Demetrius, and, through Divine favour, the recovery of a kingdom, to receive him into his alliance. Ptolemy received the proposal with the highest complacency, and immediately wrote him back a letter congratulating him on his victories and accession to the throne, promising him his daughter in marriage, and appointing Ptolemais for the place of meeting, where he assured him he would attend with his daughter Cleopatra, and then consummate the nuptials. The king of Egypt, pursuant to this information, repaired with his daughter to the place of appointment, and the marriage was celebrated with the utmost pomp and magnificence; and Alexander received a dowry, in gold and silver, worthy the dignity and opulence of the potentate who had given him so convincing a proof of his friendship and esteem in forming with him an alliance at once so honourable and advantageous.

1 Mac. 10. Alexander demands the daughter of Ptolemy in marriage.

Celebration of the nuptials.

Jonathan, the high-priest, upon this occasion, came to Ptolemais, where he was received by both kings with the utmost cordiality, and treated with every token of the highest honour and respect. Alexander required him to change his habit, put on a robe of purple, and take his place next to himself upon the throne. He also commanded the principal officers to attend him into the heart of the city, and make proclamation, that no man should presume, on his peril, to calumniate, accuse, or in any respect give him molestation. Upon this signal demonstration of the king's esteem and favour, his enemies, who came thither with a view of injuring him by detramatory reports, thought it prudent to retire, lest they should bring on themselves the mischiefs they designed for him. So great, indeed, was the respect which Alexander bore for Jonathan, that he was ranked amongst his most approved friends.

CHAP. VIII.

Extraordinary successes of Jonathan. Contest between Demetrius, son of the late king, and Alexander. The former enters into a league of friendship with Jonathan. Death of Alexander and of Ptolemy. Demetrius renders himself unpopular.

ALEXANDER now thought himself arrived at the summit of happiness, and that he should enjoy a life of uninterrupted tranquillity; but he soon found himself mistaken. A short time after Demetrius, the son of the late king Demetrius, resolving to revenge his father's death, and recover his kingdom, embarked with a body of mercenaries, whom Lathenes, the Cretan, had raised for him, and passed with them out of Crete into Cilicia. This expedition alarmed Alexander, who instantly marched from Phœnicia to Antioch, to put his affairs in a posture of security before the arrival of Demetrius. In the mean time Demetrius had gained over to his interest Apollonius, the governor of Cœlo-Syria, who, to oblige Jonathan to quit Alexander's party, and join with Demetrius, marched with an army as far as Jamnia, and thence sent a challenge to Jonathan, defying him to meet him with his sword in the open field, and put the issue on their single contest. He boasted also that he was at the head of a number of the bravest men in the empire, whose valour had frequently made his ancestors yield to their superior power.

Irritated at this daring message, Jonathan, accompanied by his brother Simon, left Jerusalem with a select band of ten thousand men, and encamped near Joppa, the gates of which were shut by a garrison belonging to Apollonius. Jonathan demanded entrance, which being refused, he immediately made the necessary preparations for attacking the place, when the garrison knowing themselves too weak to make opposition against so formidable a body, quietly surrendered.

As soon as Apollonius understood that Jonathan was in possession of Joppa, he advanced with three thousand horse, and eight thousand foot, to Azotus, and thence, by easy marches, to Joppa, where he drew off a little to engage Jonathan in the open plain, depending on the superior numbers of his cavalry. Jonathan, upon this, advanced, and followed Apollonius towards Azotus; but when the armies approached each other, the latter thought proper to make a retreat. Jonathan, however, continued to advance, till his antagonist, having got him to a spot of ground which he thought particularly advantageous, faced about, and prepared to engage. He planted a thousand horse to attack Jonathan in the rear; but the latter being aware of this disposition, without any difficulty provided against it, and formed his men into a square figure, so that they might be enabled to engage the enemy on all sides at the same time.

The action commenced, and lasted till near evening, when Jonathan ordered his brother Simon, with part of his army, to charge in upon the enemy's body, having given orders to his own men only to receive the darts and arrows of the horsemen upon their bucklers, without any other resistance. They accordingly kept themselves upon their guard till the enemy had spent all their offensive weapons; for they stood thick and close, that their darts fell upon their bucklers, and there was no possibility of piercing them through. The enemy was so fatigued with this way of fighting, and doing no execution for several successive hours, that Simon took that opportunity of attacking their main body, and was so bravely supported by his soldiers, that he soon put them to flight. The horse, upon this rout, between the toil of the day, and the hopeless condition of the army, now the foot were broken, fled, and dispersed themselves in the utmost confusion. Jonathan pursued them as far as Azotus, slaying great numbers, and forcing the rest into the temple of Dagon for sanctuary. But the conqueror entering the town set fire to it, and several neighbouring villages, which he burnt to the ground, together with the temple of Dagon itself, and killed all that had fled to it for protection, without any regard to the priests or idol of the place. The number of those who were slain in battle, and perished in the flames, was computed at eight thousand.

Having thus defeated the army of Apollonius, Jonathan advanced with his troops to Ascalon, and encamped before the city, with a design of investing it. But the inhabitants, instead of attempting to make any opposition, brought many valuable presents as a testimony of their submission, which Jonathan accepted upon the terms, and from the motives, for which they were offered, and then returned laden with the spoils of the enemy in triumph to Jerusalem.

As soon as Alexander heard of the success of Jonathan over his general Apollonius, he affected much joy at the event, because, as he pretended, he had practised hostilities against a friend and ally, without his knowledge or consent. In token of the honour and esteem in which he held him, he sent him, as a present, a buckle of gold, such as none but the royal family were permitted to wear, and, at the same time, also gave him the city of Ekron, with all the territories thereunto belonging.

About this time Ptolemy Philometor passed into Syria, with a considerable body of land and sea forces, to the assistance of his son-in-law Alexander. Agreeable to the king's order, he was received with the greatest honour and respect by the inhabitants of all the cities and towns through which he passed except Azotus, where he was harassed with complaints of the burning of the temple of Dagon, and exclamations against Jonathan as the author of that outrage, as well as the havock made in their country by fire and sword, and the destruction of numbers of the people. Ptolemy gave them a patient hearing; but, fearful of disobligeing Jonathan, did not think proper to do any thing in their favour without his knowledge. As soon as Jonathan heard of the arrival of Ptolemy in Syria, and that he was advanced as far as Joppa, he went thither to pay him his respects, and was received by the king with all honour and magnificence; after which he conducted him to the river Eleutherus, and returned to Jerusalem.

As Ptolemy was on his way to the city of Ptolemais, he fortunately discovered a plot, which had been concerted by Alexander, to be executed by Ammonius, his confidant, for taking away his life; though no reason could be assigned for such a diabolical intention. In consequence of this discovery, on his arrival at Ptolemais, he demanded that justice might be done on the traitor: but Alexander refusing to give him up, Ptolemy was fully convinced that the king was concerned in the plot, and therefore entertained an implacable hatred against him, which soon terminated in his ruin. Alexander had before incurred the ill-will of the people of Antioch, by means of this Ammonius, who had treated them with many indignities. He came at length, however, to an infamous end; for he lost his life in the habit of a woman, as he was endeavouring to conceal himself in that disguise from those who were employed to bring him to justice.

The first step Ptolemy took to shew his resentment on the occasion, was to take away his daughter Cleopatra from Alexander, and give her to his rival Demetrius, with assurance that he would restore him to the throne of his father. Demetrius was highly pleased with the terms of alliance proposed by Ptolemy, and as much charmed with the idea of possessing the beautiful Cleopatra as a wife. But the people had such an aversion to Demetrius on his father's account, that it was with the utmost difficulty Ptolemy could bring them over to receive that man for their king, whom they looked upon as their enemy. Such, however, was their hatred to Alexander, for his partiality to the execrable Ammonius, and their hatred to Ammonius himself, for his own sake, that they were easily prevailed on to expel the former from the city. He therefore retired from Antioch into Cilicia.

Ptolemy, upon this, made his entrance into the city; was saluted, proclaimed, and crowned king in two capacities; that is, in the right of Asia and Egypt. But being a man of honour, discretion, and temperance, he so conducted himself in all public affairs, as to afford entire satisfaction to his own people, without giving any cause of envy or jealousy to the Romans. The offer made him, by the people of Antioch, was very flattering; but his honour giving way to interest, he modestly declined the compliment, and having called a council of the heads of the people, advised them to receive Demetrius, the true heir to the crown, as their sovereign. He told them he hoped all past enmity would be forgotten; that he would himself be bound for his faithfully executing the trust reposed in him; and desired that, with respect to himself, he might be permitted to content himself with the government of his own dominions. This modest address had the desired effect: the people unanimously received Demetrius as their king, admitted him into the city with great pomp, and placed him on the throne of his ancestors.

When Alexander, who was at this time in Cilicia, heard of what had passed at Antioch, he marched with all his force to meet Ptolemy, ravaging the country through which he passed with fire and sword. Ptolemy and his new son-in-law met him, and gave him battle; the issue of which was, that his army was totally routed, and himself forced to fly into Arabia. It happened, in the battle, that Ptolemy's horse, taking fright at the noise of an elephant, threw his rider, and afforded his enemies the advantage of giving giving him many grievous wounds upon the head, while he lay upon the ground. He would have lost his life upon the spot, had he not been rescued by a party of his guards; but such was his condition, that he lay speechless four days, without speaking a word himself, or understanding any thing that was said to him. Upon the fifth day, when he recovered himself a little, Zabelus, an Arabian prince, having cut off the head of Alexander, sent it to Ptolemy, who was greatly delighted both with the report of the action, and with the spectacle itself. But his satisfaction on this account was of short duration, for he soon died of the wounds he had received in the battle. This Alexander, otherwise called Ballez, reigned about five years.

Demetrius, who was known by the name of Nicator, succeeded Alexander. He was a man of an obdurate temper, as appears from his barbarous usage of Ptolemy's soldiers, without any regard to the obligations and services he had received from them upon the credit of an affinity with Cleopatra. The soldiers were so incensed at his ungrateful behaviour, that they quitted him themselves, and went away to Alexandria, leaving only the elephants behind them.

Jonathan, the high-priest, being now grown considerable in power, having drawn together all the force he was able to raise out of Judæa, sat himself down before the citadel of Jerusalem, with a resolution to dislodge the Macedonian garrison, and the fugitive Jews that had taken sanctuary there. Confident of the strength of the place, they at first gave Jonathan a most contemptuous defiance. But at length they sent some of their abandoned emissaries out of the town to Demetrius for succour. Demetrius, upon this, left Antioch, and marched with a considerable army towards Jonathan. On his arrival at Ptolemais he sent for him by letter. Jonathan, upon this invitation, took with him many valuable presents, in gold, silver, garments, and other rich curiosities, and, attended by the priests and elders, made a compliment of them to Demetrius, the siege going forward at the same time. The king was so pleased with this distinguished token of respect, that he confirmed Jonathan in the office of high-priest; and was so far from giving any credit to the calumniating suggestions of the rabble of the fugitive Jews against their countrymen, that, upon Jonathan's single request for an abatement of the tribute of Judæa, together with the dependencies of Samaria, Joppa, and Galilee, to the rate of only three hundred talents upon the whole, he caused the following declaration, upon the first word, to be dispatched away in their favour:

"Demetrius, the king, to his brother Jonathan, and the rest of the Jewish nation, sendeth greeting:

"You are hereby to understand, that we have written a letter to our trusty and well beloved cousin Lathenes, a copy of which is herewith transmitted."

"Demetrius, the king, to Lathenes, his cousin, greeting:

"Such is the sense we entertain of the return that our friends the Jews have, from time to time, made to our good will, that we are resolved to give them some distinguishing testimony of our particular esteem and regard for their welfare. Wherefore we hereby command that the governments of Aphareima, Lydda, and Ramatha, with all the lands dependent on those places, be assigned to the use of Judæa: and we exempt Jerusalem from all taxes heretofore paid to our ancestors, as well those called crown taxes, and on salt pits, as those on corn and fruit: and we command that for the future nothing of the kind be demanded. Take care that a copy of this letter be sent to Jonathan, and let it be hung up in one of the most conspicuous parts of the holy temple in Jerusalem."

Demetrius being now in full and quiet possession of the crown, and having reason to think he should not be interrupted by any enemies, dismissed his army without giving them their full pay, and retained in his service only a number of mercenary troops, which had been collected in Crete, and other adjacent islands. This discharge of his father's old troops, without any stipend for their past services, contrary to the practice of his ancestors, who paid them as well in peace as in war, and so kept them in readiness for any occasion, entirely alienated the affection of his subjects in general, and the army in particular.

Demetrius incurs the ill-will of the soldiery.

Tryphon revolts from Demetrius, who is supported by Jonathan. The singular ingratitude of Demetrius. Tryphon advances Antiochus to the throne, and gains the assistance of Jonathan. Jonathan renews a league with the Romans and Lacedæmonians. Defeat of Demetrius by Arsaces, king of Parthia.

THE defection of the army from Demetrius was so notorious, that Diodorus, otherwise called Tryphon, a native of Apamia, and formerly an officer under Alexander, observing the mutinous disposition that prevailed amongst them, applied himself to Malchus, an Arabian, who was at that time guardian of Antiochus, the son of Alexander, representing to him the alienation of the soldiery from Demetrius, and proposing the restoration of the young prince to the throne of his father. Malchus was at first diffident and scrupulous; but, at length, through pressing instances, was brought over to compliance.

1 Mac. 12. Tryphon revolts from Demetrius.

In the mean time Jonathan prosecuted the siege of the citadel of Jerusalem, with a resolution to clear not only the castle of the metropolis, but the strong holds in the country, where the fugitive Jews had sheltered themselves in garrison. To this end he sent ambassadors with presents to Demetrius, desiring him to withdraw all his men that were in any of the fortresses of Judæa. Demetrius, in reply, assured him, that he was ready to gratify him in that, or any other important requests, as soon as he was disengaged from the present war, that so engrossed his whole attention; adjuring him, at the same time, by every sacred tie of friendship, to send him a recruit of men, as his own troops, he said, were gone over to the enemy. Jonathan soon after sent the king a supply of three thousand choice men.

Jonathan carries on the siege of the citadel of Jerusalem.

Jonathan supplies Demetrius with 3000 select men.

The people of Antioch were so enraged against Demetrius, that they desired nothing more than an opportunity for revenge, so that, upon the report of this relief from Jerusalem, they determined to be beforehand with their king, and therefore beset the palace in such a manner, as if they were just ready to give the assault. But their main design was to secure the avenues, and seize upon the king on his coming out. Demetrius, finding himself thus beset, drew up his foreign mercenaries, together with Jonathan's auxiliaries, and charged the insurgents: but they were overpowered by numbers, and repulsed. The Jews then retired into the palace, where they mounted the battlements, and from thence, with darts and arrows, so annoyed and galled the Antiochians, that they forced them from one house to another, without much danger to themselves. They then set fire to the city; so that, the houses, being mostly of wood, and standing close to each other, a general conflagration ensued. The inhabitants, in the utmost consternation, betook themselves to flight: and the Jews, availing themselves of their confusion, pursued, and, according to the king's order, did great execution, slaying great numbers, and forcing the rest to throw down their arms, and sue for mercy.

They defend Demetrius in a sedition at Antioch.

Totally quell the insurgents.

Thus was this rebellion speedily crushed, so that Demetrius, having rewarded the Jews for their very seasonable assistance, sent them back to Jonathan, with a most honourable testimony of their valour, acknowledging that it was to their resolution he stood indebted for his success.

Demetrius ungratefully and pertinaciously breaks his promise with Jonathan.

But these services were soon forgotten by Demetrius, who, thinking he should have no farther occasion for the assistance of Jonathan, broke the agreement he had made for exempting him from the payment of the usual taxes, and threatened him with military litary execution, unless he, in future, made good those tributes to himself, which the Jews had formerly paid to his predecessors. This he would accordingly have done, if Tryphon had not divested him, by forcing him to make use of the preparations he had made against Jonathan for his own safety, though without effect: for Tryphon, being now returned out of Arabia into Syria, with young Antiochus, he set the crown upon his head, and, by the help of the soldiers inimical to Demetrius for the default of payment, proceeded to open hostilities, overcame him in battle, took from him his elephants, and the city of Antioch, and forced him back in Cilicia.

He is overcome, and driven from Antioch.

Jonathan is highly honoured by Antiochus.

Jonathan espouses the interest of Antiochus.

Antiochus, soon after his accession, sent an embassy to Jonathan, complimenting him with the title of his friend and ally, confirming him in the office of high-priest, putting him in possession of the four governments that were assigned to Judæa, and appointing his brother Simon to the command of all his forces from Tyre to the borders of Sidon. He also presented Jonathan with several golden cups, purple garments, and many badges of honour, and adopted him in the number of his chosen friends. Jonathan entertained so high a sense of these extraordinary tokens of honour and liberality, which he had received from Antiochus, that he dispatched messengers both to the young king and Tryphon, his prime minister, with a most affectionate tender of friendship and service, especially in joining against Demetrius as a common enemy, whom he reprobated as the most ungrateful of men, in returning evil for the most substantial good.

Brings over many cities to his cause.

Repents the indign behaviour of the people of Gaza.

Matters are at length amicably adjusted.

Having received a commission from Antiochus to raise forces, Jonathan proceeded for that purpose to Syria and Phœnicia, and from thence to all the neighbouring towns and cities, where he was treated with great honour in appearance, but levied no soldiers. Upon his arrival at Ascalon, he was received with great form by the inhabitants, who made him many valuable presents; and whom he invited, as he had done those in other cities through which he passed, to give up Demetrius, and espouse the cause of Antiochus, it being both their duty and interest so to do. He so far wrought upon them, by his reasoning and advice, that they promised supplies; but advancing afterwards to Gaza, upon the design of the same good office to Antiochus, he found, to his great surprise, the gates shut against him, and the people zealously attached to Demetrius.

Jonathan, incensed at this palpable indignity, laid siege to the place, and, in order to terrify the inhabitants into submission, sent a detachment of his forces to destroy the adjoining towns and villages with fire and sword. Seeing, therefore, nothing but inevitable destruction before them, without any appearance of relief from Demetrius, they came at last to a compulsive determination of making a seasonable and submissive application to Jonathan by their deputies, who were as frankly received on the other hand into his interest and friendship. He readily accepted the conditions they offered, and, having received hostages for the fulfilment of the same, left Gaza, and proceeded with his forces towards Damascus.

Simon invests and takes Bethsura.

In the mean time Demetrius had encamped with a powerful army before Cadasa, a place bordering on Tyre and Galilee, with a view of enticing Jonathan out of his way, and defeating him. But Jonathan advanced with all speed to encounter him, leaving the care of Judæa in his absence to his brother Simon, who, collecting all the forces he was able, marched up to Bethsura, and assaulted it, though accounted the strongest and most defensible place in all Judæa, and in the possession of the partizans of Demetrius. The people of the garrison, from the incessant plying of the machines and engines against them, apprehending themselves in a dangerous situation, sent a messenger to Simon, requesting permission to march away without violence, or any molestation, to Demetrius. Indeed, they were at length brought to these terms, through fear of being put to the sword. Simon, however, granted them their conditions, and placed another garrison of his own people in their stead.

By this time Jonathan had advanced with his forces, which he had greatly augmented on the way, as far as the plain of Azor, where he encamped unsuspecting of any danger; but a party of Demetrius having intelligence of his situation, lay in ambush behind a mountain, while others of them marched to attack him on the plain. As soon as Jonathan found himself thus beset, he gave the best orders to his soldiers the shortness of the time would permit; but the Jews, seeing the party of Demetrius who were placed in ambush, and fearful of being surrounded by the enemy, the greater part of them threw down their arms, and precipitately fled. So general, indeed, was the terror, that only a very small party remained with Jonathan, who were encouraged to stand against the enemy by means of their leader, together with two captains of his guards, Matthias, the son of Absalom, and Judas, the son of Chapsæus. These, with a band of gallant followers, charged the front of the enemy in so desperate a manner, that their lines were soon broken, which being seen by the deserters, some of them rallied, and fell on with such fury, that the army of Demetrius was entirely routed, about two thousand being slain on the spot, and the rest obliged to save themselves by a precipitate flight.

Jonathan, falling into ambush, is defeated by his men.

With a small remnant of the army of Demetrius.

Jonathan sends an embassy to the Romans and Lacedæmonians.

After this glorious victory Jonathan returned to Jerusalem, and, in the height of his successes, sent ambassadors to Rome to renew former alliances, giving them direction to go to Lacedæmon upon business of a similar nature. The Romans received the ambassadors with the highest respect, and dismissed them with letters, recommending that a safe passage might be granted them by the potentates of every dominion through which they might have occasion to pass. On their return they delivered the following letter to the Lacedæmonians.

“By a letter of very ancient date, from your king Arius, to our high-priest Onias, (a copy of which we send enclosed), we find that we are nearly allied to you in blood, and, by the testimony we there gave to Arius, it appears how happy we were in the ratification of such an alliance. We would now inform you, that we should long before have claimed your friendship, but that we left you the honour of setting the example. From the first ratification of your friendship to the present time, we have constantly offered up our prayers to the Almighty that you might live in health and prosperity, and overcome your enemies. In all our distresses and misfortunes, from the malice of ambitious neighbours, we have been cautious not to trouble you, or other allies. But Divine Providence having put an end to our wars, and our affairs being more at ease, we have dispatched Numenius, the son of Antiochus, and Antipator, the son of Jason, (both men of honour and senators), with letters to the Romans, and to yourselves, for renewing and strengthening the league of friendship between us. Return what answer you think proper; but let us know how we may testify our affectionate regard by every means in our power.”

His epistle.

At this time there were three sects amongst the Jews, who maintained different opinions concerning human actions. They went under the denominations of Pharisees, Sadduces, and Essenes. The Pharisees held, that men are subject to a fatality in some cases, and left at liberty in others, either to do, or not to do, as they pleased. The Sadduces allowed of no fatality at all in what case soever, but affirmed that every man has it in his own power to make his condition better or worse, according as he pursues measures right or wrong. The Essenes, on the other hand, asserted the power of an over-ruling destiny, working according to the predeterminations of an irresistible fate. But a more exact account of these opinions will hereafter be found in our history of the Jewish wars. We therefore resume our narrative.

Of the sects of the Pharisees, Sadduces, and Essenes.

In the mean time Jonathan, being informed that the forces of Demetrius, now greatly augmented, were advancing towards him, in hopes of redeeming the credit they had lost by their late overthrow, he hastened with all expedition to meet them at Amathis, with a full resolution to oppose their passage into Judæa. He encamped within fifty furlongs of the enemy, and sending spies to discover their design, found, upon their return with the best information they could get, and some prisoners they had taken that night, that the intention of the enemy was to surprise prize him in his quarters. In consequence of this intelligence, Jonathan made every necessary preparation for counteracting their design, by fixing centinels at the out-ports, and keeping his men under arms all night, acquainting them before-hand with the intention of the enemy. When the officers of Demetrius understood that their plan had been discovered, they were puzzled how to act, knowing themselves too weak for an encounter by force: they therefore, at length, formed a resolution of decamping in the night, which they accordingly did, and covered their retreat with several fires. At day-break Jonathan marched to attack them, when finding their camp abandoned, he pursued them with the utmost expedition; but his endeavours proved fruitless, the enemy having retreated to a secure place, beyond the river Eleutherus, before he could reach them. Jonathan then pursued his course to Arabia, plundered the country of the Nabathæans, made many of the inhabitants prisoners, took great numbers of their cattle, conducted them to Damascus, and there sold them.

Simon in the mean time proceeded with his forces, through Judæa and Palestine, to Ascalon, fortifying all the defensible places he came to in his way. From Ascalon he went to Joppa, of which he no sooner made himself master, than he placed a proper garrison in it, to keep the inhabitants in awe, and thereby prevent its falling into the hands of Demetrius.

Jonathan and Simon having taken the necessary measures to prevent any injury from the enemy abroad, returned to Jerusalem; and the people being summoned to the temple by the high-priest, he made a proposition to repair the walls of the city, fortify them with towers, and cut off all communication between the city and the castle by another wall; likewise to put the whole country in a state of defence, by placing proper garrisons in such parts of it as were thought best for the security of the people. This proposition being unanimously approved, Jonathan took the care of the city upon himself, and committed the country department to his brother Simon.

Demetrius, having passed the river, advanced into Mesopotamia, with a design of making himself master not only of the country, but of Babylon itself; proposing also, upon the reduction of the upper provinces, to make that quarter the seat of the war: for the Greeks and Macedonians, who dwelt there, had sent him several invitations to come over to them, with assurances that, upon his appearing, they would enlist under his banner, and assist him with their arms against Arsaces, king of Parthia. Elated by this assurance, Demetrius hastened towards them, confident, if he could overcome the Parthians, of ejecting Tryphon out of Syria. Upon his arrival he put himself at the head of a considerable army, and marched to attack Arsaces, by whom he was utterly routed, his whole army destroyed, and himself taken prisoner.

CHAP. X.

Instances of the treachery of Tryphon, and credulity of Jonathan, who is taken prisoner, and loses a thousand of his people.

DURING these transactions the base and treacherous Tryphon, who had no other view in getting young Antiochus into his hands than to answer his own wicked purposes, and was concerting the completion of his plan for possessing himself of the crown of Syria, now resolved, upon the miscarriage of Demetrius, to make one bold push for accomplishing his wishes. He well knew that, while Jonathan was in the interest of Antiochus, he could not possibly execute his design, and therefore the first point was to curtail him of his power; but as he was sensible he could not do this by force, he therefore had recourse to stratagem. To this end he went from Antioch to Bethsan, called, by the Greeks, Scythopolis, where he found Jonathan, at the head of forty thousand chosen men, ready to execute his commands. Tryphon, on his arrival, made him many presents and compliments, directed the officers of his army to pay the same respect and obedience to Jonathan as to himself, proposing, by these artifices, to veil the treachery of his own heart, and create in the other such confidence as might expose him, through want of caution, to a fatal surprize. At length, after divers insinuations, he told Jonathan that, as the war was over, all things at peace, and Demetrius, from his reduced condition, was no longer able to trouble him, he might disband his army, retaining a competent guard about his person, and attend him to Ptolemais, which place, and all the adjacent towns, he was determined to put into his possession. Jonathan, attracted by these arguments and promises, and unsuspecting of his villainous design, cast himself wholly upon the sincerity and good faith of the perfidious Tryphon, inasmuch, that he dismissed all his army, except three thousand men; two of whom he left in Galilee, and went, with Tryphon, to Ptolemais with the other thousand.

He no sooner entered the town than the inhabitants, according to previous instructions from Tryphon, shut the gates upon him, made Jonathan prisoner; and cut off all his thousand people to a man. Having thus far succeeded in his design, he dispatched a party of his army into Galilee, with orders to massacre the other two thousand which were left by Jonathan in that part of the country; but these, having timely notice of the treacherous treatment of their commander and fellow-soldiers at Ptolemais, took to their arms, and facing about in order to engage, so intimidated the party of Tryphon, that they declined the combat, and returned to Ptolemais without executing the bloody design on which they were sent.

CHAP. XI.

Jonathan being detained prisoner, his commands supplied by Simon. Tryphon violates his faith, and orders Jonathan to be put to death. Simon is appointed general and high-priest by the people, and exhibits proofs of valour and wisdom.

WHEN the inhabitants of Jerusalem heard of the imprisonment of Jonathan (for whom, on account of his extraordinary valour and conduct, they had the highest regard) and the massacre of their brethren, they were greatly afflicted, and universal lamentations prevailed throughout the city. While he was their leader they had no fears; but now he was detained prisoner, they were apprehensive of the utmost danger from their enemies, whose power they thought it was impossible for them to withstand. To dissipate these disagreeable apprehensions, and remove that gloom which hung both on the minds and countenances of the people, Simon, having summoned them together for the purpose, addressed them in words to this effect;

“It is unnecessary, friends and countrymen, for me to say that my father, brothers, and myself, have been always ready to expose ourselves for the common liberty. The defence of law and religion has been the business of our family; nor am I so lost to the authority of example, as to think of preserving my life by the forfeit of my honour. Seek, not, therefore, for another commander, since I am willing to lead you wherever great and glorious actions shall call us. I count not myself greater than my brethren, nor value my life more than they did theirs. Never shall it be said, that I have departed from the dignity of my family. I have no doubt, but God will, by my hands, avenge you of your enemies; deliver you, your wives, and children, from those who oppress you; and secure the holy temple from defilement.”

The people were so animated by this speech, that they immediately assumed confidence, suspended their fears, and revived their spirits, unanimously exclaiming, “None so fit as Simon to succeed to the command of his brave brothers Judas and Jonathan. Therefore let Simon be our general, and whatever he commands shall be obeyed.” Simon, being thus elected leader of the Jews, the first step he took was to order the walls of the city to be repaired, and fortified with strong and stately towers; having done which, he dispatched his friend Jonathan, the son of Abisalom, to Joppa, with orders to clear that town of its inhabitants, lest they should deliver it up to Tryphon makes an irruption into Judæa.

Soon after this Tryphon, at the head of a considerable army, marched from Ptolemais to Judæa, having with him Jonathan his prisoner. Simon, being aware of his approach, headed his forces, and proceeded to meet him, which he did on a mountain that overlooked the plain near the city of Adida. As soon as Tryphon saw the Jewish army, and understood that Simon had been chosen their leader, he thought it most expedient to decline an engagement; and therefore resolved, instead of force, to endeavour to obtain his ends by deceit and stratagem. To effect this, he dispatched one of his principal officers to Simon, with a message to the following effect: "That he had seized Jonathan only because he owed an hundred talents to the king; but that, in case he would send the money, and Jonathan's two sons, as hostages for their father's fidelity, he would again let him at liberty, since he was only detained till the king's due should be paid." Simon, suspecting a deception intended by this message, and yet thinking, if he refused the money as a ransom, or the sons as hostages, it might cost his brother Jonathan his life, and that his death would of course be imputed to him, summoned a council of the principal people, to whom he intimated his suspicion of treachery, but observed, at the same time, that he thought it would be most proper to send both the young men and the money, as otherwise he might be thought indifferent with respect to the safety of his brother.

Tryphon obtains money of Simon by fraud.

This being unanimously agreed to, the money and hostages were accordingly sent to Tryphon, who, instead of fulfilling his agreement, by delivering up Jonathan, retained both him and his sons. He then marched with his army up and down, ravaging the country, till he came at length to Dora, a city of Idumæa, with an intention to pass that way to Jerusalem: but Simon watched his motions so closely, as to prevent his carrying his design into execution.

While Tryphon was on the way, he received intelligence from Jerusalem, that the garrison was hard pressed for want of provisions, and that they earnestly requested he would immediately hasten away to their relief. Upon this he ordered his horse to be in readiness, as he determined to proceed, without delay, to Jerusalem; but so deep a snow fell in the night, that the ways were covered, and impassable, especially for the cavalry. Upon this disappointment he decamped, returned to Cælo-Syria, and passing through the country of Galaad, near the city of Basca, he basely caused Jonathan to be slain and buried there, and afterwards returned to Antioch.

Jonathan is slain by order of Tryphon.

A monument erected to his memory.

In the mean time Simon was returned to Jerusalem, where, hearing of his brother Jonathan's death, and that he was buried at Basca, in the land of Galaad, he sent for his remains, which he deposited in the sepulchre of his father, at Modin, and ordered a general mourning to be observed upon the occasion. He afterwards erected a stately monument over the sepulchre, the whole of which was of white marble, polished, and curiously wrought with a variety of figures. He raised also seven pyramids for his father, mother, four brothers, and himself, one for each, a work of such admirable state and beauty, that it is to be seen to this day, and hath the reputation of being an exquisite piece. This may suffice to shew the care and zeal of Simon, in doing due honour to his family, by so magnificent a monument, and particularly to the memory of Jonathan, who had now governed the people in quality both of prince and high-priest for the space of four years; his brother Simon succeeding him by the universal suffrages of the people.

Simon renders singular services to his country.

In the first year of his promotion he freed them from the tribute formerly paid to the Macedonians, and this was in the year 170, from the coming of Seleucus Nicanor to the kingdom of Syria. Simon had obtained such esteem and authority among the people, that they dated their writings, public and private, in such a year of Simon, the governor of the Jews; adding, "and most deserving patron of the nation." For under his administration all things succeeded well, both in war and peace, through the advantages he procured his friends, and the victories he obtained over the common enemy, destroying the cities of Gaza, Joppa, and Jamnia, and laying the citadel of Jerusalem level with the ground. He also took care to prevent inconveniencies in future, by putting it out of condition, either for annoying the town, or serving as a place of refuge to fugitives or rebels. To this end he gave his advice to the digging up and levelling of the mountain itself, that the castle stood upon, so as to leave the temple the advantage of the higher ground. Upon this consideration he summoned an assembly of the people, and laid before them the damages they had sustained from this castle, and the inconveniencies they might reasonably expect from it in future, if it should ever fall into the hands of an enemy. This plain, but just, mode of reasoning, wrought so effectually on the multitude, that they unanimously approved the purpose of demolishing the mountain. They then immediately fell to work, and plied it so incessantly, night and day, for three years, that, in the end, by means of indefatigable labour, they brought it under the command of the temple.

Tryphon proceeds in his iniquitous practices. Simon forms an alliance with Antiochus Soter. They expel Tryphon from Syria. He at length falls a victim to popular resentment, and is put to death.

SOON after the taking of Demetrius Nicanor prisoner, Tryphon caused his pupil, Antiochus, the son of Alexander, to be secretly murdered, and a report to be propagated, that he lost his life by an unlucky accident that happened in his exercises. This report being credited, the assassin, by his artifices and deceit, so wrought on the minds of the people, that they unanimously chose him for their king, and placed him on the throne of Syria, alledging, that Demetrius was a prisoner to the Parthians, and that Antiochus would never forget the deserters of his brother.

Tryphon cause young Antiochus to be taken off.

Obtains the crown of Syria.

The base and perfidious Tryphon, having thus possessed himself of the throne of Syria, began to display that turpitude of heart which had been distinguished while in a private character. His point was no sooner gained than he threw off the mask, and proved that the name of Tryphon (which signifies a dissolute wretch) was an epithet he justly merited. His disposition and conduct proved so disagreeable to the soldiers in particular, that they deserted in great numbers, and went over to Cleopatra, the wife of Demetrius, who was at this time in retirement with her children in Seleucia; while Antiochus (otherwise called Soter, and the brother of Demetrius) was in an obscure situation in Crete, inasmuch, that scarce any person dared to receive him, through fear of Tryphon.

Is deserted by the soldiers, who go over to Cleopatra, who marries Antiochus Soter.

Cleopatra, encouraged by the advice of her friends, and the appearance of the soldiers, who had deserted from Tryphon, as well as urged by the fears she had, lest the people of Seleucia should deliver up the place to the usurper, dispatched a messenger to Antiochus Soter, offering him the crown of Syria, and, at the same time, making a proposal of marriage. Antiochus immediately embraced the tender, both of her kingdom and person, so that, upon closing with Cleopatra, the people flocked to him in such numbers, that he soon found himself at the head of a very considerable army. With these forces he marched against Tryphon, overcame him in battle, drove him out of Syria into Phœnicia, and at length pent him up in the strong fortrefs of Dora. Antiochus then sent ambassadors to Simon, the high-priest of the Jews, with a treaty of amity and alliance. The terms were frankly accepted by Simon, who soon after sent him a supply of money and provisions for carrying on the siege, which was a service at that time so acceptable to Antiochus, that he ranked him amongst the number of his best friends. The siege of Dora was carried on for some time, till, at length, Tryphon made his escape, and, after flying from place to place, endeavoured to shelter himself in Apamia, his place of nativity; but an universal disgust prevailing against him among the inhabitants, they seized him, and put him to death in the fourth year of his government.

ANTIOCHUS being of a covetous, and consequently ungrateful, disposition, was no sooner settled on the throne of Syria, than, forgetful of the good offices Simon had done him, and the promises he had made him in return, he sent an army, under the command of his general Cendebeus, to lay waste Judæa, and seize upon his person. The thought of this base perfidy, on the part of Antiochus, so irritated Simon, that, heedless of the infirmities of age, with a juvenile resolution, he made the necessary preparations for giving him a warm reception. Having assembled his forces, he dispatched two divisions of them under the command of his two sons, while himself took a circle with the main body of the army, planting ambuscades in different parts of the country. Nor did he fail of success in his attempts, for he foiled his treacherous foe in every encounter, and justly retaliated the injuries he had sustained; after which he renewed his alliance with the Romans, and led the rest of his life in peace.

WHEN Simon had been eight years governor of Judæa, he was barbarously murdered by the treachery of his son-in-law, Ptolemy, whom he had made governor of the plains of Jericho. This execrable villain, who was rich and ambitious, had laid a design for usurping the government of Judæa to himself; but this could not well be done without the destruction of Simon and his family. To perpetrate the horrid design, he invited his father-in-law to a feast, where, as he was regaling himself, unsuspecting of danger, he caused him to be assassinated. He then made his wife, and two of his sons, prisoners, and sent his ruffians in quest of his third son, John, (otherwise called Hyrcanus), to take him off, as they had done his father; but Hyrcanus, being apprized of the design, went to a sanctuary in Jerusalem, where he was received with open arms by the multitude, through the veneration they had for the memory of his father, and their aversion to Ptolemy for his perfidy, whom they bravely repulsed upon an attempt to enter at one gate, because they had already received Hyrcanus at another.

WHEN the fall of Simon was known at Jerusalem, Hyrcanus was declared high-priest, and prince of the Jews, in the place of his father, whose death was universally lamented, and a general mourning throughout the whole country was observed on the melancholy occasion (a).

The first thing Hyrcanus did, after he entered upon his office, was to offer up prayers and sacrifices in due form, which being done, he made an expedition against Ptolemy, who had retired to the castle of Dagon. The grand difficulty he met with, in the prosecution of this design, was to surmount a natural affection towards his mother and brethren, whom Ptolemy caused to be whipped, and otherwise publicly tormented, on the battlements, threatening to cast them down headlong, unless he immediately raised the siege. This terrible menace abated the resolution of Hyrcanus, who thought, if he persisted in his attempt, the consequence would be an aggravation of cruelty to his relations. His mother, observing his embarrassment, called aloud, urging him not to consider the sufferings of herself and sons, but to avenge the injury his family had received, and expressed a willingness to expire under the most excruciating torments, on condition that the barbarous and unnatural tyrant, Ptolemy, should meet with a punishment proportioned to the enormity of his guilt. This instance of fortitude and generosity animated Hyrcanus to make a vigorous assault; but observing that, in proportion to the force he exerted for reducing the fort, additional cruelty was exercised upon his mother, and his desire of revenge yielding to filial tenderness, the siege was protracted till the coming on of the sabbatical year, wherein the Jews were obliged to rest; so that Ptolemy, by these means, being delivered from the war and the siege, after putting to death the mother and brothers of Hyrcanus, withdrew to the tyrant Zeno, surnamed Cotyla, who, at that time, had usurped to himself the city of Philadelphia.

(a) The author of the first book of Maccabees, in the encomiums he bestows on Simon, tells us, that he fought the good of the nation in every thing, so that his authority always pleased them well: that, during his administration, whilst Syria, and other neighbouring kingdoms, were almost destroyed by wars, the Jews lived quietly, every man under his own vine and fig-tree, enjoying, without fear, the fruits of their labours, and beholding, with pleasure, the flourishing state of their country. Their trade was increased by the reduction of Joppa, and other maritime places; their territories enlarged, their armies well disciplined, their towns and fortresses well garrisoned, their religion and liberties secured, their land freed from heathen ene-

C H A P. XVI.

Antiochus makes war against Hyrcanus, who afterwards enters into a league with him. Antiochus is defeated and slain, and succeeded on the throne of Syria by his brother Demetrius.

ANTIOCHUS, stimulated by the disappointments and disgrace formerly brought on him by Simon, the father of Hyrcanus, made an inroad into Judæa, in the fourth year of his reign, the first of the government of Hyrcanus, and the hundred and sixty second olympiad. Having first ravaged the country, he drove Hyrcanus into the city itself, dividing his army into seven bodies round about it. The siege was carried on with great resolution, and the defence of the place gallantly supported for some time. The camp was for some time distressed for want of water; but that defect was at length plentifully supplied by a great fall of rain. Upon a general survey, they found the town most accessible upon the north side, and therefore directed their force principally to that quarter, raising an hundred turrets, of three stories high, which were lined with soldiers to carry on the attack. They had likewise drawn a double circumvallation, of great length and depth, to cut off the means of communication and relief. But this did not intimidate the defendants from making frequent sallies, and doing execution, when they found the assailants off their guard. If, indeed, they found them in a posture to receive them, they could make good their retreat at pleasure. Hyrcanus, discerning the inconvenience of retaining in the town many useless people, turned such out, having taken care to separate those that were fit to bear arms; so that between Antiochus, on the one hand, who stopped them from going farther, and Hyrcanus, on the other, who would not suffer them to go back, the poor wretches wandered about the walls, till many of them perished for want.

He observes farther, that this Simon was no less zealous for the service of God, in extirpating apostacy, superstition, idolatry, and every thing else that was contrary to the laws of God: that he was a great protector of the true Israelites, and a friend to the poor; and that he restored the service of the temple to its antient splendor. It is not, therefore, to be wondered at, that the Jewish Sanhedrim should think no dignity or honour, while he lived, nor no grief or lamentation, when he was dead, too great for a man of such distinguished merit.

It so fell out that it was now the feast of tabernacles; so that those who were within the town commiserated their condition, and received them again. Upon this occasion the inhabitants addressed themselves to Antiochus only to grant a truce for seven days in honour of the solemnity, with which, from a conscientious motive, he immediately complied. Nor did he only gratify them in their request, but sent them sumptuous presents for sacrifices, such as bulls with gilded horns, cups of gold and silver, replenished with costly perfumes, and, in fine, treated them in a manner wholly the reverse to that of Antiochus Epiphanes, who, when he had taken the city, sacrificed swine upon the altar, and committed other abominable profanations, in contempt of the religion, laws, and ceremonies of the Jews, which was the cause of an irreconcilable animosity between that prince and our nation; whereas the present Antiochus obtained the surname of "the Pious," in token of the reverence he had for the sacred rites of religion.

Hyrceanus was induced, by this instance of the king's candour and moderation, to solicit him, by an embassy on behalf of the Jews, for the liberty of living one with another, according to the laws and customs of their own country. The higher class of his subjects were for the extirpation of the Jews, ■ people who affected to be more holy than their neighbours, and prized themselves of a singularity of manners from the rest of mankind. But the king, conceiving this peculiarity in their favour, could not be persuaded to rigorous measures; but, on the contrary, sent word back to Hyrceanus, that, upon condition the besieged would deliver up their arms, undertake to pay tribute for Joppa, and the rest of the cities about Judæa, and receive a garrison into the town of his appointment, he was ready to put an end to the war. The Jews agreed to all the terms, but that of receiving the garrison, from a religious scruple of intermixing with strangers; and therefore proposed, as a composition for that article, to give the king hostages for the performance of covenants, and five hundred talents over and above. The king accepted the proposal; three hundred talents were deposited in part, and the brother of Hyrceanus sent as one of the hostages. Upon the finishing of the treaty, Antiochus raised the siege and departed.

Hyrceanus after this caused the sepulchre of David to be opened, who excelled all other princes in opulence, and took out of it three thousand talents for his own use. With this sum he raised mercenary troops; being the first of the nation that ever entertained an army of strangers. He then ratified the league of friendship with Antiochus, invited him to a splendid entertainment in the city, and accompanied him with his auxiliaries to the Parthian war, as we have it from the authority of Nicolaus of Damascus, who writes to the following purport:

"Antiochus, upon the routing of Indates, the Parthian general, erected a triumphal arch upon the bank of the river Lycus, where he rested two days at the request of Hyrceanus, a Jew, being just at the time of one of their festivals, upon which day he made a conscience of travelling." The account of the historian is certainly authentic in this particular; for the feast of Pentecost fell out, at that time, to be just the next day after the sabbath; and it is unlawful for us to travel upon either of these two days.

Antiochus at length came to an engagement with Arsaces, king of Parthia, in which he lost both his army and his life. His brother, Demetrius, succeeded to the kingdom of Syria, through favour of Arsaces, who freed him from captivity at the same time that Antiochus invaded his dominions of Parthia.

C H A P. XVII.

Hyrceanus makes an expedition against Syria. Forms a new alliance with the Romans. The death of Demetrius. Succession and fate of Alexander.

Hyrceanus advances to Syria.

UPON the death of Antiochus, Hyrceanus marched immediately with his army into Syria, presuming, as it afterwards proved, that he should find the country in a deserted, defenceless state. In the course of six months, with some difficulty, he took Medaba, and after that Semega, and other adjacent places. He then made himself master of Sichem and Garizim, with the land of the Churhites, where stood the temple which, by permission of Alexander, was built, after the model of that at Jerusalem, by Sanballat, one of his governors, to gratify his son-in-law, Manasses, brother of Jaddus, the high-priest, as we have already related. This temple was deserted two hundred years after it was built.

Hyrceanus also took several strong places in Idumæa, as Adora and Marissa, and, at length, when he had subdued the whole province, issued a proclamation for all persons to depart the land who would not submit to circumcision; so that, rather than abandon their native country, the inhabitants not only complied in the point of circumcision, but in conformity to all other rites and ceremonies of the Jews, inasmuch, that they were reckoned in common with that nation.

Hyrceanus, being now about to renew a league with the Romans, sent an embassy to the senate with letters upon that subject. The letters being read and debated, a league was concluded upon according to the following form:

"Fanius, the son of Marcus Prætor, called a senate in the field of Mars, on the eighth of the ides of February. Present Lucius Manlius, the son of Lucius Mentina, and Caius Sempronius, the son of Caius Falerna, upon the business of the embassy of Simon, the son of Dositheus, Apollonius, the son of Alexander, and Diodorus, the son of Jason, persons of rank and probity, and deputed by the nation of the Jews to treat about an alliance, and other public matters, with the senate of Rome. Be it therefore agreed upon, that Joppa and the ports, Gazara with the fountains, and other places that had been taken away by Antiochus, contrary to a decree of the senate, be all restored; and the king's soldiers not to pass through that, or any other part of the Roman territories, without permission. That whatever had been done by Antiochus, in the late war, be declared void; and commissioners appointed to take an estimate of what the people had suffered in their lands and goods by his depredations, and to see reparation made for all losses."

Upon these conditions the senate was pleased to accept of the proposals that were presented them by these honourable persons in the name of their good friends and allies the people of the Jews. With respect to the returning an answer in form, they said it should be done at their first leisure, and care taken that no injury should be offered them in future. Fanius had orders likewise to furnish the ambassadors with money, out of the public treasury, to defray the expences of their return home, which he accordingly did, with recommendatory letters to all governors and officers in their way, for the security and accommodation of their passage.

While the affairs of the Jews, under the conduct of Hyrceanus, went on in this flourishing condition, there was no want of disposition in Demetrius to urge him to hostilities, provided he could have relied on being aided in his design. But he behaved in so tyrannical a manner, and pursued such wicked courses, that he became universally detested by his people, who, uniting in a conspiracy against him, sent messengers to Ptolemy Physcon, king of Egypt, requesting that he would send them a descendant of the house of Seleucus, whom they would immediately invest with the sovereignty. Ptolemy, who was no friend to Demetrius, readily complied with the request of the Syrians, to whom he sent Alexander, surnamed Zebina, attended by a very considerable army. In consequence of this a desperate battle took place, in which Demetrius being totally defeated, he fled to Ptolemais, where his wife Cleopatra then resided; not doubting but to find protection. In this, however, he soon found himself mistaken; for, on his arrival, he was denied entrance into the city, so that he betook himself for refuge to Tyre, where, falling into the hands of his enemies, they first made him a prisoner, and then put him to death.

dom of Syria, entered into a league with Hyrcanus, the high-priest, who was engaged, some time after, in a war with Antiochus Grypus, the son of Demetrius; and a battle ensuing, Alexander was slain. Antiochus, by this means, obtained the kingdom of Syria; but was intimidated from making war upon the Jews, upon hearing that Antiochus Cyzicenus, his brother, was, at that time, raising an army against him in the town of Cyzycus. Indeed, he was fully employed in making preparations to sustain the repeated attacks from this brother, who took his surname from the name of the place where he had his education. Antiochus Cyzicenus was the son of Antiochus Soter, who was detained prisoner by the Parthians. Cleopatra, as before observed, had been wife to the two brothers, Demetrius and Antiochus. Upon the coming of Antiochus Cyzicenus into Syria, a perpetual animosity prevailed between the brothers, so that Hyrcanus enjoyed an uninterrupted tranquillity; for, after the death of Antiochus, he detached himself entirely from the Macedonians, nor had he the least concern with them, either as an ally or a subject. In the days of Alexander Zebina his affairs were in a prosperous state; but more so in the reign of the two brothers; for, while they were annoying and harassing each other with perpetual hostilities, Hyrcanus had full possession of Judæa, and an opportunity of finding an inestimable mass of treasure. His attention, in a word, was devoted to the promotion of the interest of his country, regardless of, and despising, the altercations, broils, and contentions, of the rival brothers.

C H A P. XVIII.

During the contest between the rival brothers, Antiochus Grypus and Antiochus Cyzicenus, Hyrcanus takes and utterly demolishes Samaria. Hyrcanus attacks himself to the sect of the Sadducees, and relinquishes that of the Pharisees. His death.

Hyrcanus makes an expedition against Samaria.

The blockade occasions a famine.

IN consequence of these disturbances in Syria, Hyrcanus marched at the head of an army to the strong city of Samaria, now called Sebaste, since it was rebuilt by Herod, of which we shall speak in due time and place. He was so incensed against the Samaritans, for the indignities they had offered the people of Marissa, (a colony of the Jews, and confederate with them), that he determined to attack the place with the utmost vigour. Upon sitting down before it, he begirt the town with a large ditch, and a double wall, of eighty furlongs compass; and gave the conduct of the siege to his two sons, Antigonus and Aristobulus. Though they were both young, they prosecuted the undertaking with the judgment of experienced warriors, and displayed the greatest courage and magnanimity; inasmuch that the besieged were so pressed for want of provisions as to be reduced to the necessity of eating carrion. In this distressed situation they applied for relief to Antiochus Cyzicenus, who came with the utmost haste at their request; but being routed by Aristobulus, and pursued by the brothers as far as Scythopolis, he with great difficulty escaped being taken.

The brothers then returned to Samaria, and forcing the people into the town again, renewed the siege, which caused them to repeat their applications to Antiochus, who prevailed with Ptolemy, surnamed Lathurus, for a supply of six thousand men; but so much against the consent of his mother, as to endanger the loss of his kingdom. With these Egyptian auxiliaries Antiochus overran and ravaged the whole country of Hyrcanus, he not having, at that time, a body of forces sufficient to cope with him. His grand point in view was to divert Hyrcanus from the prosecution of the siege. However, through surprizes, desertions, and other casualties, he found his party, in a short time, so diminished, that he committed the conduct of the Jewish war to his generals, Callimander and Epicrates, and retired himself to Tripoli. Callimander, with more courage than conduct, ventured on a rash encounter, was immediately routed, and lost his life. Epicrates, from a principal of avarice, betrayed Scythopolis, and several adjacent towns, for money, to the Jews; so that all hopes of relieving Samaria were cut off. At length, after a siege of a year's continuance, which subjected the inhabitants to the greatest distresses, it was surrendered to Hyrcanus, who gave orders for its total demolition; after which he caused trenches to be dug in various parts across the ground where it stood, that it might not be afterwards rebuilt. There prevailed a strange, if not incredible, report, that, upon the day of the battle which the sons of Hyrcanus had with Antiochus Cyzicenus, it was revealed to him, as he was alone in the temple, in a supernatural manner, that his sons should obtain the victory. This he not only declared immediately to the multitude on his coming out of the temple, but it was soon literally fulfilled.

Samaria is taken and entirely destroyed.

The affairs of the Jewish nation were now in a flourishing state, not only in Jerusalem and throughout Judæa, but in Alexandria, Egypt; and Cyprus: for queen Cleopatra, being at variance with her son Ptolemy, delegated the command of her troops to Chelcias and Ananias, the sons of that Onias who erected the temple in the territory of Heliopolis, according to the model of that at Jerusalem, as before observed. These two persons were the queen's chief counsellors, according to the attestation of Strabo, the Cappadocian, who writes, that "Great numbers of those that either came formerly with us to Cyprus, or were sent thither afterwards by Cleopatra, immediately quitted the interest of the queen, and went over to Ptolemy; only the Jews, that were of the party of Onias, stood firm, from the reverence they paid the queen on account of the respect she shewed to Chelcias and Ananias, their friends and countrymen."

Prosperous condition of the Jews.

Testimony of Strabo.

The prosperous state of affairs, however, drew upon Hyrcanus, in a great measure, the envy of the Jews, and particularly the Pharisees, a prevailing sect amongst them. The authority of these people was so great, from their pretence to extraordinary strictness in religion, that they obtained the most distinguished reputation and interest amongst the multitude, whose conduct they could direct even in opposition to the sentiments of the high-priest, and the heads of the nation. Hyrcanus, having been educated among this sect, and being fearful lest their popularity might, in time, produce some disagreeable consequences, used various means to gain their esteem. Among other measures to effect this, he one day invited several of their leading men to a splendid entertainment, and, when his hospitality had caused a circulation of good humour, he arose from his seat, and thus addressed them: "Since, my good friends, I profess your principles, it is scarcely necessary to observe, that my most sanguine wish is to render myself acceptable to the Almighty by observing strict justice to my neighbour. If I have violated my duty, it is your business to admonish me; and it shall be mine to effect a reformation in my conduct."

Hyrcanus incurs the hatred of the Pharisees.

As soon as Hyrcanus had finished this address, the majority of the company gave him due applause, as a brave man, and worthy governor. But one of the guests, named Eleazar, a man of a malignant disposition, who had been hitherto silent, now arose, and deliberately addressed Hyrcanus as follows: "Having declared yourself an advocate for truth and plain dealing, you cannot be offended if I recommend a resignation of the high priesthood, and that you apply yourself only to the discharge of your authority." Surprized at this, Hyrcanus asked Eleazar what reason he had for giving him such advice. "Because (replied the other) we are assured, from authentic testimony, that, in the days of Antiochus Epiphanes, your mother was a captive taken in the wars, and being therefore the son of a strange woman, you are incapable of the office and dignity of high-priest."

Sarcastic address of Eleazar to Hyrcanus.

As this allegation was known to be totally void of truth, the company repented it with just indignation; and Hyrcanus himself was so exasperated, that that he vowed revenge against the person who had uttered so baleful calumny. While he was in this disposition, one Jonathan, an intimate friend of his, (but a zealous Sadducee), took the opportunity of endeavouring to prejudice Hyrcanus against the whole sect of the Pharisees. To this end he suggested to him, that it was not the single act of Eleazar, but a thing concerted by the whole party; that Eleazar, in speaking it out, delivered the sentiments of the rest; and that the truth of his observation would be confirmed, on demanding what punishment was due to a man who had uttered so scandalous a defamation of the character of the prince and high-priest of his nation.

Hyrcanus renounces the doctrines of the Pharisees, and adopts those of the Sadducees.

Hyrcanus took the advice of his friend Jonathan, and consulting the leaders of the Pharisees what punishment should be inflicted on the calumniator, they returned for answer, "That, being a people inclined to mercy, they did not adjudge a defamation to be an offence deserving death; and that they were of opinion, imprisonment and scourging would be sufficient penalty." This answer fully convinced Hyrcanus that what Jonathan had suggested was true; and, from that very moment, he became a mortal enemy to the whole sect of the Pharisees, abrogated their traditional constitutions, and enjoined a penalty on all who should observe them; at the same time renouncing their party, and going over to that of the Sadducees. This was the source of that disrepute in which he and his sons were afterwards held by the multitude, as will appear in due order of time and place.

The point in dispute betwixt the sect of Pharisees and Sadducees.

It is here proper to observe, that the Pharisees had many traditions handed down from father to son; which are not to be found amongst the laws of Moses; and that these transactions are rejected by the Sadducees, from a persuasion that only the written laws are authoritative and binding. This, then, is the grand subject of controversy between the two parties; the Sadducees being supported by the great and opulent, and the Pharisees by the multitude.

Death and character of Hyrcanus.

Hyrcanus, having adjusted the late dissention, enjoyed the remaining part of his life in uninterrupted peace and happiness. After holding the administration of all public affairs, both civil and ecclesiastical, for the space of thirty-one years, he paid the debt of nature, and left behind him five sons. He was esteemed by the wise disposer of all events, and giver of all good gifts, worthy of three eminent dignities; the civil government of the Jews, the high priesthood, and the spirit of prophecy; which last appeared from a Divine revelation, that his two eldest sons should not long enjoy the government after the death of their father; and his prediction was verified in the event.

Hyrcanus was a most excellent governor, and, from his prudent conduct, obtained more privileges for the Jews than they had ever enjoyed since the Babylonish captivity. He was a man of the strictest probity, and administered justice with such impartiality, as to acquire the general esteem of the people; so that he lived respected, and died lamented.

C H A P. XIX.

Aristobulus, the eldest son and successor of Hyrcanus, after exercising the most horrid and unnatural barbarities, and perpetrating the murders of his mother and brother Antigonus, expires in all the horrors of conscience, having reigned only one year.

Aristobulus takes upon him the title and authority of king.

ON the death of Hyrcanus, his eldest son, Aristobulus, succeeded him, and determining to change the form of government, put a crown on his head, and assumed the title and dignity of king. This happened 481 years and three months after the return of the Jews from the captivity of Babylon. Aristobulus, though naturally of a cruel, suspicious disposition, professed, on his accession, so particular a regard for his next brother, Antigonus, that he admitted him as a kind of partner in the government; but his mother, whom he considered as a kind of rival in the sovereignty, (Hyrcanus having left her all he could possibly confer), he ordered into close confinement, and consigned his three younger brothers to the same fate. His cruelty, in short, was so horrid and unnatural, that he caused his mother to be starved to death in her confinement; and afterwards sacrificed the life of his favourite brother, upon malignant and groundless insinuations. It was, indeed, some time before he would credit those malicious reports, through the affection he bore for Antigonus, and a suspicion he entertained, that they arose from envy and malevolence. Antigonus, returning from an expedition, on which he had been sent by his brother, just upon the solemnity of the feast of tabernacles, and hearing that Aristobulus was dangerously indisposed, went up to the temple, attended by his guards in great state, in order to offer up prayers for the restoration of his brother's health.

His cruelty to his mother and three of his brethren.

This being made known to the enemies of Antigonus, they immediately repaired to the king, telling him it was high time to look to himself; that his brother was gone up to the temple, in a dress, and with a retinue, far from becoming a private man; and that, in all probability, it would not be long before he would come with a troop of armed soldiers, and, by dint of force, divest him of his crown. Aristobulus did not give credit to all that was reported concerning his brother; but yet supposing there might be some foundation for a part, he adopted such measures for providing for his safety, as he thought might elude suspicion of his being apprehensive of danger. As a necessary precaution, therefore, he sent a messenger to his brother, with orders that he should put off his armour, and come to him; concluding, that if, pursuant to his requisition, he came unarmed, there was no mischief intended; but that if he did otherwise, there might be some truth in what had been said. Before he dispatched the messenger to Antigonus, he ordered his guards to be placed in a subterraneous passage that led from the palace to the temple, to watch his brother in his passage; and if he came without arms, to suffer him to pass unmolested; but if otherwise, instantly to put him to death. But the queen, and the rest of the conspirators, tampered with the messenger, and prevailed with him to tell Antigonus, on the contrary, that the king, being informed of his having an elegant suit of armour, was desirous of seeing it, and therefore required that he would come to him fully equipped in his martial attire. Antigonus, depending on the good faith of his brother, and suspecting no treachery, immediately left the temple, completely armed, as the messenger found him, in obedience (as he thought) to the king's commands. Upon his coming to a place called the Tower of Straton, the guards, which were posted there to watch him in his passage, fell on him, and put him to death. This disaster may suffice to shew the power of calumny on the human mind, and prove that good dispositions may be corrupted by its infernal suggestions. But the most extraordinary circumstance that attended it was the prediction of one Judas, a famous prophet of those times, whose prelates never failed. This Judas, as he saw Antigonus coming to the temple, exclaimed among his disciples, that he was now weary of his life; for Antigonus, whose death he had prefigured upon that very day at Straton's Tower, was yet alive, the place being six hundred furlongs off, and the day more than half spent; so that he had lost his reputation of a prophet for ever. While he was in this state of perplexity, the news arrived of Antigonus being slain in a subterraneous passage under the tower. This was called Straton's Tower, as well as that upon the coast, which was afterwards known by the name of Cæsarea; and this event fully reconciled the mind of the prophet.

Antigonus is calumniated by his enemies.

The queen and others conspire against his life.

He is slain.

Straton's Tower, Judas.

When Aristobulus heard that his commands were executed in the death of his brother, he was seized with a conscientious remorse. The horrors of his mind increased the distemper of his body, and so great were both, that he could find no ease for the one, nor any cure for the other.

Antigonus murdered his brother.

DEATH of ARISTOBULUS King of the JEWS.

Published as the Act directed by J. Cooke No. 7 Paternoster Row.

At length, his agonies increasing, he fell into a violent vomiting of blood. As one of the servants was conveying some of the blood away in a vessel, he spilt a part of it on the very spot where Antigonus had been slain, and where the stains of his blood were still to be perceived. The spectators, imagining this to be the effect of design, so loudly expressed their surprize as to be overheard by the king, who instantly enquired the cause. But as he became anxious to be informed, the people about him were the more desirous of concealing it. However, by the force of threats and entreaties, he at length prevailed on them to tell him; but his desire was no sooner complied with, than shedding abundance of tears, and fetching a deep sigh, he broke into the following exclamation.

"The all-seeing Power hath detected my iniquity, and my brother's murder hath called down the vengeance of heaven upon me. How long shall I hold that life which is forfeited to the blood of a mother and a brother? Rather, why do I not expire on a sudden, than thus yield my life drop by drop, as if the severest punishment was inadequate to my guilt?" With these words he gave up the ghost, having governed only one year, under the surname of Philellen, that is to say, a Lover of the Greeks. He did his country some services, made war upon Ituræa, and annexed a considerable part of it to the territory of Judæa, compelling the people, upon pain of banishment, to live in conformity to the religious rites and customs of the Jews. His character is thus briefly described by Strabo, in the name of Timagenes: "He was a man of candour, and, in many respects, a friend to the Jews; for he enlarged their jurisdiction by annexing to it Ituræa, uniting the people also with one common bond of circumcision."

Aristobulus expires in agony, confessing his crimes.

CHAP. XX.

Alexander, on his accession to the throne, besieges Ptolemais. Quits the siege, and carries on a public plan, with respect to an affected attachment to the interests both of Cleopatra and Ptolemy. Ptolemy invests Ptolemais, and takes the city of Assochis by assault.

Salome, the wife of Aristobulus, advances Alexander to the throne.

ARISTOBULUS was succeeded on the throne by his brother, Alexander Jannæus, who had been kept in prison during the whole of the late reign; but, on the decease of Aristobulus, his wife, Salome; (by the Greeks called Alexandra), released him and his two brothers from confinement, and advanced Alexander, being the eldest, to the regal dignity. It was the misfortune of Alexander to incur his father's aversion almost as soon as he was born, which was imputed to the following cause. Hyrcanus had a vision one night, from which he obtained information; upon enquiry, that Alexander should succeed him in his government; and the information was conveyed by a lively representation of the figure of his successor. Aristobulus and Antigonus, being his favourites, and Hyrcanus finding that neither of them was designed by this figure, he applied it to Alexander, under the double mortification both of his crown and his fortune falling to a younger son. Alexander, upon this account, was sent for education into Galilee; but the event, however, answered the prediction for Alexander, upon the death of Aristobulus, entered upon the administration, and taking off one of his brothers that would have supplanted him, treated the other with great honour, though in the contented state of a private life.

As soon as Alexander had settled the affairs of state, he marched with an army to Ptolemais, and meeting with the enemy, a desperate battle ensued, in which Alexander proved victorious, beat the enemy into the town, and then shut them up in it. There was only this place and Gaza, of all the sea-coast towns, that stood out, beside Dora and the Tower of Straton, which was in the hands of Zoilus. Antiochus Philometor, and his brother, Antiochus Cyzicenus, were so wasted with the war, in which they were engaged with each other, that the people of Ptolemais could expect no relief from either.

Zoilus watched an opportunity for making an advantage of these divisions, and sent the inhabitants of Ptolemais some occasional assistance.

The besieged, in fine, had no hopes of relief, but from Egypt; and their principal dependance was upon Ptolemy Lathurus, who, having been compelled to evacuate his kingdom by his mother Cleopatra, had retired to Cyprus. They accordingly sent ambassadors to Ptolemy, requesting his assistance against Alexander; at the same time assuring him, there was every reason to believe the inhabitants both of Gaza and Ptolemais would declare in his favour on his entering Syria; and that he would be supported by Zoilus, the Sidonians, and other neighbouring people. The king was so elated with these assurances, that he sent word, by the ambassadors, he would immediately comply with their request, and accordingly gave orders for all possible dispatch to be made in the equipment of a fleet for this enterprize.

The people of Ptolemais apply for succour to Ptolemy Lathurus.

While this business was executing, one Demænetus, a man of considerable interest with the citizens of Ptolemais, reflecting, that the steps they had taken might be productive of ill consequences, assembled the people, whom he addressed to this effect:

"The point in question (said he) is, whether it will be most eligible to abide the event of the war, or to accept of the relief we have requested: for, if we put ourselves under the protection of Ptolemy, inevitable slavery must be the consequence. Danger is also greatly to be apprehended from Egypt; for it is not to be imagined that Cleopatra will remain inactive, while Ptolemy is preparing for war. She will send a powerful army to pursue and attack him unprepared. Besides, the queen is determined to drive him out of Cyprus; and when she finds him engaged in strengthening his interest with the neighbouring provinces, she will seize the opportunity to effect her purpose. To give the argument another turn, let us suppose that Ptolemy will be driven back to Cyprus; we shall then be left without succour, and he will have dangers to encounter that he may not at present apprehend."

Demænetus dissuades the people from treating with Ptolemy.

This address destroyed the hopes that had been entertained by the people of the success of their embassy, and of which Ptolemy was informed during his passage: but, notwithstanding this, he resolved to proceed on his voyage, and engage in the enterprize to which he had been invited. He continued his course to Sicamin, where he landed his forces, which consisted of about thirty thousand horse and foot, and advanced at the head of them towards Ptolemais. When he came within some distance of the place, he dispatched ambassadors to inform them of his arrival and situation; but, to his great surprize, they refused to receive the message, or hold any intercourse either with him or his agents.

Ptolemy is repulsed by the inhabitants of Ptolemais.

This disappointment greatly embarrassed Ptolemy, who, while he was considering what measures to pursue, received a message from Zoilus, and the people of Gaza, requesting that he would immediately come to their assistance against Alexander, who was committing great depredations in their territories, and whose forces were too powerful for them to subdue.

This solicitation was very agreeable to Ptolemy, who immediately marched his army to their relief; but Alexander, not thinking it adviseable to hazard an engagement with them, withdrew his army, and placed them in winter quarters. But though he had raised the siege, and withdrawn all his troops, he knew he was unable to cope with Ptolemy, and therefore thought of effecting that by policy which he could not by force. To this purpose he entered into a treaty with Ptolemy, engaging to pay him four hundred talents of silver, on condition that he would deliver Zoilus and his territories into his hands.

This Ptolemy Lathurus agreed to do, and accordingly soon after got Zoilus into his custody, but being being informed that, at this very time, Alexander was clandestinely treating with Cleopatra, to bring her upon him with all her forces, he looked upon the covenant as void, and instantly laid siege to Ptolemais, where the gates were shut against him. Upon this he divided his army, leaving one part before the town to carry on the siege, and marched off himself with the remainder to lay waste the country of Judæa. Alexander, on the other hand, to counteract the design of Ptolemy, levied an army of his own people, (some say of fifty, and others of eighty, thousand men,) and with it advanced against the enemy; while Ptolemy, in the mean time, taking the advantage of a sabbath-day, fell upon Assochis, a city of Galilee, and took it by assault, with ten thousand prisoners, and an immense booty.

Ptolemy is repulsed at Scythopolis.

The two armies come to action.

The Jews are defeated.

Savage cruelty of Ptolemy.

Cleopatra makes mighty preparations to oppose Ptolemy.

HAVING subdued Assochis, Ptolemy, elated with success, made an assault upon Scythopolis, a place not far distant from that which was destroyed; but, in this attempt, he was defeated, and sustained great loss. He then led his army against Alexander, whom he found in the neighbourhood of Afopus, near the river Jordan, and encamped just over against the enemy. Alexander had in his van eight thousand of those they called Hecatontomachi. These were all armed with brazen bucklers, ■ were also some of Ptolemy's men in the front, but the generality of them not being so well armed as their adversaries, were rather disinclined to come to an engagement. Philostephanus, however, a man of great military skill and experience, and the chief officer under Ptolemy, gave them all possible encouragement, telling them, if they behaved courageously, there was no doubt of their success against the enemy. The first word of command was to pass the river that parted the two armies, which Alexander did not attempt to oppose, in confidence of victory, if he could but engage them with the river behind, to cut off the retreat. When the two armies met a most desperate battle ensued, which, for some time, was sustained with great bravery by both parties, and with doubtful success. At length, on a body of Ptolemy's troops giving way, victory seemed to incline to Alexander; but Philostephanus coming to their relief with a seasonable reinforcement, the Jews were entirely routed, with great slaughter. Some relate that thirty thousand men were slain in that battle: but, according to Timagenes, in his history, the number amounted to fifty thousand. The rest were either taken prisoners, or compelled to save themselves by ■ precipitate flight.

After this carnage Ptolemy went to some villages belonging to the Jews, and commanded his soldiers to murder the women and children, and then put their bodies into vessels of water, which were to be placed over fires. He is said to have had recourse to this bloody device in order to strike terror into those who had escaped by flight, by making them think that his army was accustomed to feed on the flesh of the enemy. This horrid transaction is confirmed by the joint testimony of Strabo, and Nicolaus of Damascus. The same forces also took Ptolemais by force.

Cleopatra now became so sensible of the overgrown power of her son, from the reduction of Gaza, and the laying waste of Judæa, that she thought it necessary to curb his ambition, which might prompt him to attempt the invasion of Egypt. Upon this precaution she mustered, with the utmost expedition, all the force she could possibly raise, both naval and military, constituting Chelcias and Ananias, two Jews, her commanders in chief of the distinct departments. She sent the greatest part of her treasure, with her last will and testament, and her grandchildren, to the isle of Coas, and ordered a powerful fleet into Phœnicia to keep that province in awe, while she herself proceeded to Ptolemais, and being refused admittance, laid siege to the city.

Ptolemy receiving intelligence of this, quitted Syria, and hastened into Egypt, imagining that, arriving so unexpectedly, and in the absence of the queen, he should find the country in ■ defenceless state; but he was much disappointed in his expectation. At this time Cleopatra had the misfortune to lose Chelcias, one of her generals, as he was in pursuit of Ptolemy in Cœlo-Syria.

When Cleopatra heard of Ptolemy's miscarriage in his attempt upon Egypt, she sent ■ strong detachment after him, which drove him out of the country, and forced him to return, and take up his winter quarters in Gaza; while she, in the mean time, took the city and garrison of Ptolemais by assault. Upon this Alexander repaired to her with many valuable presents, and was kindly received by the queen, who considered him ■ an unhappy prince, who, under the persecution and oppression of a common enemy, had fled to her for protection. Some of her counsellors advised her to embrace this opportunity of seizing both on Alexander and his dominions: but this motion was warmly opposed by Ananias, who represented to her the great danger, as well as injustice, of such ■ procedure, which would be deemed a violation of the laws of hospitality and common faith, as well as incur the ill-will of every Jew upon the face of the earth that had the interest of his country at heart. The queen was so pleased with the plain dealing of Ananias in this case, that she not only forbore every rigour towards Alexander, but entered into ■ league of friendship with him at Scythopolis, a city of Cœlo-Syria.

Alexander, thus delivered from the power, and consequently the fear, of Ptolemy, made an expedition into Cœlo-Syria, where, after ■ ten months siege, he took Gadar, and after that Amathus, a very strong fortress belonging to the inhabitants above Jordan; the place where Theodotus, the son of Zeno, in the fury of revenge, fell upon the Jews by surprise, cut off ten thousand of their men, and took Alexander's baggage. But this unexpected disaster did not divert him from his design upon Raphia, a sea-coast town, and Athedon, which was afterwards, by Herod, called Aggripiades, both which he reduced by force.

Ptolemy, by this time, had left Gaza, and retired to Cyprus. Cleopatra had also returned to Egypt; so that Alexander took the occasion of revenging himself upon the people of Gaza, for calling in Ptolemy to their succour, and therefore laid siege ■ the town, and, at the same time, harassed their country. While Alexander was before the place, Apollodotus, their commander, made a desperate rally, one night, with two thousand mercenaries, and ten thousand of the citizens, well armed, upon the camp of the Jews. During the night the besieged prevailed, upon an apprehension of the enemy, that they were attacked by Ptolemy. But when day-light appeared, and freed them from that apprehension, the Jews rallied, and so furiously charged the garrison, that they destroyed ■ thousand of their men. Notwithstanding this defeat, the people of Gaza were determined to encounter all difficulties of number, force, nay famine itself, rather than submit to the enemy. They were encouraged to persist in this resolution by Aretas, an Arabian prince, who had promised to come at the head of a large body of forces to their assistance; but, before his arrival with the supply, the place was reduced, through the base treachery of Lyfimachus, brother to Apollodotus, who, envying the credit and esteem he had so justly acquired by his defence of the place, first caused him to be slain, and then delivered up the city to Alexander. This prince, on his first entrance, affected a degree of moderation and lenity; but the very appearance soon vanished; for he turned his soldiers loose among the people, with a commission at large, to kill, burn, and destroy at pleasure; so that the most dreadful scenes of barbarity took place that can can possibly be conceived. The inhabitants, finding they were to have no quarter, stood upon their defence, and sold their lives at so dear a rate, that, in the general carnage, Alexander lost nearly as many of his own men as he killed of the enemy. Some of the inhabitants set fire to their own houses, that they might not be plundered by the enemy; and some went even so far as to lay violent hands upon their wives and children, choosing rather that they should die in freedom than live in bondage. The magistracy of the town happened to be in council when these barbarous troops entered; and the senators, to the number of five hundred, retired to the temple of Apollo for sanctuary; but they were all slaughtered to a man: the town was sacked and levelled; and Alexander, after a year spent before it, returned to Jerusalem.

During these transactions some material revolutions took place in the court of Syria. The first was the death of Antiochus, otherwise called Gryphus, who was assassinated by the treachery of Heracleus, in the forty-fifth year of his life, and nine and twentieth of his reign. His son Seleucus, who succeeded him, soon after his accession, waged war with his uncle Antiochus, called Cyzicenus, whom he defeated in battle, and afterwards put to death. After his death his son Antiochus, surnamed Eutibes, being greatly beloved by the people, was crowned at Arad, immediately made war upon Seleucus, defeated, and drove him out of Syria. Seleucus fled for safety to Cilicia, where, in requital for the inhospitable reception he met with, he treated the inhabitants with the greatest tyranny, and subjected them to enormous taxes, so that, incensed thereby to the highest degree, they set fire to the palace, and he, with his attendants, perished in the flames.

Divers revolutions in the government of Syria.

While Antiochus Cyzicenus was in possession of the government of Syria, there was another Antiochus, the brother of Seleucus, who waged war with him, in which he lost his life and his army. After this his brother Philip took the crown, and governed part of Syria. Ptolemy Lathurus, upon this, sent for his fourth brother from Guidus, called Demetrius Eucærus, and constituted him king of Damascus. Antiochus maintained a powerful opposition to these brothers for the time he lived; but, being called to the assistance of Laodice, queen of the Galadenites, he was slain in the field of battle, with his sword in his hand, and fell like a man of honour. After his death the government of Syria descended to his own brothers, Philip and Demetrius.

A sedition against Alexander.

Alexander, on his return to Jerusalem, found things in a very different situation to what he had expected; for the people, being incensed at his conduct, were ripe for an open rebellion, of which they very soon gave him ample demonstration. It happened, soon after his return, to be the time for celebrating the feast of tabernacles, during which it was a custom among the Jews to carry in their hands branches of citron or palm-trees. As Alexander was preparing to assist at the solemnity as high-priest, the multitude had the insolence to throw citrons at him, and make use of very opprobrious language, telling him he was a slave, and unworthy to go up to the holy altar to offer solemn sacrifices. This treatment enraged him to such a degree, that ordering his soldiers to fall upon them, no less than six thousand were instantly put to death. After this he caused the court of the priests to be surrounded with a wooden partition, to prevent the people from coming near him while he was officiating as high-priest; and, to secure his person against all future attempts, he hired mercenaries from Pisidia and Cilicia, not daring to trust his own countrymen.

Having by these means, in some measure, put a stop to the tumults at home, Alexander marched with his forces in pursuit of new conquests, subdued and laid the Moabites and Galaadites under contribution, and destroyed Amathus, without the least opposition from Theodorus. He made war upon Obed, the king of Arabia, but falling into ambush near Gadara, in Galilee, he was forced, by a press of camels, into the mouth of a narrow craggy passage, from whence, with infinite difficulty, he made his escape to clear himself, and got safe to Jerusalem. This disaster was followed by a six years rebellion, during which were slain no less than fifty thousand Jews. The king, wearied with intestine broils, sought for a reconciliation with his people, and, to that end, asked them, upon a public occasion, what conduct they could wish him to pursue to give them satisfaction. They replied, with one voice, "That he should cut his own throat;" and thereupon entered into a league of mutual defence with Demetrius Eucærus, king of Damascus.

Demetrius Eucærus overcomes Alexander, and afterwards retires from the country. Additional instances of the cruelty of Alexander. Demetrius is carried prisoner to Parthia, where he dies.

DEMETRIUS, in consequence of this application, marched with a considerable army into Judæa, where, being joined by that of the Jews, he encamped near Shechem; the whole number of his forces amounting to 3000 horse, and 40,000 foot. Alexander marched against this formidable army with six thousand foreign mercenaries, and about twenty thousand Jews, who still maintained their allegiance.

While the two armies were encamped within sight of each other, they both had recourse to the same kind of stratagem, to take advantage, and increase their strength. Demetrius endeavoured to induce Alexander's mercenaries to desert and join him; and Alexander was equally solicitous to gain over the Jews in the army of Demetrius; but neither party was able to prevail. At length a desperate battle took place, which was supported with great courage and resolution for some time, till victory declared in favour of Demetrius. All the foreign troops of Alexander were lost to a man, and died valiantly sword in hand. Demetrius also sustained great loss. The greatest part of Alexander's forces were so miserably broken, that he was obliged to fly with them for shelter to the adjacent mountains; where, by a sudden compunction for his misfortunes, near six thousand Jews came up to him, and joined him. This circumstance proved very alarming to Demetrius, who apprehending that the rest of the Jews in his army might follow the example of those who had deserted, abandoned all thoughts of continuing the war, and, drawing off his forces, retired into Syria.

At length, however, he came to a decisive battle with them, cut off the greater part, and obliged the rest to fly for protection to a place called Bethama, which was fortified by nature and art. Alexander laid close siege to them, and forcing the town, carried the people prisoners to Jerusalem, where he exercised the most execrable barbarities that can be imagined. As he was feasting with his concubines, part of his entertainment was to treat the company with the spectacle of eight hundred Jews hanging at the same time, together with their wives and children; and, to increase the horror of the dreadful scene, he ordered the throats of some to be cut in sight of the rest.

Rebellion in subjects is undoubtedly highly criminal, and greatly aggravated by their joining foreign powers against their lawful prince, which was certainly the case with respect to the subjects of Alexander, inasmuch, that he was reduced to the necessity of surrendering to the king of Arabia what he had taken from the Moabites and Galaadites, as a composition not to assist his revolted subjects against him; but yet all these considerations are not sufficient to justify the exercise of inhuman cruelties. Demetrius was taken prisoner, and sent as a present to Mithridates, a Parthian prince, who treated him with great honour and respect; but he was soon taken off by a malignant distemper. Philip afterwards repaired to Antioch, and entered upon the government of the whole kingdom of Syria.

C H A P. XXIII.

Antiochus Dionysius, and after him Aretas, make expeditions into Judæa. Alexander makes several conquests; deposes Demetrius, returns to Jerusalem, and there dies, having given his last counsel to his queen Alexandra.

Antiochus Dionysius proclaimed king of Damascus.

Philip disinclined, pointed in his expectation of supplanting Antiochus.

DURING the late transactions Antiochus, otherwise called Dionysius, having an eye upon Damascus, got possession of the place, and caused himself to be proclaimed king there. The tidings of this adventure brought his brother Philip in all haste to Damascus, where, by tampering with Milesius, the governor of the fort, he was quietly received into the town. But, to disguise the matter, he gave the officer no reward, lest he should be thought to come in rather by treachery, than the influence of authority. Milesius, however, retaliated upon him; for Philip being abroad, taking exercise at the circus, he shut the gates upon him, reserved the city for Antiochus, who, upon the first intelligence, posted from Arabia, and, with an army of 8000 foot, and 800 horse, marched directly into Judæa.

A bloody battle between Antiochus and Alexander.

Antiochus is slain and his army routed.

Alexander, upon this incursion, drew a large and deep ditch from Caparsaba, now called Antipatris, up to the very sea of Joppa, which was the only accessible way to the town. He erected a wall also, with several wooden towers at intervals, which he carried on for an hundred and fifty furlongs in length, and there waited for Antiochus, upon whose arrival a most desperate battle ensued. Antiochus, at first, had so much the advantage, that he thought himself secure of victory; but observing one of the wings of his troops in danger of being overpowered, he eagerly pressed to its relief, and fell in the attempt, at which his troops were so dispirited, that they threw down their arms, and fled to Cana, where the greater part of them perished by famine.

Aretas makes an expedition into Judæa.

Aretas came next to the government of Cœlo-Syria, upon the choice of the people of Damascus, from a spirit of opposition to Ptolemy, the son of Menneæus. He entered Judæa with an army, overthrew Alexander near Addida, and then, upon terms of accommodation being settled between them, returned to Damascus. Alexander then went in pursuit of new conquests, took Dion by assault, and thence marched to Esfa, where Zeno's treasure lay, which was of inestimable value. He first raised three walls about it, and then took it by storm, as he did afterwards Gaulana and Seleucia, the vale of Antiochus, and the fortrefs of Gamala. Many misdemeanours being alledged to the charge of Demetrius, who had formerly the government of these places, he divested him of his authority; and, after a successful expedition of three years continuance, returned to Jerusalem.

Extensive dominions of the Jews.

By virtue of such numerous conquests, the territories of the Jews were greatly extended at this time. They were in possession of Syria, Idumæa, and Phœnicia; the Tower of Straton upon the sea, Apollonia, Joppa, Jamnia, Azotus, Gaza, Anthedon, Raphia, Rhinocura; and, in the midland of Adora and Marissa, all Samaria, and the mountains of Carmel and Itabyr: also Scythopolis, Gadara, Gaulanitis, Seleucia, and Gabala. In the land of the Moabites they held Esfebon, Medaba, Lemba, Oron, Telithon, Zara, Cilicia, Aulon, and Pella. This last they demolished for refusing to conform to their laws and customs.

After this Alexander became violently addicted to intemperance, and having, on a certain occasion, drank to great excess, he fell sick, and was afterwards seized with a quartanague, which was so powerful as to baffle the skill of his ablest physicians. He was afflicted with this distemper for three years, during which time he not only continued his attention to the affairs of government, but likewise prosecuted several military undertakings, till at length, being quite exhausted, he was forced to submit, and expired upon the frontiers of the country of the Geralsens, at the siege of the castle of Ragaba, on the further side of the river Jordan.

Alexander falls into a severe distemper.

When his queen Alexandra, who attended him to this place on account of his indisposition, found he was near his end, she was greatly perplexed in her mind, from the precarious state in which she and her children must inevitably be left on his decease. In the height of her melancholy reflections she broke out into the following exclamation: "My beloved partner, what will be the fate of your wife and children, if deprived of your protection, and exposed to the mercy of your inveterate foes?" In answer to this, he gave his wife the following advice, which were the last words he was heard to utter.

"I particularly request (said he) that you strictly follow the directions I am now about to give you. As the only effectual means to secure a peaceable succession to yourself and children, keep my decease a profound secret from the army till the castle shall be subdued: then repair in triumph to Jerusalem with the news of victory; and let your principal care be to ingratiate yourself into the esteem of the Pharisees; for your future welfare will depend principally on the interest you form with that sect, to whose opinions those of the multitude are entirely subservient. The popular clamour against me has been raised by opposition to them. On your arrival at Jerusalem, send for the principal men among the Pharisees, expose my dead body before them, and say, that, from a veneration for their piety and justice, you resign the body, either to be allowed the ceremony of interment, or to be treated with contempt and indignity, as their discretion shall dictate; and, at the same time, assure them that, in this, and all other matters of a public nature, you will observe an implicit obedience to their authority. Follow this counsel, and there is no doubt but my remains will be favourably interred, and yourself and offspring be established in the dignities of the royal station."

Alexander's prudent counsel to his queen.

Thus closed his counsel, and life in the 49th year of his age, and 27th of his reign.

C H A P. XXIV.

Alexandra, queen regent, obtains the favour and interest of the Pharisees, holds the government nine years, and dies, after having passed through many perplexing scenes, in her advanced state.

AS soon as the fortrefs of Ragaba had surrendered, Alexandra, pursuant to the dying counsel of her husband, applied herself to the Pharisees, and submitted the disposal both of the body and the government to their absolute pleasure and direction. This alluring method of proceeding conciliated the esteem of those who had been her most inveterate enemies; inasmuch, that the most eminent amongst them harangued the multitude in the glorious exploits of their deceased sovereign Alexander, and the the irreparable loss of so excellent a prince, and, by such eulogiums, raised their passions to so great a degree, that they declared him more worthy the honour of a funeral solemnity than any of his predecessors.

Hyrkanus is advanced to the pontificate.

Alexander, at his death, left behind him two sons, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus; but committed the regency to his queen Alexandra. Hyrcanus, the elder brother, was of an indolent disposition, and consequently disqualified for the cares and intrigues of the state. Aristobulus, the younger, on the contrary, was active and resolute; and the mother had acquired great popularity by the disapprobation she now discovered for the exceptionable parts of her husband's administration during his life. Through her prevailing interest, Hyrcanus was promoted to the dignified office of high-priest; not from seniority or abilities, but rather through a persuasion that his disposition would never prompt him to aspire to the crown.

The queen shows implicit deference to the Pharisees.

But notwithstanding these instances of sagacity, she was little more than a tool in the hands of the Pharisees; for although she had the name of sovereign, she submitted the conduct of all public affairs to their discretion, and gave it in charge to the common people to pay them all obedience. She also enjoined the revival of the Pharisaical ordinances and traditions, which her father-in-law Hyrcanus had obtained, and gave the sanction of her name and authority to the acts and deeds of the leaders of her favourite sect. Hence they recalled exiles, set prisoners at liberty, and, in divers instances, assumed even royal prerogative. In some cases, indeed, she asserted authority, and particularly in augmenting her forces to such a degree, and retaining in pay a band of mercenaries, to keep the adjacent countries in awe, as appeared from the security they gave her in hostages for their good behaviour. Her reign would have been peaceable, but for the vexatious importunities of the Pharisees, who were incessantly suggesting to her arbitrary and unpopular measures. They pressed her for justice upon all those at whose instigation and advice the eight hundred rebels had been put to death in Jerusalem. At their instance Diogenes was cut off, as well as many others who were so unfortunate as to incur their displeasure. At length the leading men among them, who had been the late king's friends and adherents, went in a body to the queen, with Aristobulus, her younger son, at the head of them, to remonstrate against such proceedings. Having obtained an audience, they laid before her their grievances in the most affecting manner; while Aristobulus manifested, by his countenance, the abhorrence he entertained for the public measures. They represented to her that, in the utmost extremity of danger, they had preserved an uniform loyalty to their late sovereign, who had generously rewarded their services, and therefore earnestly begged that, since they had escaped the perils of war, they might not be sacrificed to the malevolence and treachery of their domestic enemies. They told her that, if their persecutors would proceed no farther in their sanguinary purpose, they would, from a respect to their superiors, suppress future complaints on what had been already perpetrated. They observed that, to countenance the declared enemies of her deceased consort, at the expence of his approved friends, would be a severe reproach upon her honour; and Aretas, the Arabian king, and several other hostile princes, would enjoy a peculiar pleasure in hearing that she had drawn from her court those men who had once been so powerful that their very names had struck a terror into their enemies. They concluded with saying, that, if she was determined to yield every consideration to the ambition of the Pharisees, and that no regard was to be paid to their past services, they had only one request to make, and that was, that they might be permitted to return into the different fortresses of the kingdom, where they would terminate a miserable existence, honourably sharing the common calamities which seemed to await the friends of the deceased king.

These expostulations greatly distressed the queen, who, for some time, knew not how to act, being fearful, if she should give countenance to the petitioners, she might incur the displeasure of the Pharisees, of whom they continually stood in dread. At length she resolved on complying with their last request, and therefore consented to their returning to the several garrisons and places of strength throughout the kingdom; but with this restriction, that they should not enter Hyrcania, Alexandria, or Macheras; because in those places she had deposited her jewels, and other valuable treasures. Soon after this she sent her son Aristobulus, with an army, towards Damascus, to chastise Ptolemy, surnamed Mennæus, who had greatly annoyed the adjacent provinces; but he shortly returned from that expedition without doing any thing of moment.

Aristobulus makes an unsuccessful expedition against Ptolemy.

While affairs were in this situation, intelligence was received that Tigranes, king of Armenia, had advanced with an army of 50,000 men into Syria, with a design to penetrate into Judæa. Alexandra was so alarmed at this intelligence, that she dispatched ambassadors to Tigranes, with considerable presents, hoping thereby to procure his friendship, and avert the impending danger that threatened her dominions. Tigranes was at that time before Ptolemais; and the ambassadors acquitted themselves so well before him on the behalf of Alexandra, and the whole nation of the Jews, that, with every instance of acknowledgment for the honour of the embassy, he gave them assurances of all good offices in return. Upon the reduction of Ptolemais, intelligence was brought him of the rout of Mithridates, by Lucullus, the Roman general; of his escape from the pursuit into Iberia; and that Lucullus, when he found he could not overtake him, had entered Armenia, which he was ravaging; so that Tigranes was under a necessity of immediately drawing off his forces, and marching with all expedition to the defence of his own dominions.

Expedition of Tigranes against the Syrians and Jews.

Application of the ambassadors of Alexandra courteously received.

Tigranes, with his army, returns home.

They exercise cruelty on the people.

Aristobulus with many leading men address the queen upon the occasion.

The queen, some time after this, being seized with a dangerous fit of sickness, gave Aristobulus a fair opportunity of attempting what he had long designed, the supplanting his brother Hyrcanus, both in the priesthood and sovereignty. Having communicated his design to his wife (whom, with his children, he left in Jerusalem) he one night privately left the city, and visited all the castles and forts in which his father's friends had been placed in garrisons. Aristobulus had been long disgusted at the conduct of his mother; but when he came to reflect on the precarious state of her health, the danger, as well as disgrace, to which the family would be exposed, from the overgrown power of the Pharisees, in case of her death, and that Hyrcanus, next in succession, was a mere pliant tool to execute their pleasure, indeed, wholly disqualified for any public charge, he was much more alarmed than ever. The first place he came to was Agada, where he was courteously received by Galestes, a man of rank and eminence in those parts.

Aristobulus forms a design of obtaining the government.

The day after Aristobulus left Jerusalem, his absence was known to Alexandra, who, however, did not entertain a suspicion of his intentions, till she was informed, by messengers, that several fortresses had submitted to him, as, when one place had accepted his proposals, the example was readily followed by the rest.

His attempt promises success.

Intelligence of these proceedings threw the queen and her adherents into the greatest consternation; for they knew Aristobulus, from his great abilities, and aspiring disposition, to be well qualified to succeed in the enterprize he had undertaken. They were further alarmed by the dismal apprehension of being called to a severe account for the outrageous barbarities they had exercised upon several of his particular friends. In this state of perplexity they thought the best expedient would be to confine the wife and children of Aristobulus, under a strong guard, in the citadel next the temple. While this was in agitation, Aristobulus became exceedingly powerful; and the people flocked to him in such numbers, that the place of his residence resembled a court, both in tumult and pomp; for, in the space of only fifteen days, he had made himself master of twenty-two castles. Having thus secured to himself these these respective fortifications, he soon raised troops from Mount Libanus, Trachonites, and places adjacent, which were readily inclined to support his party, from the expectation of the advantages they should derive, by assisting in the establishment of a new king, who, they had reason to expect, would remove that tyranny and cruelty which had been exercised in the late reign.

At this critical juncture Hyrcanus, and his principal adherents, repaired to the queen, requesting that she would give them directions what further measures she would wish them to pursue. They informed her of the great power of Aristobulus, by virtue of the places that had already submitted, and were daily submitting to him; and assured her, that, though their situation was desperate, and ruin likely to ensue, yet they would not by any means act without her concurrence. The queen replied, "That the state of her mind and body rendered her wholly incapable of the cares of government, which she therefore wholly resigned to their conduct and "management; adding, that there was no deficiency either of men or money, in which consisted the strength of the nation." Having said this, Alexandra gave up the ghost, in the seventy-third year of her age, and ninth of her reign.

Death and character of Alexandra.

This princess may be said to have aspired beyond the generality of her sex, in an ambition to attain to sovereign power, which, in some instances, she exercised to the reproach of the male monarchs of the earth. She ever adverted to the present state of things, without wandering into the perplexing uncertainty of future events. She observed some degree of moderation, even in the stretch of her power. Her grand foible was an attachment to a peculiar sect, and a consequent connivance at actions unjustifiable in principles, either of religion, or even common humanity. By these she entailed the subsequent calamities that befel her family; though, it must be acknowledged, that her administration was such, during her life, as to preserve the internal peace of the nation.

CHAP. I.

An engagement between Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, wherein the former being defeated, they come to an agreement, that Aristobulus should govern, and Hyrcanus enjoy the honours suitable to his dignity in peaceable retirement.

IN the third year of the hundred and seventy-seventh olympiad, when Quintus Hortensius and Quintus Metellus Creticus were consuls at Rome, Hyrcanus entered upon the office of high-priest, and Aristobulus immediately made war upon him. The necessary preparations were made on both sides; but when they came to action, on the plain of Jericho, the greater part of Hyrcanus's soldiers deserted, and went over to his brother. Hyrcanus himself fled for refuge into the citadel in which the wife and children of Aristobulus were imprisoned, by order and direction of his mother, the late queen; while the rest of the party took sanctuary, for a time, within the verge of the temple; though they soon after surrendered themselves.

Matters being come to this pass, the two brothers entered into a treaty of accommodation, and, in conclusion, came to this agreement, that Aristobulus should be established in the possession of the government, and Hyrcanus allowed to live at ease and liberty upon his own fortune, with the privileges and dignities due to his rank, without molestation. This contract was signed and ratified with the due formalities of joining hands, and interchanging promises, reciprocally for performance of covenants, in the presence of the people; after which Aristobulus retired to the palace, and Hyrcanus to the private apartments, which had been before occupied by his brother.

CHAP. II.

Antipater stirs up a faction against Aristobulus in favour of Hyrcanus, and prevails with Aretas to join in attempting his restoration.

AMONGST the adherents of Hyrcanus was a certain Idumæan, ■ man opulent, powerful, and resolute, and ■ professed enemy to Aristobulus, whose name was Antipater. Nicolaus, of Damascus, affirms, that he was of the first stock of the Jews: that came out of Babylon into Judæa, probably to gratify his son Herod, who, by divers revolutions of fortune, was afterwards advanced to the throne. This Antipater was first called by his father's name, Antipas, who, as it is related, was preferred, through favour of king Alexander and his wife, to the government of Idumæa, where, by means of fair words and sumptuous presents, he formed ■ considerable interest with the Arabians, Gazæans, and the people of Askalon. Antipater, no doubt, stood in awe of Aristobulus, from a consciousness of his power to do him injury, and the animosity that subsisted between them. As the most plausible means of lessening the reputation and popularity of Aristobulus, he had recourse to the insidious arts of calumny and detraction, in order to excite the fears and jealousies of the people. He insinuated to them, that it was unreasonable for the younger brother to supplant the elder, deprive him of his birth-right, and usurp the government himself; pointing out, at the same time, that it was unworthy of them tamely to bear such invasion of the hereditary right. He also told Hyrcanus, that so long as he continued in Judæa, his life would be in danger, as Aristobulus could never deem himself secure in the possession of the crown while he was in existence. Hyrcanus, being of an open, unsuspicious temper, the suggestion of Antipater had not the effect upon him which he desired; though, as he nevertheless seemed inclined to listen to his counsel, the other took care to ply him with importunities to use caution with respect to the designs of his brother. At length, however, he prevailed with him to apply for protection to Aretas, king of Arabia, with offers of his own best services, by way of mediation with that prince, in his behalf. Hyrcanus acceding to the proposal, Antipater immediately repaired to Aretas to prepare him for his reception; and having exacted from him a promise, upon oath, that he would not deliver him up into the hands of his enemies, Antipater returned, and informed Hyrcanus of the result of the interview.

Antipater applies ■ Aretas in behalf of Hyrcanus.

Attends Hyrcanus to the court of Arabia.

Aretas, upon conditions, promises him assistance.

Having prepared Hyrcanus to petition, and Aretas to comply with his request, Antipater conducted the former out of the city by night, and accompanied him to Petra, where the royal palace of Arabia is situated. Upon their arrival, he used the most plausible arguments with the king in favour of Hyrcanus, to induce him to assist him in the recovery of his paternal right. In fine, he urged him so closely, both with solicitations and presents, that Aretas promised to comply with his request, on condition, that if ever Hyrcanus should be restored to his kingdom through his means, he should cede to him the country, and the twelve cities, which his father Alexander had taken from the Arabians, viz. Medada, Naballo, Livias, Tharabata, Agalla, Athone, Zoara, Orone, Marissa, Rydda, Lula, and Oryba.

CHAP. III.

Aretas makes an expedition against Aristobulus, drives him to Jerusalem, and besieges him in the temple. Onias, a righteous man, stoned to death. The Divine vengeance follows the wickedness of the people.

Aretas overcomes Aristobulus, and assaults him in the temple.

ARETAS, in consequence of these promises, advanced against Aristobulus with an army of fifty thousand men, fought and overcame him; in so much, that finding himself abandoned by his soldiers going over to Hyrcanus, he was forced to fly for refuge to Jerusalem, where Aretas, with his whole army, assaulted him in the very temple. The people unanimously declared for Hyrcanus, the priests only excepted; while Aretas, with the united force of the Arabians and Jews, prosecuted the siege with the utmost vigour.

The feast of unleavened bread, which we call the passover, coming on at this time, the chief men among the Jews withdrew themselves out of the country, and went into Egypt. At the same time one Onias, a man of singular piety and integrity, apprehending the approach of a civil war, had privately withdrawn to a place of concealment. The Jews reflecting on the great reputation he had acquired through the sanctity of his life, and that, by his prayers, he had been thought to have obtained rain from heaven in an extremity of drought; and inferring, from thence, that his curses might be as prevalent as his prayers, brought him out into the camp, and there made it their request that he would denounce a malediction upon Aristobulus and his whole party. He opposed their request as long as he could; but at length, finding no rest from their importunities, and that they were resolved to maltreat him unless he complied, he lifted up his hands to heaven, and offered a prayer to this purport: "Almighty Ruler of the universe, since both we that stand before thee are thy people, and they that are besieged in the temple are thy priests, I humbly beseech thee not to hear the prayers of either of them against the other." Upon these words, those who had brought him to the place were so enraged, that they immediately fell upon him, and stoned him to death. But the Divine vengeance pursued the perpetrators of this horrid barbarity.

Onias put to death for his piety and philanthropy.

While Aristobulus and the priests were thus beset in the temple, the paschal festival came on, at which season, according to custom, the Jews offered up a great number of sacrifices. But the besieged not having so many as they had occasion for, requested that their countrymen would furnish them at their own price; and on their demand gone thousand drachmas for each beast, and the money to be deposited, the demand was agreed to, and the money accordingly let down to them, by means concerted, over the walls.

When the besiegers received the money, they refused to deliver the victims; and such was their flagitious impiety, that they not only violated their faith with men, but prevented their brethren from performing a service dedicated to the honour of their God. The priests, therefore, finding themselves perfidiously imposed upon, under pretence of contract, imprecated vengeance on their abandoned countrymen. Nor was the judgment delayed; for there fell immediately a violent tempest; that destroyed all the fruits of the earth throughout the whole province, so that one measure of wheat sold for fifteen drachmas.

Perjury of the besiegers.

They are overtaken by Divine justice.

CHAP. IV.

Scaurus is sent by Pompey into Syria. Comes into Judæa, and causes the siege of Jerusalem to be raised.

AT this time a war subsisted between Pompey the Great, and Tigranes, king of Armenia; so that the former commanded Scaurus, one of his generals, to lead the army under his command into Syria. Scaurus accordingly obeyed; but, on his arrival at Damascus, finding the city had been reduced by Metellus and Lollius, he drew off his forces, and led them into Judæa. On his way he was met by two ambassadors; one from Hyrcanus, and the other from Aristobulus. They both came upon the same errand; to desire an alliance offensive and defensive with the Romans.

Scaurus, the Roman general, comes into Judæa.

Receives an embassy from Hyrcanus and Aristobulus.

Esposes the interest of Aristobulus.

Aristobulus offered four hundred talents, and Hyrcanus no less. Though they were equal in point of proposal, the Roman general gave the preference to Aristobulus, as he was opulent and magnanimous, and would require nothing more than what was reasonable; whereas the other was penurious and pusillanimous, and might expect more than was adequate to the conditions; being very sensible that it was a much more arduous undertaking to carry a city so strongly fortified by assault, than to eject a band of Nabathean fugitives out of the country. Closing, therefore, with Aristobulus, Scaurus dispatched messengers to Aretas, commanding him, in the name of Pompey the Great, and the Roman senate, immediately to draw off his troops, and raise the siege; upon peril of a declaration of war. Scaurus then returned to Damascus; and Aristobulus advanced with a powerful army against Hyrcanus and Aretas, and engaging them at a place named Papyron, gave them a total overthrow, and put about seven thousand to the sword; among whom was Cephalio, the brother of Antipater.

The siege of Jerusalem raised.

Hyrcanus and Aretas defeated by Aristobulus.

CHAP. V.

The cause of the contending brothers, Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, is brought before Pompey. The trial is adjourned, and Aristobulus, in disgust, withdraws to Judæa.

A SHORT time after this, Pompey himself went into Syria, and took up his residence at Damascus, where he received embassies from the princes of several nations, soliciting his friendship and protection. Aristobulus, above all the rest, sent him a most valuable present, which was a golden vine of the value of five hundred talents. Strabo, of Cappadocia, thus describes it: "There was a present made to Pompey, out of Egypt; a crown that weighed four hundred pieces of gold; and another out of Judæa, of a golden vine; or garden, to which they gave a name, which, in the Greek language, signifies delight. These presents were brought by ambassadors; and I myself saw the vine at Rome, in the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus, with this inscription, Alexander, king of the Jews. It was valued at five hundred talents, and passed for the present of Aristobulus, the prince of the Jews."

Pompey greatly interested in the arrival in Syria.

Testimony of Strabo.

There

There came to Pompey, soon after this, other ambassadors; Antipater, on the part of Hyrcanus, and Nicodemus, on the part of Aristobulus, who charged Gabinius and Scaurus, with taking sums of money (the former three hundred talents, and the other four) as bribes.

Pompey attends to the cause depending between the brothers.

The sense of the people on the same.

Plea of Hyrcanus.

Defense of Aristobulus.

Pompey renders the matter to a future decision.

Pompey took the cognizance of the cause into his own hands, and appointed the parties concerned to attend him. As the spring advanced, he drew out of his winter quarters, and marched to Damascus, destroying the fort of Apamia (a fortification of Antiochus Cyzicenus) by the way, having, at the same time, a design upon the territories of Ptolemy Mannaus, an infamous character, amounting, in enormity, to that of his relative Dionysius Tripolitanus, who fell a victim to the offended laws of his country. He also razed the fort of Lysias, of which Silas, the Jew, had got possession; and passing from thence towards Heliopolis and Chalcis, went into Cœlo-Syria, and then to Damascus, to decide the point in dispute between Hyrcanus and Aristobulus. Being determined first to hear the sense of the people, it was argued in their favour, "That it had been formerly the usage of their nation to be governed, not by kings, but the high-priest of the God whom they worshipped, who, without assuming any other title, administered justice according to the laws handed down to them from their forefathers. They did not deny but that the two contending brothers were of the sacerdotal race, but charged them with a design of enslaving the people, and subverting the fundamentals of the constitution."

Hyrcanus pleaded, "That though he was the elder brother, Aristobulus had usurped his rank and estate, contrary to justice, robbed him of his birth-right, and reduced him to a dependence on his own bounty. That, as a man fraught with mischief, he practised piracy at sea, and rapine and depredation on land, upon his neighbours; and that it was the violence of his disposition which had enraged the people against him." Having said this, he called upon a number of the principal Jews, whom Antipater had engaged in his interest, to confirm it.

Hyrcanus, and his party, having withdrawn, Aristobulus contended, "That Hyrcanus was not superceded in the government through any ambition, on his part, but through his own incapacity to govern, and that his natural sloth and inactivity had brought upon him the contempt of the people. He declared, that, with respect to himself, he had no other choice than either to assume the government, or suffer it to be transferred into another family; and that as to the title of king, he held it only as he received it from his father Alexander." As a testimony of the truth of what he had said, he called several young men of eminence among the Jews, who, by the gaudiness of their appearance, and the levity of their carriage, did no great credit to the cause which they endeavoured to espouse.

After Pompey had heard both parties, he seemed to be of opinion that Aristobulus had been too hasty in his proceedings; but dismissed them, for the present, with fair words, and referred the full determination of the matter until he came to Jerusalem, which he declared he would not fail to do, soon as he had finished the war with the Nabatheans. He enjoined them, in the mean time, to behave themselves peaceably; but Aristobulus, perceiving that his inclinations were directed in favour of his brother Hyrcanus, abruptly left Pompey, and returned to Judæa, where he took every means he could devise to prepare himself against those consequences which, from his proceedings, he might reasonably expect would afterwards take place.

CHAPTER VI.

Pompey prosecutes revenge on Aristobulus.

THE abrupt and disrespectful departure of Aristobulus so highly offended Pompey, that he resolved to take the part of Hyrcanus, without paying any farther attention to their respective complaints. He accordingly marched in pursuit of him, with the Roman troops he had under his command, and a considerable body of Syrian auxiliaries. Having passed Pella and Scythopolis, he came at length to Coreæ, where he was informed, that Aristobulus had shut himself up in the castle of Alexandrion, a strong fortress, built by his father, on an high mountain, that stood at the entrance of the country of Judæa, towards the side of Samaria. Pompey immediately marched his army to the place, and having encamped before it, he sent a messenger to Aristobulus to come down to him. Aristobulus, considering this message as an insult, at first refused to comply; but the people expressing dissatisfaction at his conduct, and his friends representing the impossibility of withstanding so formidable an enemy as the Romans, he was at length prevailed on to leave the place, and accordingly went to Pompey, accompanied by several of his principal adherents.

Pompey marches against Aristobulus.

Pompey had been privately informed, that Aristobulus had commanded his governors to observe such orders only as were given under his own hand; and therefore, as soon as Aristobulus appeared, he insisted on his writing to the respective officers in the fortress, authorizing them immediately to surrender the place. Aristobulus judged it necessary to comply with this injunction; but was so exasperated at the imperious conduct of Pompey, that he immediately departed to Jerusalem, with full resolution of opposing him with all his strength.

Aristobulus submits to the requisition of Pompey.

CHAPTER VII.

Pompey and Aristobulus continue hostilities.

IN order to deprive Aristobulus of the opportunity of making preparations for war, as soon as Pompey knew of his departure, he immediately marched after him, and encamped at Jericho, from whence the next morning he proceeded towards Jerusalem. Aristobulus was astonished at the expedition, and alarmed at the appearance, of Pompey. He now repented of his conduct; and, to prevent fatal consequences, went to meet him, which he had no sooner done, than he offered him a considerable sum of money, with the command of the city; and whatever else he should request, provided he would but withdraw his forces. These terms were accepted by Pompey, who immediately dispatched Gabinius, one of his generals, with some troops, to the city, to receive the offered money. But when they came there, the persons who commanded in the town, in the name of Aristobulus, refused them admittance, telling them they would not stand to any such agreement.

Pompey advances to Jerusalem.

This was a kind of treatment the Roman general could not digest, and therefore, after ordering a strict guard to be kept on Aristobulus, he marched with his army to Jerusalem, and immediately proceeded to reconnoitre, in order to form a judgment which was the most likely part to make a successful assault.

CHAPTER VIII.

Factions at Jerusalem in the different interests of Pompey and Aristobulus. Jerusalem invested, and the temple taken by assault. Aristobulus carried a prisoner to Rome.

NO sooner did Pompey appear before Jerusalem, than an insurrection took place between the two parties respectively attached to Aristobulus and Hyrcanus. The adherents of the former were for attempting to rescue their king by force of arms, while the other party were equally strenuous for admitting Pompey into the city; and the majority of the people, conscious of the superior power of the Romans, were friends to the latter measure. The partizans of Aristobulus took possession of the temple, and cut away the bridge of communication between that and the city, being fully resolved to defend themselves to the last extremity. The other party party not only gave entrance to the army, but delivered up both city and palace into the hands of Pompey, who dispatched Piso, his lieutenant, with part of his army, to take charge of both. When things were come to this pass, Pompey, in the first place, made a proposal of peace; but finding the other party averse to any compromise, he made the necessary preparations for an assault, in which he received every possible assistance from Hyrcanus and his adherents.

Pompey avails himself of the superstitions of the Jews.

The north side of the temple being the weakest quarter, Pompey proposed to begin his attack there. It was encompassed with high towers, and surrounded by a very deep and broad ditch. There was no passing on the city side towards Pompey's station, now the bridge was down, for crags and precipices; but the Romans, with infinite labour and difficulty, made hard shift to fill up the ditch, with timbers, and other materials they had collected, and so to raise platforms and ramparts to such a prodigious height, that, with engines of battery, which they brought from Tyre, they cast great stones upon the temple wall: yet, had it not been for the advantage they took of our seven days sabbath, they would scarcely have been able to gain their point: for though, in case of assault, the law allows us to defend ourselves upon that day, and to repel force by force, we are not permitted to do any work upon it, even to thwart the design of an enemy. The Romans observing, therefore, that we made no opposition to the advancing of their bulwarks, and fixing their machines upon that festival, employed the sabbath only in preparing for the action of the next day, without attempting any violence upon us.

This may serve to shew the very great deference we pay to the religion and laws of our country, when even the dread of death itself cannot divest us from the stated forms and precise ceremonies of our devotion; for the priests have their solemn sacrifices twice a day, with all the prescribed modes of worship, without the least default, even in cases of the utmost extremity.

The temple taken by assault.

The temple was taken by assault upon a fast-day, the third month of the siege, in the 179th olympiad; Caius Antonius, and Marcus Tullius Cicero, being consuls. Such of the people who attempted to escape, or offered resistance, were instantly put to death. Several priests, who were employed in the duties of their office at the time, paid no regard to their personal safety, even when the swords of the enemy were pointed to their breasts, but yielded up their lives whilst exercising their sacred function. The Jews, attached to Pompey, felt no compassion for those who espoused the cause of Aristobulus, so that a most dreadful carnage took place. This circumstance is authenticated by all authors of eminence, who have related the exploits of Pompey; amongst whom are Strabo, Nicolaus of Damascus, and Titus Livius, the famous Roman historian. They plied their engines upon the great tower, till, by dint of repeated batteries, they shook it to pieces, and brought it down to the ground, carrying away a great part of the next wall along with it in the ruins. The breach was no sooner made, than the enemy pressed in crowds to enter it. The first that mounted was Cornelius Faustus, the son of Sylla, with his company; and next to him, upon the other quarter, the centurion Furius, with his men; and Fabius betwixt them both with another strong party. So great was the slaughter, that the place was covered with dead bodies; some killed by the Romans; others, by consent, dispatching one another; some casting themselves down headlong from the walls, and others setting fire to the houses over their heads, rather than be spectators of the barbarities that were committed. Twelve thousand of the Jews were slain, but of the Romans comparatively few. Absalom, the uncle, and father-in-law, of Aristobulus, was made prisoner.

Testimony of divers eminent historians.

Great carnage among the Jews.

These outrages were accompanied with several indignities to the very mysteries of our religion, by the admittance of prophane persons into the Holy of Holies, which was sacred to the high-priest alone. Pompey and his train were of the number that came in there, where they saw the candlesticks, lamps, tables for incense, and other articles used in the performance of Divine service. He likewise visited the treasuries, where he found two thousand talents of silver, besides vessels of gold, and other things of great value. He would not, however, suffer a single article to be touched, but left them entirely for the sacred uses to which they were appropriated. He likewise ordered the temple to be purified, and that the oblations, and other ceremonies of religion, should be performed according to our ancient customs and ordinances. He restored Hyrcanus to the office of high-priest; partly for the services he had received from him himself; and partly for his influence in preventing the Jews from espousing the interest of Aristobulus. All those among the Jews, whom he discovered to have been the promoters of the late insurrection, he condemned to the loss of their heads; but such as had signalized themselves in the prosecution of the siege, he liberally rewarded. He made Jerusalem itself tributary to the Romans, deprived the Jews of the cities they had gained in Coelo-Syria, and, by annexing them to the jurisdiction of the Romans, reduced the possessions of the Jews to their former limits. He caused Gadara, demolished a little before, to gratify Demetrius, his freed man, to be rebuilt; and restored Hippon, Scythopolis, Dion, Marissa, Azotus, Jamnia, and Arethula, being inland places, to their former inhabitants. The maritime towns of Gaza, Joppa, Dora, and Straton's Tower, were all set free, and annexed to the province of Syria. This Tower of Straton, when it was afterwards rebuilt by Herod, and beautified with stately ports and temples, was called Cæsarea.

Jews made tributary to the Romans.

From this feud between Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, we may date the ruin of Jerusalem, and the subjection of the Jewish nation to the Roman yoke; having been compelled to restore to the Syrians what they had taken in the course of a long war, as well as to submit to the imposition of above ten thousand talents, and the translation of the sovereign authority, which had ever till then descended in the priesthood, to private and obscure individuals. He appointed Scaurus, one of his generals, to the government of Judæa, Coelo-Syria, and all the country of Egypt to the borders of the Euphrates; giving him likewise the command of two legions, that he might be the better enabled to discharge the trust reposed in him. He then left Jerusalem, and set forward on his journey to Rome, taking with him Aristobulus, his two sons, Alexander and Antigonus, and two of his daughters, as captives, whom he purposed should be led before him, when he made his triumphal entry into his capital.

Scaurus enters into a league with Aretas, the Arabian prince.

SCAURUS made an expedition against Petra, the capital of Arabia, and set on fire all the places round about it, because of the great difficulty of access to it. As his army was pinched for want of provisions, Antipater, by order of Hyrcanus, furnished him with corn, and other necessities, out of Judæa. Being well known to Aretas, Scaurus sent him upon an embassy to him, in which he acquitted himself with such address, that he prevailed upon him, for a composition of three hundred talents, to save his country from ruin. Scaurus, upon this, renounced hostilities; and the parties formed a league of amity and friendship to their mutual satisfaction.

CHAP. X.

Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, makes an expedition into Judæa; but is overcome by Gabinius, a Roman general.

AT the expiration of about three years after Pompey's return to Rome, Alexander, one of the sons of Aristobulus, who had found means to effect his escape, went into Judæa, and having assembled sembled a considerable number of forces, possessed himself of several places in different parts of the country. In consequence of this, Gabinius was sent from Rome, with the commission of general, and upon an expedition against Alexander, wherein he performed many memorable exploits. Hyrcanus, the high-priest, was not now in condition to make resistance; though he had in contemplation to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem that Pompey had destroyed; but the Romans would not suffer him to put his design into execution. Alexander, ranging up and down the country, had collected a promiscuous body of Jews, and others, amounting to 10,000 foot, and 1500 horse. He stored and fortified the castle of Alexandrion, near Coreæ, and Machæras, on the borders of Arabia. In the interim, Gabinius dispatched one of his principal officers, with a body of chosen troops, who were joined by a considerable number of Jews, under the command of Petholais and Malichus, two brave and experienced generals, and soon after followed himself with the main body of his army.

Advances against Alexander.

As soon as Alexander found Gabinius was proceeding towards him, he thought it most prudent to make a retreat towards Jerusalem, which he accordingly did with all possible expedition. Gabinius, however, closely followed, and overtook him as he approached the city, so that a battle unavoidably ensued, in which 3000 of Alexander's troops were put to the sword, and the like number taken prisoners. Gabinius, after this, laid siege to the castle of Alexandrion, but with an offer and promise of pardon to the defendants, if they would surrender the place. The besieged kept a strong out-guard under the walls of the castle, a great number of which were cut off by the Romans, under Marcus Antonius, who signalized his valour upon the occasion. Gabinius, unwilling to lose time, left a part of his army behind to attend to the siege, went himself to take a view of the rest of the country, and gave orders for the rebuilding of what cities had been destroyed; as Samaria, Azotus, Scythopolis, Anthedon, Raphia, Dora, Marissa, Gaza, and divers other places. When this was done, these places became very convenient habitations, after having been long deserted.

Rebuilds divers towns and cities.

Gabinius, having thus arranged affairs in the country, returned to Alexandrion in prosecution of the siege, where Alexander took the opportunity of making submission by his ambassadors, upon condition of delivering up to him the castles of Hyrcania, Machæras, and Alexandrion, which Gabinius accepted of, but razed them all three to the ground. After this he had an application from the mother of Alexander, who was well affected towards the Romans, her husband, and the rest of her children, being then prisoners at Rome. Gabinius denied her nothing she asked; inasmuch, that Hyrcanus was brought to Jerusalem, and restored to his office of high-priest. There were constituted, at this time, five courts of judicature, and a division made of the whole province into five equal parts, viz. Jerusalem, Gadara, Amathus, Jericho, and Saphora, which is a city of Galilee. They came, by this means, to be delivered from the tyranny they complained of, and were again under an aristocratical form of government.

Exploits of Aristobulus in his escape into Judæa.

A SHORT time after this, Aristobulus (with his son Antigonus) escaped from Rome, and going into Judæa, was joined by a great number of Jews, some of whom were influenced to countenance him merely from a desire of changing their situation, and others from a principle of fidelity and affection. He made an attempt to repair the fortrefs of Alexandrion; but, on receiving information that Gabinius had dispatched an army in pursuit of him, he retreated to Machæras, where he dismissed the useless part of his followers, retaining only 8000 men, whom he thought capable of bearing arms, and had resolution enough to stand a contest. In a short time the Roman army arrived, and a general engagement took place, in which Aristobulus and his adherents fought with great bravery, but were at length compelled to yield to the superior power of the enemy, with the loss of 5000 men. Two thousand of the remainder gained a hill, and made some farther resistance; whilst Aristobulus, with the other thousand, cut a passage through the Roman army, and retired to Machæras. Aristobulus flattered himself that Gabinius would consent to a suspension of hostilities, whereby he might be enabled to reinforce his army, and put the place in a better posture of defence. But he soon found himself mistaken, for the Romans immediately proceeded to assault the place, which was defended with great bravery for two days, when a complete victory was gained over Aristobulus, who, with his son Antigonus, were put in chains, and sent prisoners to Rome. He had been three years and an half in the possession of the pontificate and the kingdom, and had acquitted himself with great honour in the respective charges. The senate sentenced the father to perpetual imprisonment; but the sons, through the mediation of Gabinius, were set at liberty, and permitted to return to their own country.

Gabinius had now entered upon an expedition against the Parthians, and passed over the river Euphrates; but afterwards changing his mind, he bent his course towards Egypt, for the restoring of Ptolemy. Antipater furnished him, for this enterprize, with corn, arms, and money, and brought over numbers of the Jews, about Pelusium, into an alliance with him.

At his return Gabinius found Syria in an uproar; for Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, having made himself master of the kingdom, harassed the country with a powerful army, and forced many of the Jews over to his party, killing all the Romans he could come at in his passage, and besieging the rest upon the mount of Gerizim, whither they had fled for sanctuary.

Gabinius, finding the Syrians in this disorder, sent Antipater, a man of approved prudence and integrity, to attempt to bring them to reason and due obedience. He executed his commission with such address, that he brought off several of the revolvers, but could not in the least degree prevail with Alexander; for having collected an army of 30,000 Jews, he was resolved to try a decisive battle with Gabinius. They came, in fine, to action at mount Itabyr, and the Jews lost 10,000 men in the encounter.

Affairs being thus settled in Jerusalem, the conqueror, by the advice of Antipater, marched against the Nabathæans, and gave them a total defeat, discharging two noble Parthians, Mithridates and Orfanes, who came to him for protection, giving out a report that they were fled into their own country. Gabinius, having now acquitted himself with the greatest honour in all his commissions, returned to Rome; and Crassus succeeded him in his command. The exploits of Pompey and Gabinius, against the Jews, may be seen in the histories of Nicolaus, of Damascus, and Strabo, of Cappadocia; and they concur in their testimony.

CRASSUS, having undertaken the preparation of a war against the Parthians, came to Judæa, and seized not only the two thousand talents that Pompey left untouched from a motive of conscience, but pillaged the temple of all the treasure he could find, to the amount of eight thousand talents more. He carried away with him also, a wedge of gold, of the the weight of three hundred mina, reckoning every mina, according to the Jewish computation, at two pounds and an half. Eleazar, the priest, who had the custody of the holy treasure, delivered it up to Crassus, not from a censurable motive, for he was a man of probity, but as a composition for all the rest. This wedge of gold was lodged in a wooden beam, that was made hollow for its reception; nor had any man knowledge of it but Eleazar himself, who finding Crassus very desirous of obtaining it, resigned it up to him, upon his most solemn oath, that he was abundantly satisfied, and that the hangings, of inestimable value, and other rich ornaments, belonging to the temple, in the possession of the high-priest, should remain untouched. But he perfidiously violated his oath, rifled the temple from the top to the bottom, and stripped it to the bare walls.

It will not be a matter of wonder that so prodigious a mass of wealth was lodged in this temple, when it is considered how long the Jews were in collecting it, and that it came from all quarters of the earth where the worship of the true God was known. Besides, it is a truth, attested and confirmed by the authority of several historians, and, amongst the rest, Strabo, the Cappadocian. He writes, that “Mithridates sent to the isle of Coos for some money of Cleopatra’s, that she had deposited there, and for eight hundred talents belonging to the Jews.” Now we have, in public treasure, nothing but what is sacred and dedicated to the service of God; and it is abundantly evident, that the Asiatic Jews transmitted this treasure from thence to Coos, upon the apprehension of a war with Mithridates. Nor can it be imagined that the Jews of Judæa, who had much stronger and safer place near hand, that is to say, the temple and city of Jerusalem, would ever have sent their money away for better security to Coos; neither can it be supposed that it came from the Alexandrian Jews, for they were too far distant to have any apprehension of Mithridates.

Strabo himself also bears witness to this in another place, where writes, “That Sylla, passing through Greece, to carry on a war against Mithridates, sent Lucullus to Cyrene, that was then distracted with feuds and factions among the Jews, a people who had spread themselves over the face of the whole earth.” He further relates, “That the Cyrenæans were ranged into four classes, viz. Burghers, Husbandmen, Strangers, and Jews: that the last division are so universally dispersed, that there is scarcely any habitable parts of the earth where they have not some kind of establishment: that Egypt, Cyrene, and several other countries, while they were under the jurisdiction of the same prince, embraced, in many places, the Jewish laws, rights, and customs, and trained up their children in a conformity to the Jewish discipline: that, in Egypt, they had whole colonies of them: besides, they had a right of property, by formal assignment, in a considerable part of the city of Alexandria, where they had magistrates, courts of judicature, and methods of deciding claims to property, peculiar to themselves; and all this as regular and binding as if established by sanction of government.” Let this suffice for the testimony of Strabo.

When Crassus had disposed of the affairs in Judæa, according to his pleasure, he marched into Parthia, where he and his whole army were cut off. But Cassius made his retreat into Syria, where he checked the progress of the Parthians, who were now grown insolent upon their success. He went afterwards to Tyre, and so to Judæa, where he took Taricheæ by assault, and made thirty thousand prisoners. Among the rest was Pitholaus, a partizan of Aristobulus, whom he caused to be put to death, at the instance of Antipater, a man of eminence with the Idumæans, through a marriage with an Arabian wife of illustrious descent. Her name was Cypron; and by her he had four sons, Phasaël, Herod, (who was afterwards king), Joseph, and Pheroras, and an only daughter, called Salome. This Antipater, through generosity and affability of disposition, had conciliated the esteem of all the princes and characters of rank about him, but more especially the king of Arabia, to whom he committed the protection of his children, during the war with Aristobulus. Cassius, having by this time reinforced his army, advanced to the river Euphrates, to meet the Parthians, who were preparing to oppose him.

CHAP. XIII.

Aristobulus, and his son Alexander, are taken off by Pompey’s party.

WHEN Cæsar had prevailed in a contest between him and Pompey, who, together with the whole senate, had abandoned the city of Rome, and fled beyond the Ionian Sea, he formed a design of setting Aristobulus at liberty, and dispatching him to Syria, with the command of two legions, to keep that province in order. But the satisfaction Aristobulus proposed to himself from the friendship and sanction of Cæsar, was soon frustrated; for before he could get out of Rome, some of Pompey’s factions found means of dispatching him by poison. His body lay embalmed for a considerable time, till at length it was removed by Anthony, who caused it to be carried into Judæa, and there honourably interred in the royal sepulchre.

The fate of Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, was no less deplorable than that of his father; for Pompey, having sentenced him to death, for seditious practices against the Romans, sent an order to Scipio to have him beheaded, which was accordingly executed in the city of Antioch. Ptolemy Mennæus, governor of Chalcis, near Libanus, dispatched his son Philippion to the widow of Aristobulus, at Askalon, to request that she would send with him her son Antigonus, and his sisters. Philippion became enamoured with one of them, whose name was Alexandra, and married her; but he was afterwards slain by Ptolemy, his father, who married Alexandra, and took the family under his protection.

CHAP. XIV.

Gallant exploits of Antipater.

AFTER the death of Pompey, and the victory which Cæsar had gained over him, Antipater acquired great authority in Judæa, through the many considerable services he rendered him at the instance of Hyrcanus, in his war upon Egypt. When Mithridates, of Pergamus, was bringing in his auxiliaries, and not able to continue his rout through Pelusium, but obliged to make a halt at Askalon, Antipater joined him with an armed body of 3000 Jews, and brought in several leading men of Arabia, and all Syria, to his assistance. Among these were Jamblicus, a prince of the country, and his son Ptolemy; and Tholomy, of Libanus, the son of Sohema, with the governors of the cities in general; among whom there prevailed an emulation of signalizing themselves in his service.

Mithridates, thus reinforced, advanced out of Syria into Pelusium, where the inhabitants refusing him entrance, he sat down before the place, and assaulted it. Antipater gallantly entered the breach, and was so well seconded in the action, that, by this means, the town was taken. But as he, together with Mithridates, was hastening to Cæsar, the Egyptian Jews, in the country of Onias, opposed their passage, till, through the power and interest of Antipater, as their countryman, and especially on the sight of a letter from Hyrcanus, the high-priest, they were brought over to fair terms with Cæsar, and upon that consideration, supplied them with whatever they had occasion for upon their march. This important service was effected through the mediation of Antipater, and the letter of the high-priest, which also induced the inhabitants of Memphis to espouse the same cause and interest.

CHAP

CHAP XV.

Antipater is highly honoured by Cæsar, who determines a cause depending between him and Hyrcanus on the one side, and Antigonus on the other, in favour of the former.

SOON after this, Mithridates and Antipater came to a pitched battle with the enemy, at a place called Delta, and upon a particular spot of ground, known by the name of the Jewish Camp; the former commanding the right wing, and the latter the left. It happened that Mithridates, being hardly pressed, his men gave way, and the disorder was very near being attended with a total rout; but Antipater, at the very crisis, came up along the bank of the river with a detachment to his relief, rescued his friends, and, in one word, vanquished an enemy exulting in the immediate view of victory. Having made himself master of their camp, he recalled Mithridates, who was left a great way behind, to take his part of the booty. In this action, about eight hundred of the party of Mithridates fell; but of that of Antipater, not more than fifty.

Mithridates, in his letter to Cæsar, reciting the particulars of this event, liberally awarded to Antipater the honour of the day, both in the preservation of the army, and the victory obtained at so singular a crisis. Cæsar, duly impressed both with his conduct and courage, employed him in the most honourable posts ever after, of which he bore a memorable testimony in the many wounds he received in his service.

At the expiration of this war, Cæsar went back, by sea, into Syria, where he treated both Hyrcanus and Antipater with singular tokens of respect. The one he confirmed in the pontificate; and the other he made a freeman of Rome, with all the privileges and immunities of the city. Some report that Hyrcanus was personally in this war, and actually came into Egypt. Strabo, of Cappadocia, bears witness to this, when he affirms, on the authority of Asinius, "That, upon the coming of Mithridates into Egypt, Hyrcanus, the high-priest of the Jews, came along with him." He writes in another place, upon the credit of Hysicrates, "That Mithridates came first thither alone, and then sent for Antipater, the governor of Judæa, to Ascalon, who brought him three thousand men; and that, upon his counsel and persuasion, divers of the princes and great men of the country, went over to him, and, amongst the rest, Hyrcanus, the high-priest."

About this time Antigonus, the second son of Aristobulus, came to Cæsar, and laid his complaints before him, relative to the murder of his father and brother, who, he said, were cruelly put to death by the contrivance of the partizans of the late Pompey. He uttered the bitterest invectives against Hyrcanus and Antipater, whom he represented as the cause of himself and brethren being cruelly driven from their native country; and at the same time charged them with having oppressed the public, for the sake of indulging their own private passions. He further said, that the assistance they had rendered him, proceeded rather from fear than respect, and was only meant to make some compensation for their former attachment to Pompey.

Antipater, one of the parties thus accused by Antigonus, was at this time with Cæsar; and, in order to destroy the intended effect of these reproaches, he exposed his wounds, as the best testimony he could give of his loyalty to Cæsar, which having done, he spoke as follows: "It is a matter of astonishment (said he) that this man, the son of a declared enemy to the state of Rome, and inheriting the rebellious principles of his father, should have the effrontery thus to accuse the most zealous of Cæsar's subjects, and to arrogate a merit to himself, when his conduct has rendered him deserving of death."

Cæsar, having heard both parties, instead of giving the least countenance to Antigonus, immediately conferred the pontificate upon Hyrcanus; gave Antipater his choice of any command he might prefer; and conferred upon him the dignified post of lieutenant-governor of Judæa.

CHAP. XVI.

Hyrcanus obtains permission, from Cæsar, to rebuild the walls of Jerusalem. Decree of the Roman senate, respecting an alliance with the Jews. Decree of the Athenians to the same import. Antipater addresses the people of Jerusalem.

THE walls of Jerusalem having been demolished by Pompey, Hyrcanus preferred a request to Cæsar, for permission to rebuild them, which was immediately granted; with the most respectful ceremony, letters being dispatched to the consuls at Rome, for entering the resolution in the records of the capitol. The copy of the decree ran as follows:

Decree of the senate assembled in the Temple of Concord, upon the ides of December; present Lucius Coponius, the son of Lucius, and Caius Papirius Quirinus.

"Whereas it appeareth unto the senate, upon the report of Valerius, the son of Lucius Prætor, that it is requested and proposed by Alexander, the son of Jason, Numenius, the son of Antiochus, and Alexander, the son of Dorotheus, ambassadors on behalf of the Jews, our good and faithful allies, that the ancient league of friendship may be renewed betwixt us; and that, in token of their good-will, they have brought a present of a golden cup and buckler, valued at fifty thousand crowns, desiring letters of recommendation to all governors and free towns, for a safe passage, both by sea and land, through all their ports and territories. Be it therefore ordered by this senate, that the same league of friendship be renewed and established, the requests of the ambassadors agreed to and granted, and their present accepted."

This decree passed in the ninth year of the pontificate of Hyrcanus, and in the month of Panemus.

Hyrcanus had great honour done him by the republic of Athens, in acknowledgment of their obligations to him, as appears from the following decree:

Decree of the Athenians, bearing date the twenty-fifth day of the month Panemus; Dionysius Asclepiades being president and high-priest; Agathocles, Archon, and Eucles, the son of Meander, scribe; on the eleventh of the Prytanea, in the month Munichion: a council of the Proedri being met in the theatre; and after gathering the suffrages of the people, by the high-priest, Dorotheus, and his assessors, Dionysius, the son of Dionysius, made publication as follows:

"Forasmuch as Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, high-priest and prince of the Jews, hath, upon all occasions, both public and private, as well in the generous reception of our ambassadors, as otherwise, given proof of a singular affection and esteem, both for our nation in general, and the citizens of Athens in particular, whereof we have received many instances; and forasmuch as we have received credible information from Theodotus, the son of Theodorus, of Sunium, of the virtue of the said excellent prince, and his friendly disposition to do us all good offices in his power; we have resolved to present him with the honorary acknowledgment of a crown of gold; to erect a brazen statue to him in the temple of the people and the graces to his memory; and to have it notified by proclamation, in all theatres and places of public exercises, and spectacles in honour of Bacchus, Minerva, Ceres, &c. that we have presented

"I feared him with this crown out of a veneration for his virtue. And we do further will and require all our governors and magistrates to be diligent and assiduous in the effectual improvement of these our concessions to the best advantage of our friends and associates, so long as this amity shall continue betwixt us; for the manifestation of our gratitude and justice toward all men of honour, and the encouraging of good offices toward us for the future. We do likewise order that a fit choice be forthwith made of ambassadors, from among the Athenians, to attend Hyrcanus in our name, with this our decree and presents."

When Cæsar had settled the affairs of Syria, he took his departure, together with Antipater, who, immediately on his return to Jerusalem, gave orders for the repairing the walls which Pompey had demolished, and then took a tour throughout the different parts of the province, to establish good order and tranquillity among the people. He told them that, "If they observed a due obedience to Hyrcanus, they should enjoy plenty and happiness; but if they sought to gratify their private interests at the expence of the public good, by seditious practices and innovations, he would himself prove a rigid governor; and they would find in the person of Hyrcanus, instead of a mild and gracious prince, a cruel and unrelenting tyrant; and concluded with assuring them, that the Cæsars, and senate of Rome themselves, would become their implacable enemies, if they refused obedience to those who were set over them."

BUT though Antipater, for political reasons, recommended great deference from the people to Hyrcanus, yet he was conscious of his incapacity to discharge the duties of his office, and was therefore determined to take every necessary precaution against any dangers that might arise in consequence thereof. To this end he appointed his eldest son, Phasaël, superintendant over Jerusalem, to the government of Galilee.

Herod, though but fifteen years of age, was of a pregnant genius, and enterprising spirit; nor was it long before he discovered himself to be capable of great undertakings. There happened, at this time, to be a gang of desperate robbers who infested Galilee, with the neighbouring parts of Cælo-Syria, committing the most horrid depredations wherever they went. The first instance of the prowess of Herod was upon this banditti, whom he pursued, engaged, and took, together with Ezechias, the commander in chief, and put him to death, as a terror to those who escaped, from the commission of the same crimes. This enterprize procured Herod a very distinguished share of reputation; and the people considered him as the man to whom they were indebted for the secure and happy enjoyment of their lives, liberties, and possessions. It likewise made him known to Sextus, kinsman to Cæsar the Great, who had the administration of Syria, and excited an emulation in his brother Phasaël, of endeavouring to obtain public favour by the uprightness of his conduct. He was, indeed, a man of public spirit, and so moderate in the exercise of his power, that he gained the general esteem of the people. The reputation of his conduct contributed not a little to increase that of Antipater, who experienced as high a degree of veneration as he could have done had he been actually the sovereign of the people: yet so far was he from being transported beyond the bounds of moderation by his great success, that he preserved, in the strictest manner, his fidelity to his friend Hyrcanus.

The wealth, power, and grandeur, of Antipater, the dignity of his family, and the veneration in which the people held him and his sons, created him many enemies among the leading men of the Jews, more especially when they found he was a favourite of the emperor, as well as with the people of Rome in general. They therefore endeavoured to traduce his character, and bring upon him the popular odium; to effect which, they insinuated that he had embezzled considerable sums of money, which he had received from Hyrcanus for the use of the Romans. But the principal thing which they alledged as the cause of their dissatisfaction, was the violent, daring, and ambitious temper of Herod; inasmuch, that, in the heat of their indignation, they went in a body to Hyrcanus, whom they haughtily addressed in words to this effect:

"Why will you be negligent, while every thing is going to destruction? Do you not perceive that Antipater and his sons divide the prerogatives and emoluments of the royal power, while you are prince only in title and name? Be cautious ere matters proceed too far; for, depend on it, your government and life are equally in danger. If you consider those youths as your deputies, you are mistaken; for, in fact, they are masters. Herod's treatment of Ezechias, and his companions, was a violation of public justice, it being murder to put a man to death without the ceremony of trial; however atrocious his crimes may have been: but Herod has exercised an arbitrary power, without the least pretence of authority for so doing, and therefore ought to be rendered amenable to justice for the iniquities he has committed."

These complaints, added to the clamour of many women in the temple, who called daily upon prince and people for justice upon Herod for the murder of their children, induced Hyrcanus to appoint a day of hearing and trying the cause betwixt Herod and his accusers before a court of judicature. Herod obeyed the sovereign mandate, and went to Jerusalem, not altogether as a private man, but according to his father's precaution, attended only by such a train as was deemed necessary for the security of his person.

Sextus Cæsar, having conceived a great esteem for Herod, immediately interposed in his behalf, by dispatching messengers to Hyrcanus, adding menaces to request that he would dismiss the complaint exhibited against him. Herod, on his arrival at Jerusalem, appeared before the court, at the head of whom sat Hyrcanus. His appearance and retinue so awed that venerable assembly, that they all continued mute some time, no person attempting to bring the least charge against him, till at length one Sameas, a man too just to be corrupted, and too innocent to fear, arose, and thus addressed the court:

"I never (said he) before saw a prisoner at the bar behave in so bold and daring a manner, and I believe your observation and experience will hardly furnish you with such another instance. It has been formerly customary for people, in such a situation, to appear, by their dress and behaviour, resigned to the legal enquiry that awaits them; but here is a culprit who seems to pride himself in his dress and attendants, which makes it appear as if public justice was more to be dreaded by the court than the criminal. Yet I censure not him for consulting his own safety rather than the respect due to the laws, so much as I do the king and the judges, who have permitted him to act in this manner. But remember that God is just and powerful; and the time is advancing when this man, whom you screen from the justice of the laws, will be a scourge to you all."

Speech of Sameas to the court.

After Sameas had finished this speech, Hyrcanus, finding how the judges stood affected to the cause, and apprehending, from the countenances of the people in general, that Herod was in danger, adjourned the court till the following day, and, in the mean time, advised him to save himself by a private retreat.

Herod, at the advice of Hyrcanus, with-draws, and goes to Sextus Cæsar.

retreat. Herod took the advice of Hyrcanus, and immediately repaired to his friend Sextus Cæsar, who was then at Damascus, where he declared a full resolution, that if ever they cited him again to that court, he would disclaim their jurisdiction. This contempt of court excited the resentment of the judges, who endeavoured, by all means, to incense Hyrcanus against him; but though the matter was sufficiently evident, he was so pusillanimous, that he had not courage to take the necessary means to prevent it.

Hyrcanus was greatly embarrassed at this representation; but, on receiving information that Sextus had appointed Herod to the command of his troops in Syria, his fears increased to such a degree, that he was continually apprehensive that Herod meant to depose him. Nor was his apprehension without foundation; for Herod, exasperated at the indignity of being treated as a criminal, proceeded with an army towards Jerusalem, and would certainly have carried his design into execution, had it not been for the interposition of his father and brother, who, by their arguments, dissuaded him from so imprudent a proceeding. They besought him by no means to think of offering violence to his prince, to whose favour and countenance he was indebted for the dignified station he enjoyed. They told him, "That his indignation, at being accused, should, in a great measure, be appeased by the friendly advice of the king: that if he prided himself on his power, he should consider that the measure he was about to pursue, was not only unjust, but unprofitable: that the Divine protection could not be expected by that man who revolted against his sovereign; and that the prince he meant to oppose, was his sincere friend and generous benefactor, and one who had, in no instance, wronged him, except when irritated by the injurious suggestions of his enemies." Herod was so wrought upon by these arguments, that he repressed his indignation, waved his design of proceeding to hostilities, and returned with his army to Galilee.

Herod is dissuaded from pursuing his resentment.

An embassy from Hyrcanus to Cæsar.

Cæsar, on his return to Rome, made preparations for an expedition into Africa against Scipio and Cato, and was saluted, on the way, by ambassadors from Hyrcanus, requesting that he would ratify a former league of friendship and mutual alliance. This suggests the propriety of introducing, in this place, a formal account of the honours that the Roman emperors have paid to our nation, and the leagues of alliance they have formed with it, that it may be evident to the world, in what esteem we have been held by the kings of Asia and Europe, as tokens of our courage and fidelity. Though many will not credit the histories of the Persians and Macedonians, because they are not generally authenticated, none can dispute the decrees of the Romans, as they are still extant in the capitol, and engraven upon pillars of brass. Besides this, Julius Cæsar made a pillar of brass for the Jews at Alexandria: but, as a demonstration, I shall now cite the decrees made by the senate, and by Julius Cæsar, in honour of Hyrcanus in particular, and our nation in general.

" Caius Julius Cæsar, emperor, Pontifex Maximus, and the second time dictator, to the magistracy, senate, and the people of Sidon, greeting:

" I send you the copy of a letter of ours to Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, the prince and high-priest of the Jews, to be engraven upon a brass table, the inscription in Latin and Greek, and to remain among your registers for after-times. The letter itself in substance as follows:"

" Caius Julius Cæsar, emperor, Pontifex Maximus, and the second time dictator, hath, with the advice and consent of the senate, appointed the publication of this decree:

" Forasmuch as Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, Jew, hath at all times, as well in war as in peace, approved himself to be our trusty good " friend and ally, as appeareth by several attestations of unquestionable credit, and particularly by the supply of fifteen hundred choice men, that he sent to Mithridates, to my assistance, in the late Alexandrian war: these services and good offices duly considered, I do hereby confirm and establish unto Hyrcanus and his heirs, the perpetual government of the Jews, both as their prince and high-priest, after the manner and method of their own laws; and, from this time forward, enroll them among my trusty and well beloved friends, and ratify an affinity with them as my associates. And it is my pleasure likewise, that all the legal pontifical rights and privileges be devolved upon him and his sons forever: and in case any controversy shall arise among the people concerning the Jewish discipline, himself and his family, in the course of succession, to be the only judges of it. It is moreover my will and pleasure, that the Jews be discharged the burden of winter-quarters, and of all public payments.

" It is ordered (Caius Cæsar being consul) that the government of the Jews shall descend from Hyrcanus to his heirs forever, with all the possessions, grants, and emoluments, belonging or annexed to the pontificate: the high-priest to have the judgment of all causes. And it is likewise appointed that ambassadors be forthwith sent to Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, the high-priest of the Jews, with instructions to treat about a friendly alliance with him: and that these particulars be fairly inscribed upon brazen tables in Latin and Greek, to be set up in the capitol at Tyre, Sidon, Ascalon, and in the temples, to the end that this our pleasure may be duly made known through all our dominions, and that none may pretend ignorance, and for the honour of our friends, and for a recommendation of their agents and ministers, to singular respect and esteem in all places where they shall come.

" Caius Cæsar, emperor, dictator, and consul, taking into his consideration the honour, friendship, and good services of Hyrcanus, doth hereby, for the benefit and advantage of the senate and people of Rome, grant unto Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, and to his sons after him, by an hereditary right of succession, the authority and office of princes and priests of Jerusalem, and of the whole nation of the Jews, to be by them exercised and enjoyed, in such manner as their ancestors enjoyed and exercised the said dignities before them.

" Caius Cæsar, the fifth time consul, hath ordained and appointed, that the city of Jerusalem shall be repaired and fortified; and that Hyrcanus, the prince and high-priest of the Jews, and the son of Alexander, shall have the administration of the government, with an abatement upon the duty, every second year, of a part of their taxes, an exemption from carriages, and other tributes.

" Caius Cæsar, emperor, hath likewise ordained that the inhabitants of Jerusalem shall pay a yearly tribute for itself, and all its dependencies, saving only the city of Joppa, with an exemption of all duty from the seventh year, which they call Sabbatical, or the Year of Rest, in which they neither sow, plant, or reap, either fruit or grain. And it is his pleasure also, that the Jews, in Sidon, pay tribute, of the fourth part of their fruits, every second year, for a duty, beside the tenths to Hyrcanus and his sons, as they have paid formerly to their predecessors. And farther, that no governors, military officers, or ambassadors, presume to raise any soldiers, or impose any charges, upon the lands of the Jews, whether for winter-quarters, or upon any other pretext whatsoever; but that they may hold all their purchases and acquisitions peaceably and quietly to themselves, without any lett or molestation whatsoever. It is also our farther will and pleasure, that the city of Joppa, which the Jews were possessed of at their first entrance into an alliance with the Romans, remain under the government of Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, and his family,

“with all the revenues and advantages arising from it, whether upon husbandry, port-duties, taxes, customs, anchorage, impositions upon goods, and exportations of corn for Sidon, once in two years, saving only the sabbatical year, wherein (as it is laid before) they neither plough, plant, sow, reap, or gather. As to the villages that Hyrcanus and his ancestors formerly enjoyed in the Great Plain, it is the will of the senate, that they continue to Hyrcanus and the Jews in manner as before, and that the same laws and customs be still preserved and exercised betwixt them and the priests, and all advantages made good that had been formerly granted to them by the senate and the people of Rome; the same privileges extending even to Lyddia itself. And whereas the Romans had formerly bestowed upon the kings of Syria and Cilicia, certain lands and estates, in respect of an alliance betwixt them, it is the pleasure of the senate, that they still continue in the possession of Hyrcanus, the prince of the Jews. And farther, that he himself, his son, and his ambassadors, shall have places assigned them among the senators, to see the gladiators, and other public-spectacles; and that upon any occasion of applying themselves to the senate, the dictator, or master of the horse, shall introduce them to their audience, and an answer to be returned them within ten days, if the senate shall come to any resolution upon the matter.”

Caius Julius, the fourth time emperor, the fifth time consul, and perpetual dictator, makes the following mention of Hyrcanus, the son of Alexander, the prince and the high-priest of the Jews.

“Whereas my predecessors, as well in the provinces as in the senate, have formerly borne witness to many honourable reports, on the behalf of the high-priest, Hyrcanus, and the generality of the Jews, who have thereupon received the thanks of the senate and people of Rome, in acknowledgment of their worth and goodness; we look upon these friendly offices and respects as obligations never to be forgotten, and upon ourselves as bound, in the name of the senate and people of Rome, to give Hyrcanus, his family, and countrymen, all possible demonstrations of the sense we have of their amity and esteem.”

“Caius Julius, dictator and consul, to the magistracy, senate, and body of the Parians, greeting:

“Whereas application hath been made unto us, at Delos, by great numbers of the Jews from several quarters, complaining against you in the hearing and presence of your own ambassadors, for barring the Jews the liberty of their country laws, and the free enjoyment of their rites and sacrifices; they having likewise shewed us the instrument of interdiction itself: these are to let you understand, that we will not suffer any such unreasonable rigour to be practised towards our friends and allies: but our pleasure is, on the contrary, that they be let alone in the free and peaceable enjoyment of their customs, festivals, and sacrifices; being no more than the allowance of a privilege which they enjoy in Rome itself: for, in the edict of Caius Cæsar, consul, prohibiting all public meetings and congregations in the city, the Jews alone were permitted to meet together: and I myself, in another case of prohibition, excepted the Jews likewise out of that restraint, and left them to their own ways and manners. Wherefore, if so it be, that you have passed any order to the prejudice of our allies, in the privileges that we have thought fit to allow them, it is but just and reasonable that you revoke and make void any such decree out of respect to us, and to them for our sakes, as they are our friends and allies.”

After the death of Cæsar, Marcus Antonius, and Publius Dolabella, being then consuls, called a senate, and gave an audience to the ambassadors of Hyrcanus, upon the subject matter of their instructions, formed a new league with them, and came to a resolution, at last, in favour of all their demands. Dolabella, having received letters from Hyrcanus, took occasion, from thence, to send dispatches all over Asia, and particularly to Ephesus, the metropolis of that province, in terms to the following effect:

“The emperor * Dolabella to the magistrates, senate, and people, of Ephesus, greeting:

* Title of generals in those days.

“Whereas we are given to understand by Alexander, the son of Theodorus, and ambassador of Hyrcanus, the high-priest and prince of the Jews, in the name of the said Hyrcanus, that the Jews, being tied up by the religion, laws, and constitutions of their country, not to bear arms, travel, or so much as provide themselves necessaries for life, upon the day of their sabbath, are thereby rendered incapable of attending the duties and services of the war: we do, therefore, order and appoint, according to what our predecessors have done before us in the same case, that the said Jews be, from this time forward, exempted from all military charges, and permitted the liberty of meeting, worshipping, and sacrificing, according to their own rule and way. And hereof you are to cause due notice to be given through all the cities of your province.”

There are many decrees of the senate and emperors of the Romans of this kind; and others which have been made in favour of Hyrcanus, and of our nation. There are also decrees of particular cities, and rescripts of the Prætors to such epistles as concerned the rights and privileges of our nation. But it is apprehended that the specimens we have inserted, will be deemed sufficient by such as are disposed to judge with candour and liberality. We have produced marks still apparent of the friendship in which we have been held by the Romans, and demonstrated that those marks are engraven upon columns and tables of brass in the capitol, and preserved to this day as monuments of that alliance. To adduce more proofs would be both tedious and unnecessary. I shall, therefore, throw myself on the candour of the reader, presuming that no doubts can be entertained of facts confirmed by such demonstrative evidence, and so advert to the history.

Many decrees omitted as tedious.

CHAP. XVIII.

The murder of Julius Cæsar is followed by a civil war. Cassius and Herod join in horrible oppressions, Venality and perjury prevail.

ABOUT this time a sedition happened in Syria, upon the following occasion. Cæcilius Bassus entered into a plot upon the life of Sextus Cæsar, caused him to be put to death, and took possession of the province. This outrage was followed by a bloody war upon the borders of Apamia. The party attached to Julius Cæsar opposed Bassus with their utmost power, and were joined by Antipater and his sons, in honour to the memory of his illustrious benefactor, accounting himself bound, by every tie of justice, to take vengeance on the murderers of so generous a friend. During this contest Marcus came from Rome, to take upon him the government of Sextus; and, in the mean time, Brutus and Cassius, with a band of other conspirators, barbarously assassinated Julius Cæsar in the senate-house, after he had retained the imperial dignity for the space of three years and six months.

Upon the slaughter of Sextus, Bassus seized on the government.

Marcus succeeded in the government of Syria.

The death of Julius Cæsar occasioned shocking contentions and disorders among the subjects of the Roman empire. The heads of the people were divided into factions, and, regardless of the public welfare, acted according to their respective interests and passions, and an universal anarchy ensued. Cassius obtained the command of the army in Syria, which which was then before Apamia, and having soon brought over to his interest Marcus and Bassus, raised the siege. He then proceeded from place to place, collecting men, money, and arms, wherever he went; but the place he most oppressed was Judæa, on which he levied an enormous tax of betwixt seven and eight hundred talents of silver.

During this confusion, Antipater committed the care of gathering part of the money fixed on Judæa, to his two sons, while Malichus (who was next to him in power, and secretly his enemy) was concerned with others in collecting the rest. Herod, who was desirous of obliging the Romans, though at the injury of his countrymen, began with the most acceptable presents to Cassius, of the contributions of Galilee, as the first-fruits of his service. Several cities, under other governors, were exposed and sold to the best bidders, particularly Gophna, Emmaus, Lydda, and Thamna, the inhabitants of which were, by order of Cassius, sold for slaves. He was particularly incensed against Malichus, and, for his neglect, formed a design of putting him to death, which he certainly would have done, had not Hyrcanus, by the hands of Antipater, pacified him with a present of an hundred talents out of his own coffers. But Cassius had no sooner left Syria, with the treasures he had collected, than Malichus concerted measures for the destruction of his generous benefactor, whom he considered as the only obstacle to his ambitious views. Antipater, entertaining a suspicion of his design, as a necessary caution, crossed the river Jordan, and placed himself at the head of as large a body of Jews and Arabians as he could collect together. Malichus, who was bold and artful, finding himself suspected, immediately went to Antipater and his sons, and, by perjury, attempted to prove his innocence. "Can it be imagined (said he) that I should be so weak as to think of a plot or conspiracy, when I knew that Herod had the command of the arms and magazines, and that Phasaël had the command of Jerusalem?" In consequence of this and other subterfuges, Antipater was prevailed on to form a reconciliation with the traitor. Marcus, who then held the government of Syria, was so incensed at the proceedings of Malichus, that, but for the intercession of Antipater, he would have put him to death.

CHAP. XIX.

Herod obtains the government of the Lower Syria. Antipater is treacherously taken off by Malichus.

AT this time a war commenced between Anthony and the younger Cæsar, (afterwards called Augustus); so that Cassius, sensible of the great talents of Herod, nominated him to the government of Cœlo-Syria, and appointed him a strong guard, both of horse and foot, promising, at the same time, that, after the war was over, he would promote him to the sovereignty of Judæa. The advancement of Herod proved of fatal consequence to his father; for Malichus, thinking that Antipater would by that means become still more powerful, resolved to dispatch him; and, to that end, taking the opportunity of Antipater's one day dining with Hyrcanus, he bribed the butler to put poison in his wine, with which he instantly expired, and Malichus, with an armed force, took possession of the city. Such was the end of Antipater, a man of strict probity, a friend to the distressed, and a true lover of his country.

When Herod and his brother heard of this barbarous murder upon the person of their father, they were greatly incensed against Malichus, who, in their own minds, they were convinced was the author of it. But Malichus had the confidence to forswear all, and stand upon his justification. Herod was desirous of wreaking instant vengeance on the head of the traitor; but his brother Phasaël dissuading him from that measure, through an unwillingness to disturb the public peace, they permitted him to make a defence, and assumed the appearance of being satisfied of his innocence; after which they proceeded to the interment of their father, the ceremonies of which they caused to be performed with the most distinguished magnificence.

Herod now went to Samaria, and finding every thing in great disorder, made it his business to regulate matters, and settle all disputes among the inhabitants, by a regular course of law and justice. Soon after the arrival of Herod, there came on a solemn festival at Jerusalem, upon which occasion he advanced with his guards towards the city; but Malichus, being still under apprehension, persuaded Hyrcanus not to admit him, upon pretence that it would be a profanation of the holy religion, to communicate the ceremonies of their worship to strangers. But Herod treated the interdiction with contempt, and, in the night, gained admittance with his attendants. This circumstance alarmed Malichus, who, perceiving the necessity of an ambiguous behaviour, treated Herod with great apparent respect, and pretended to be exquisitely afflicted at the fate of Antipater. Herod and his friends saw through this hypocrisy, but deeming it expedient, for the present, to oppose dissimulation to dissimulation, affected to believe him sincere, and the next day, taking their leave, returned to Samaria.

CHAP. XX.

The murder of Antipater revenged on Malichus, at the instance of Cassius and Herod.

CASSIUS, to whom the character of Malichus was well known, immediately, on the news of the death of Antipater, enjoined Herod to seek revenge upon the head of the murderers, and, for that purpose, dispatched private orders to different commanders of his troops, that were then at Tyre, to afford such assistance as he should require. Soon after, in consequence of Laodicea being taken by Cassius, the people came thronging to him with presents to court his favour, so that Herod made no doubt of availing himself of that opportunity to gain his point. But Malichus, conscious of his own guilt, and suspecting the design of the other, formed a plan for getting his son from Tyre, where he then resided as an hostage, thinking if he could retreat with him into Judæa, the Jews might be tampered to a revolt, and he himself take advantage, while Cassius was engaged in a war with Anthony, of seizing on the government. But his project was frustrated through the sagacity and precaution of Herod, who sent out several officers beforehand, to meet Malichus and his train upon the way, under pretext of inviting him to an entertainment, but with orders to fall on and dispatch him with their daggers, as soon as he reached a certain spot. The officers, in obedience to the command given them by Cassius, readily complied with the injunction of Herod, waited the opportunity, and put the traitor Malichus to death. This alarming and sudden event so affected Hyrcanus, that he remained speechless and insensible for some time: but, on recovering himself, and enquiring into the particulars, Herod put an end to his curiosity, by assuring him, that it was all done by command of Cassius. Upon hearing this, Hyrcanus commended the action, as taking vengeance on a villain, capable of every design that could be injurious to individuals, or to society in general.

Cassius had no sooner left Syria, than great disturbances arose in Judæa; for Felix, with the troops under his command in Jerusalem, made a sudden attack upon Phasaël, and the people betook themselves to their arms in his defence. Herod applied himself to Fabius, the governor of Damascus, desirous of hastening to the assistance of his brother; but was prevented, for the present, by a prevailing indisposition. Phasaël, however, weathered the storm, and, with his own forces, drove Felix, and all his tumultuous party, out of Jerusalem, and forced them for sanctuary into a strong hold, whence they were dismissed on such terms as the conqueror thought proper proper to impose. Phasaël reproached Hyrcanus with the highest ingratitude, in supporting an enemy after the services he had derived from him, and, in particular, giving the brother of Malichus possession of Massada, one of the strongest fortresses in the country. But Herod, upon his recovery, retook all the places that had been reduced by Felix, and brought him quietly to submit to his own terms.

C H A P. XXI.

Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, opposes, and is defeated by, Herod, who espouses Mariamne, the grand-daughter of Hyrcanus.

Herod opposed by Antigonus.

HEROD had a more powerful enemy to subdue than Felix. Antigonus having entered into a design of opposing him, for that purpose raised a powerful army, and, in consideration of a considerable sum of money, engaged Fabius, governor of Damascus, to join him. He was also assisted by Mariion, who, through favour of Cassius, had obtained the command of Tyre, and power over all Syria, having settled several garrisons there, and three in Galilee itself. Herod, however, speedily reduced those places to submission: though he treated the Tyrians not only with lenity, but singular respect, conferring presents on many of them, as a token of the good-will he bore to their country. He then immediately advanced, and being met by Antigonus, at the head of his army, a desperate engagement ensued, in which Herod proved victorious, the army of his opponent being totally routed, great numbers slain, and the rest, with their conjunctive leaders, forced to a precipitate flight. After this conquest, Herod returned in triumph to Jerusalem, where he was received with universal acclamations of joy: for he had already contracted an affinity with the family of Hyrcanus, being on the point of marriage with Mariamne*, the daughter of Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, and Alexandra, the daughter of Hyrcanus. The nuptials were accordingly consummated; and Herod had, by this wife, three sons and two daughters: having had a former wife of his country, named Dores, by whom was born to him his eldest son, Antipater.

C H A P. XXII.

Complaints brought by the Jews against Phasaël and Herod, who, having conciliated the favour, obtain the sanction, of Anthony, who will not admit of their charge. Edicts of Anthony respecting the Jews.

Phasaël and Herod are accused by the Jews.

DURING these transactions, a decisive battle took place near Philippi, in Macedonia, in which Cassius, having been defeated by Anthony and Augustus Cæsar, went into Gaul, and Anthony into Asia. When the latter arrived at Bithynia, he was attended by ambassadors from several princes and states in that part of the world, to congratulate him on his late success. Several of them alledged complaints against Phasaël and Herod, whom they accused of having usurped, and arbitrarily exercised, the sovereignty of Judæa, leaving Hyrcanus only the name of a king. But Herod pleaded his cause so powerfully, and enforced his arguments by the proper administration of a douceur to Anthony, that his adversaries could not obtain a hearing. Upon Anthony's arrival at Ephesus, Hyrcanus, and a body of the principal Jews, sent messengers to him with a crown of gold, and various other presents, at the same time requesting that their countrymen, who were carried prisoners by Cassius, contrary to the rules of war, might be set at liberty, and restored to those possessions of which they had been unjustly deprived. They also desired the sanction of letters from Anthony to the respective provinces in their favour.

Anthony, pleased with the compliment, and thinking the request made by the Jews strictly just and reasonable, readily complied, and, in consequence thereof, wrote to Hyrcanus and the Jews, and also dispatched an edict to the Tyrians, to the following effect:

“ Marcus Antonius, emperor, to Hyrcanus the high-priest, and prince of the Jews, greeting:

Edicts in favour of the Jews.

“ Whereas we have received from Lyfimachus, the son of Pausanias, Joseph, the son of Menæus, and Alexander, the son of Theodorus, your ambassadors at Ephesus, fresh assurances of the continuance of your and your people's affection for us, according to what hath been formerly exhibited to us at Rome, in which commission they have faithfully and worthily acquitted themselves; and whereas we are abundantly satisfied with the sincerity of your intentions, more from the proof we have had of your good faith, than the force of words; we do heartily agree to your proposals, and embrace your friendship. Now the enemies, both of our self, and of the people of Rome, having laid waste and ravaged the whole country of Asia, without any regard to laws, oaths, promises, or contracts, we have turned our arms against these violators of all duties, sacred and civil; not for any particular interest of our own, but in vindication of the common cause of mankind; as in the case of the horrid murder of Cæsar, a crime most black and hideous. Such was the outrageous malice of the assassins at the battle of Philippi, where, having possessed themselves of all the strong places, up to the very sea, under the cover of almost impassable mountains, they were so posted, that there was only one way open to come at them: but, notwithstanding these difficulties, divine justice gave us so entire a victory over the sacrilegious rebels, that we beat Brutus and Cassius into the town; where, finding themselves begirt, they both perished together: so that having inflicted a just vengeance upon the heads of these monsters, we now hope to see peaceable days again, and Asia, that looks like a body already recovering out of a desperate distemper, by this relief, delivered finally from the outrages and calamities of a most devouring war. It shall be our care likewise to provide, that you and your people may come in for an ample share in the comfort of so great a blessing. To this end we have already dispatched away our mandates, from place to place, for the immediate discharge of all the Jews, as well bond as free, that had been exposed to sale by Cassius, or his order. And it is our farther pleasure, that you shall quietly enjoy to yourselves, and your heirs, all the graces and privileges unto you granted by myself and Dolabella, with an express inhibition to the Tyrians, that they give you no sort of molestation, and as positively commanding them to make full restitution of the goods and estates that hath been taken away from the Jews, declaring our acceptance also of the crown you were pleased to send.”

“ Marcus Antonius, emperor, to the magistrates, senate, and people of Tyre, greeting:

“ Whereas we have been given to understand at Ephesus, by the ambassadors of Hyrcanus, the high-priest, and prince of the Jews, that, in the time when our enemies were in possession of this province, you entered upon the lands of several of this people for your own use: be it now known unto you, that, as we engaged in this war for the good of the empire, and for the maintenance of justice, against a band of lawless rebels,

* She was the daughter of Alexander, the son of king Aristobulus, by Alexandra, the daughter of Hyrcanus. She was a lady of extraordinary beauty and distinguished virtue, and, in all other laudable qualifications, accomplished beyond most women of her time; but the real motive for Herod's desiring to make her his wife was, because the Jews, at that time, had a very zealous regard for the Asmonean family, (that is, the descendants of the Maccabees), and therefore he thought that by marrying this lady, he should the more easily obtain the general affections of the people.

" so we do hereby will and require you, not only to live in peace and amity with our allies, but also to restore to the former proprietors whatever you have of theirs, that was taken from them by the hands of our enemies, who, as they had no manner of right thereunto themselves, by any commission or authority from the senate, so neither could they convey any right to others, upon whom they pretended to bestow it, being only the mercenary instruments of their violence and usurpation. And now having brought our adversaries to condign punishment, we find it reasonable to re-establish our allies in the full and quiet enjoyment of their estates: wherefore, if you have in your hands, at present, any lands, or estates, formerly belonging to Hyrcanus, the prince of the Jews, which you came to be seized of in the time, or under the countenance, of Cassius's invasion, it is our will that they be forthwith delivered up to the persons from whom they were taken, without any opposition or delay; and in case of any doubt or difficulty that may arise upon the equity of the matter, it shall be our care, when we come into those parts, to hear both sides, and to do impartial justice."

■ Mark Anthony, emperor, to the magistrates, senate, and people of Tyre, greeting:

" I have sent you my mandate, which you are to see carefully transcribed in Latin and Greek, and exposed upon a table among your records, in a public place, where all people may take notice of it." And again,

■ Marcus Antonius, emperor and triumvir, &c. as follows:

" Whereas Caius Cassius, taking advantage of our troubles and distractions, brake in, with a body of troops, upon a province with which he had no concern, and without the least colour of any warrantable title or pretension, ravaging and destroying the country and the whole nation of the Jews, though our dear friends and allies, and continuing those outrages, till, by our arms, we brought down the pride and insolence of these presumptuous usurpers; it is our express will and command now, for the reparation of all these indignities, (so far as in us lies,) to ordain and appoint, that restitution, or satisfaction, be forthwith made to our allies the Jews, for whatsoever hath been forcibly taken from them, and the persons of all their prisoners to be set at liberty: and we do likewise require that this our decree be punctually observed, upon pain of our utmost displeasure."

Anthony wrote to the same purpose also to the people of Sidon, Antioch, and Arad, which we think proper to mention in this place, that posterity may know what honour and respect our nation has received, from time to time, from the state of Rome.

C H A P. XXIII.

Fresh charges alledged against Herod and Phasaël. The cause is tried. Herod retaliates on his accusers.

WHEN Anthony, after this, came into Syria, he was met and saluted, on the way, by Cleopatra, where he became enamoured of her person and accomplishments.

Notwithstanding the repulse which the enemies of Phasaël and Herod had met with, no less than one hundred of the most eminent persons amongst the Jews repaired in a body to Anthony, with complaints and accusations against them, and the most eloquent speakers were appointed to urge their complaints. Anthony now thought proper to give them an hearing. The defence of the two brothers was undertaken by Messala and Hyrcanus, who, at this time, by marriage, was become father-in-law to Herod. The cause was tried at Daphne; and Anthony, after a full hearing of both parties, demanded of Hyrcanus, whom he considered as most perfectly qualified for public administration? He replied, that he knew no persons so capable of government as Phasaël and Herod. This declaration was highly satisfactory to Anthony, who still held in grateful recollection the friendly reception, and liberal entertainment, he had received from their father Antipater, at the time Gabinius invaded Judæa, in token of which he conferred upon them both the dignity of Tetrarchs, (a) and committed to them the public affairs of Judæa. He also wrote several letters in their favour, and imprisoned fifteen of their most violent persecutors, with a resolution to have put them to death; but Herod, by his mediation, diverted the resolution.

(a) The word Tetrarch, which sometimes occurs in Scripture, (as in Matt. xiv. 1. Luke iii. 1, 19. ix. 7. Acts xiii. 1.) and is frequently used among the descendants of Herod the Great, signifies a Lord that has the fourth part of a state, province, or kingdom, without wearing a diadem, or bearing the title of a king. But it must not be always understood in a rigorous sense, because the name of Tetrarch was given to him who possessed sometimes an half, and sometimes a third, part of any principality; nay, frequently the name of King was given to him who was but a Tetrarch; and that of a Kingdom to a Tetrarchy.

This act of candour in Herod had very little weight with his adversaries, who were no sooner dismissed, than they concerted new schemes for his destruction. When Anthony arrived at Tyre, they dispatched no less than a thousand of their principal men with accusations of the like nature as before against the brothers. But they had already formed so powerful an interest by dint of presents, that Anthony sent his orders to the magistracy of the place to assist Herod in the support of his authority, and to do justice on the Jewish messengers, as seditious innovators, who had a design of subverting the government. Herod, however, on this occasion, gave an additional instance of his moderation, in repairing to the deputies as they were advancing up to the city, and advising them, by all means, to withdraw themselves in time. Hyrcanus enforced the advice of Herod, and desired them to depart, to prevent the mischiefs that might attend their persisting in their appeal: but this turbulent faction, in spite of all remonstrance and advice, persisted in their resolution, till they were set upon, and overborne, by multitudes both of Jews and inhabitants, who killed and wounded great numbers of them, and dispersed the rest. Notwithstanding the rigour which was found necessary to suppress such outrageous proceedings, many of the common people persisted in their invectives and exclamations against Herod, which irritated Anthony to such a degree, that he commanded the fifteen who were imprisoned to be put to death.

The matter is brought to trial.

C H A P. XXIV.

Antigonus tampers with the Parthians to depose Hyrcanus, and put the brothers to death. Divers adverse circumstances attend them in consequence of the contention of parties.

IN the year following Pacorus, son of the king of Parthia, and Barzapharnes, a chief commander of that country, possessed themselves of Syria; and Ptolemy Mannæus dying at the same time, his son Lysanias succeeded him, having contracted a particular friendship with Antigonus, the son of Aristobulus, by means of Barzapharnes, who held him in great esteem.

Antigonus, who had long looked upon Herod with an eye of jealousy, had established an interest among the most leading persons of the Parthian nation, and contracted with them, for a thousand talents, and five hundred women, on their deposing Hyrcanus, putting him and all his party to death, and receiving him for governor in his stead.

Though the sum promised was not deposited, the gorous sense, because the name of Tetrarch was given to him who possessed sometimes an half, and sometimes a third, part of any principality; nay, frequently the name of King was given to him who was but a Tetrarch; and that of a Kingdom to a Tetrarchy.

The Parthians, at the instance of Antigonus, enter Judæa.

They are joined by a number of Jews.

Parthians embarked in the undertaking, and marched with an army against Judæa; Pacorus at the head of one body, by the way of the coast, and Barzapharnes, the general, at the head of another, through the inland parts. The Tyrians opposed the entrance of Pacorus into the city; but the people of Sidon and Ptolemais opened their gates. Upon this he detached a troop of horse upon the scout, to take a view of the state of the country, and reinforce Antigonus, if occasion should require it. The Jews of Mount Carmel espoused his interest, by whose assistance he was induced to think he should become possessed of that part of the country which they call Drymæ. At the instance of others who came over to him, and thereby considerably augmented his force, he advanced even to Jerusalem itself, with resolution to attack the brothers, Phasaël and Herod, in the royal palace. But a considerable part of their adherents fell upon them in the market-place, and driving them from their post, they fled into the temple. Herod placed a guard about the adjacent premises, for the better security of the sacred edifice; but the multitude impetuously breaking in, set fire to the buildings, and consumed both them and the guards. Herod, however, soon avenged himself on his seditious adversaries, in a defeat he gave them, with very great slaughter.

They went on skirmishing from day to day, till the approach of the feast of Pentecost, for which the party of Antigonus waited with great impatience, on account of the vast numbers of people who resorted thither upon that solemnity. When the time came, many thousands were gathered together about the temple, some with arms, and others without. Indeed, they had seized on both city and temple. Herod still maintained the palace with a small party; the charge of the walls and the outworks being committed to Phasaël. The enemy, having posted themselves in the suburbs, Herod made a desperate sally upon them, in which he did great execution, driving several thousands before him, some into the temple, and some into the city, and forcing others to take sanctuary behind a rampart that was near at hand, while Phasaël acquitted himself as became a man of valour.

The partisans of Antigonus seize on both city and temple.

The brothers make a gallant resistance, and repulse the enemy.

Pacorus gains entrance into Jerusalem.

Lays a snare for Phasaël, who is cautioned by Herod.

Pacorus in the mean time entered the city, at the instance of Antigonus, with a small party, under pretence of quelling the sedition, but, in reality, to effect the purpose for which the Parthians had contracted with him. Phasaël received him and his party courteously, which the other requited with an insidious practice upon his life; for he prevailed on him to go on an embassy to Barzapharnes, in order to ensnare him. But Herod was so averse to every idea of accommodation, that he advised his brother to cut off Pacorus and his whole party, to prevent further mischief, being well assured of the perfidy of the barbarians with whom they were engaged in contest.

However, through some fatality, Hyrcanus and Phasaël went on the embassy, under the conduct of Pacorus, leaving a guard of two hundred horse with Herod, and ten of those people they call freemen. Upon their arrival at Galilee, the commanders of the several garrisons met them with their arms, but received them courteously, and none more so than Barzapharnes, though he was designed as one of the principal instruments of the plot. Phasaël and his train were conducted to a quarter upon the sea-side, where, being given to understand that the Parthians were to receive a thousand talents, and five hundred women, of Antigonus, to assist him against them, they became apprehensive of the design, in which they were presently after confirmed by notice given to Phasaël of their intention that very night, and there being a guard in readiness to seize on his person.

The plot is frustrated.

The plot would certainly have been carried into execution, had they not waited for the intelligence of Herod's being secured at Jerusalem by the Parthians, as had been previously concerted; for they inferred, that, if the other two had been secured first, it would of course afford Herod opportunity to escape.

The veracity of the information was soon evident, from the coming up of the guards who were to execute the design. Upon the discovery, Phasaël was advised to take horse, and betake himself to immediate flight. Ophellius, a man of the first rank and fortune in Syria, had detected the plot, and living near the sea, offered him the convenience of shipping for his departure. But Phasaël was too generous to abandon his friends in their distress, and chose rather to go to Barzapharnes, and reproach him with the indignity of so foul a practice, by representing to him, that, as money had been his object, so he was better able to gratify him than Antigonus; that he might have avoided entering on the commission of so horrid a deed on the persons of ambassadors, in violation of the laws of good faith, hospitality, and nations. The barbarian had the hardiness to deny the foundation of his suspicion, affirming that it was mere conjecture, and then went to Pacorus, his confederate in the design.

Barzapharnes is reproached with perfidy, but denies the charge.

CHAP. XXV.

Hyrcanus and Phasaël are taken up by the Parthians. Herod's flight. Jerusalem besieged. Antigonus obtains the government. Phasaël destroys himself. Divers instances of the magnanimity of Herod.

BARZAPHARNES had no sooner departed, than a party of armed men took Phasaël and Hyrcanus into custody, amidst their exclamations against the perfidy of the Parthians. An eunuch was also dispatched to apprehend Herod, if they could decoy him out of his palace. But Herod, having intelligence of the perfidious conduct of the Parthians, eluded their designs, and immediately went and remonstrated with Pacorus, and his principal officers, on their ignominious proceedings, who also had the hardiness to disclaim all concern in the plot, though they had been privy to every manoeuvre. They told him, that "he ought to go out with them before the walls, and meet those who were bringing him his letters; for they were not taken by his adversaries, but were coming to give him an account of the success of Phasaël." But having heard so much of his brother's ill usage, and being confirmed in his suspicion of the Parthians, from the opinion of Alexandra, a woman of singular prudence, and whose daughter he was to marry, Herod governed himself by her caution and advice, in preference to all others. Upon this occasion the Parthians deliberated on the measures that were proper to be taken, not deeming it expedient to make an open attempt upon a person of such rank and eminence. But Herod, reflecting on the present distracted state of things, as well as the perfidy of the Parthians towards his brother, resolved to take advantage of the dusk of the evening to attempt his escape. He took with him all the troops he had about him, his mother, sister, and Mariamne, his contracted spouse, the daughter of Alexander, and niece of Aristobulus, with his wife's mother, the daughter of Hyrcanus, the youngest brother, and the rest of the family. This was a spectacle that must have affected the most obdurate heart; for who, without commiseration, could have beheld the women, with their infant children, lamenting their fate, in abandoning their country, and being subject to the most poignant calamities that could befall human nature.

Hyrcanus and Phasaël are apprehended by the Parthians.

Herod's caution.

He dies by night.

But Herod sustained this reverse of fortune with incredible magnanimity, and, by his advice and example, endeavoured to animate his friends and companions. He told them there was no hope, either of safety or of life, but in flight; and observed, that grief and despair were not only fruitless, but would be obstacles to their pursuing the means of their deliverance. Upon these words they formed a resolution necessary for the present occasion. They had not proceeded far, when an unfortunate accident happened in the overthrow of one of the carriages, that endangered the life of his mother. This disaster affected him to so great a degree, from the tender regard he had for his parent, and the apprehensions of being overtaken by the enemy through the delay delay it occasioned, that he had certainly cast himself upon the point of his own sword, had he not been prevented by his friends about him, who represented to him, that so rash an action would expose them to the fury of their enemies, and that it was not becoming a brave man to give way to despair. He then prosecuted his journey to the castle of Massada, with the utmost speed possible, though pressed on his passage by the Parthians, with whom he had many skirmishes, but still got the better. He was pursued by the very Jews themselves, who, coming up with him, when he had proceeded about threescore furlongs in his way from Jerusalem, assaulted him, but were repulsed and put to the rout.

When he afterwards came to be king of Judæa, he erected a famous palace upon the spot of ground where he obtained this victory; and built a city, which he called by the name of Herodium. Coming afterwards to Resa, in Idumæa, he was met by his brother Joseph, with whom he consulted on the most expedient means of getting rid of the multitude of useless and superfluous people they had in their train, the castle of Massada, which they had fixed upon as their retreat, could not contain the whole body. He therefore dismissed about 9000, to provide, in the best manner they could, for themselves, up and down in Idumæa, and gave them money to purchase provisions, till they could find some residence. He took those who were fit for action, together with his near relations, into the castle, where he disposed of the women and their families, to the number of about 800 persons, and leaving them a competence of provision, hastened to Petra, the capital of Arabia.

As soon as the Parthians understood that Herod had fled from the city, they seized on all that he left behind him, and plundered the houses of the principal people, who had left them for the safety of their persons. They made booty of all the property they could find, and even seized the treasure of the royal palace; but the spoil was not so considerable as they expected; for Herod, being sensible of their rapacious disposition, had the precaution to remove his most valuable treasures; and his example was followed by all those who attended him to Massada.

Having plundered Jerusalem and the adjacent country, the Parthians put Antigonus in possession of the government, and then delivered to him Hyrcanus and Phasael in bonds. But the escape of the women was a mortifying disappointment to him, as the Parthians were, by contract, to receive the women with money. As for Hyrcanus, Antigonus ordered that both his ears should be cut off, in order that he might be incapacitated for ever after from becoming high-priest; blemished or maimed persons being deemed ineligible to the pontifical dignity. Phasael, knowing that his death was determined, put a voluntary end to his life and sufferings; and not having the liberty of his hands to dispatch himself, such was his resolution, that he beat out his brains against the walls of the prison. Some affirm that the contusion was not mortal; and that the surgeons appointed by Antigonus, under pretence of assisting him, were in truth to dispatch him; and that they applied poison to the wound instead of remedies. He lived long enough, however, to understand that his brother Herod was at that time safe, and out of the hands of his adversaries, which made his death more welcome to him, in the satisfaction of leaving one behind him that would avenge his blood upon the heads of his adversaries.

In the mean time Herod, so far from sinking under his misfortunes, seemed the better disposed to encounter them. His first application was to Malchus, king of Arabia, to borrow a sum of money of him, in his present state of distress, either upon credit and consideration, or upon the score of bounty and humanity; not doubting of a fair and friendly return from a prince who was already indebted to him for many signal obligations. At this time Herod was unacquainted with the death of his brother; and his principal view in going to the king of Arabia, was to obtain a sum of money from him for his ransom, taking a son of Phasael along with him as a security for the return of the money. But all his expectations proved abortive; for, before he reached Petra, he received a message from Malchus desiring him immediately to depart his dominions, as the Parthians were absolutely against receiving him. His answer was that he did not come with a view to put any person to trouble or expence, but to treat upon some important affairs of his own. Upon reflection, however, he thought it most prudent to depart, and therefore proceeded in his way to Egypt. In the evening of the first day he met with a number of people, who had taken shelter in a castle, and were friends to his interest; and the day following he arrived at Rhynocura, where he received the first information of the ill-treatment of Hyrcanus, and of the death of his brother Phasael.

In the mean time Malchus, being touched with remorse at his ingratitude towards Herod, dispatched messengers after him to solicit his return; but as he had reached Pelusium, he found that it was too late to repair the injury he had done him. The inhabitants of Pelusium refused him the liberty of embarking from that place; upon which he applied to the magistrates of the town, who granting him permission to take what course he pleased, he set sail for Alexandria. Cleopatra, who was at this time there preparing for an important enterprize, gave him an honourable and magnificent reception, in order to induce him to take up his residence there for some time; but he was so desirous of proceeding to Rome, that the earnest intreaties of the queen, the extremity of the season, and the danger of the seas, could not divert him from his purpose.

He accordingly left Alexandria, and, after a very hazardous voyage, at length landed at Rhodes, where he found public affairs in a very embarrassed state. He was here received in a very generous and hospitable manner by two friends, named Sappinas and Ptolemy; and though he was greatly distressed for want of money, yet he procured a vessel to convey him to Brundisium, from whence he repaired with all possible expedition to Rome. Upon his arrival he repaired to Anthony, to whom he related an account of all his adventures in Judæa, the seizure and murder of his brother Phasael, the imprisonment of Hyrcanus, and the contract of paying the Parthians a thousand talents, and presenting them with five hundred women, upon the advancement of Antigonus to the government through their assistance. He represented that, with much difficulty, he had effected the escape of the women, by night, into a place where they were since besieged, and in hourly expectation of falling into the hands of the enemy; and, having recited these particulars, earnestly intreated some assistance, that he might recover the right which Anthony had himself bestowed on him, and of which he had been unjustly and cruelly deprived by his enemies.

CHAP. XXVI.

Herod obtains the favour and interest of Augustus and Anthony. Is chosen king of Judæa. Honourably conducted to the capitol. Massada besieged by Antigonus, and hard pressed.

THE melancholy story of Herod's adventures excited the tenderest compassion in Anthony, who recollecting the former friendship that had subsisted, first with his father, Antipater, and afterwards with him, and at the same time, being exasperated against Antigonus, whom he looked upon as a man of a busy, turbulent spirit, and a professed enemy to Rome, determined to espouse the interest of Herod with all his powers. Augustus concurred likewise with Anthony in promoting his desire, partly on the score of acknowledgment for former services, and partly for the sake of the friendship that had subsisted between the two families; for his father and Antipater had served together in a military capacity in Egypt: he wished also to gratify Anthony, by serving the person of his recommendation.

Herod's cause espoused by Anthony & Augustus.

The matter was soon after brought before the senate; upon which occasion Messala and Atratenus presented Herod with a singular recommendation to their favour and esteem; both for his own and his father's services, and good affection to the state of Rome. At the same time they reproached Antigonus, not only for his past misdemeanours, but his late acceptance of the government from the hands of the Parthians, in contempt of the authority of the Romans. When the minds of the senate were inflamed by these representations, Anthony took occasion to give his opinion, that, considering the state of the present war with the Parthians, they could not do better than constitute Herod king of Judæa. The motion passed the assembly without opposition, and a decree was issued accordingly. This was an honour great beyond conception; and Herod's obligation to Anthony, in procuring it, much the more binding, for being conferred upon him, not only beyond his expectation, but likewise the rule of ordinary practice; for it was not the custom of the Romans to bestow royal dignities but upon the branches of royal families: nor did his ambition aspire to any thing more than to obtain it for Alexander, the brother of Mariamne, the nephew of Aristobulus, by the father's side, and of Hyrcanus, by the mother's, whom he caused afterwards to be put to death. This elevated promotion was effected in the space of only seven days, when Herod was presented with his royal commission.

He is unanimously voted king of Judæa by the Roman senate.

Upon the breaking up of the assembly, Anthony and Cæsar took Herod out of the senate-house betwixt them, accompanied by the consuls of the senators, who conducted him to the capitol, where they were to sacrifice in form, and deposit their decrees. Anthony congratulated the new king on his accession at a most splendid entertainment, upon the first day of his reign, in the 184th olympiad; Caius Domitius Salvinus, and Caius Alinius Pollio, consuls.

Attended in solemn form to the capitol.

Antigonus, ever since the departure of Herod, had laid close siege to the fortreis of Massada, where the garrison had plenty of all sorts of provision, water only excepted, of which they were in such want, that Joseph, Herod's brother, with a party of two hundred chosen men, had formed a resolution of making a sally out of the town, and attempting to force their way through the enemy, in order to get to the Arabians, being well informed that Malchus had repented of his late inhospitable behaviour to Herod. But, at the very interim, there fell so copious a shower of rain, that it filled all their cisterns and receptacles for water; so that, upon this seasonable supply, they maintained their defence with re-animated vigour, determined by no means to abandon the place. Indeed, this wonderful interposition of Providence inspired them with such resolution, that scarce a day or a night passed without a successful sally upon the enemy.

Massada closely besieged by Antigonus.

At the same time Ventidius, a Roman general, drove the Parthians out of Syria, and went afterwards into Judæa, under pretence of bringing succour to Joseph, but, in reality, to obtain money from Antigonus, which he fully accomplished by drawing his troops towards Jerusalem. Having carried his point, he drew the greater part of them off again, leaving only a small remainder under the command of Silo, to give colour to the stratagem; for Antigonus was under a necessity of coming to a composition with him, lest he should annoy him before the arrival of the Parthians, whom he expected to come up to his assistance.

Ventidius goes into Judæa.

CHAP. XXVII.

HEROD, having settled his affairs thus prosperously, left Rome, and landing at Ptolemais, with a considerable body both of his own people and auxiliaries, proceeded, by the way of Galilee, towards Antigonus. Silo and Ventidius had orders brought them from Anthony, to assist Herod in taking possession of the kingdom; but it so fell out that the latter was employed in quieting the tumults which an incursion of the Parthians had raised in several of the cities. Silo, indeed, was in Judæa, but had been bribed by Antigonus. Herod's army, however, increased very much on the march; and the far greater part of Galilee had declared in his favour. The object on which he was most intent was the raising the siege of Massada, in order to set his friends and relatives at liberty, who were blockaded therein. But Joppa was a main obstacle, and would be such a check upon him in his advancing towards Jerusalem, that its reduction was indispensable.

Herod advances against Antigonus.

Silo, upon this, marched off, and being closely pursued by the Jews, Herod fell in upon them with a small party, routed them, and brought off Silo just as he was falling into their hands. After this he made himself master of Joppa, and immediately posted to the relief of his friends in Massada, where the people resorted to him in great numbers; some for his father's sake, others for his own; some again from a sense of the obligations they had to both; but the major part from the hope of ingratiating themselves with the new king.

Reduces Joppa.

Antigonus, in the mean time, had laid several ambushes for him in his way, though with little effect; for Herod, as soon as he had raised the siege of Massada, relieved his friends, and taking the castle of Refa, he advanced directly towards Jerusalem with Silo's troops, and a great number of citizens, who stood in awe of his power, to attend him. He encamped with his army upon the west quarter of the town, where the defendants galled him as much as possible with arrows, darts, and vigorous sallies. Herod, in the mean time, made a formal proclamation by his herald, from place to place, round the walls of the town, that his sole design, in that enterprize, was the public good, and welfare of the city; and that he was so far from having any injury in contemplation, that he was ready to grant an indemnity, without exception, to any persons whatever, let their crime or indignity have been ever so notorious.

Antigonus, by way of reply to what Herod had caused to be proclaimed, declared, in the presence of Silo, and the Roman soldiers, that it was highly unjust and unreasonable to pretend the advancing to the throne a private man, an Idumæan, a kind of half Jew, since it was totally repugnant to their established law, and right of succession. With respect to himself, he observed, that if they took any offence at his receiving the crown from the hands of the Parthians, and for that cause were induced to depose him from the dignity, there were others of the royal and sacerdotal line, who had deserved as well from the Romans, and had as fair a title to the government, and that, therefore, it would be an act of the highest injustice to deprive them of it.

Is highly reproached by Antigonus.

From these reproaches they came at length to acts of open hostility, inasmuch, that Antigonus commanded his men to force the assailants from the walls, which they did so effectually, by plying them with darts and arrows, that they were compelled in general to retire. It was now no longer a doubt but that Silo was corrupted; for he had so tampered with divers of his officers, that they encouraged the soldiers to mutiny, on pretence of the want of forage and provisions, more commodious quarters, and better pay. These seeming obstacles gave great uneasiness to Herod, who thought it prudent to apply, not only to Silo's officers, but likewise the common soldiers, foldiers, being fearful lest a general revolt should take place, and his expedition, instead of being attended with success, prove destructive to him and his adherents. He accordingly represented to them, that he had received his commission from Cæsar, Anthony, and the senate; and encouraged them to stand their ground and maintain their station, resting satisfied with this assurance, that they should want nothing they could reasonably desire for their satisfaction. He then appointed commissaries to procure a supply of provisions, which were immediately distributed in great abundance; and, in order to guard against a scarcity in future, he wrote for cattle, corn, oil, wine, and other necessaries, to be sent from Samaria, which was then under his protection.

But notwithstanding all this, he found some inconveniencies from the treachery of Silo, who giving notice to Antigonus of all that passed, he, with flying parties and ambuscades, about Jericho, and the crags of the mountains, frequently intercepted and cut off the convoys that were designed for the united army. Herod, on the other side, was as watchful on his part, and, with ten companies, one half Romans, the other Jews, together with a body of mercenaries, and a few troops of horse, proceeded towards Jericho. Upon his arrival he found the town abandoned, and that five hundred of the inhabitants, with their families, had sought refuge amongst the mountains.

The Romans rifled the city; and the booty, in money, jewels, and other articles, amounted to an inestimable value. After stationing a garrison in the place, he returned with his forces, assigning his army their quarters in his new conquests, as Idumæa, Galilee, and Samaria. Antigonus, through the prevailing influence of gold, wrought upon Silo, so that part of the Roman army, through his means, might be quartered in Lydda, thinking thereby to conciliate the favour of Anthony.

But Herod, who could not remain inactive, dispatched his brother into Idumæa, with 1000 foot and 400 horse; and went himself to Samaria, where he provided for his mother, and the rest of his kindred, that he brought from Massada, and then proceeded to Galilee, to take in some garrisons which were then in the possession of Antigonus. Coming up to Sepphoris in a deep snow, he found the place wholly abandoned, but abounding with provision of every kind. The adjacent country being infested with robbers, who, from the fastnesses of the mountains, greatly annoyed the neighbourhood, Herod ordered out a squadron of horse, and three companies of foot, to drive them from their lurking places. About forty days afterwards he marched against them with his whole army, upon which they drew out, and made so vigorous a charge, that Herod's left wing gave way, till, upon a victorious reinforcement, with Herod himself at the head of it, he brought his own men on again, put the adversaries to a total rout, and pursued them as far as the river Jordan. This overthrow brought all Galilee over to Herod, those only excepted who had sheltered themselves in the recesses of the mountains. The intended operations being now over, Herod ordered the common soldiers an hundred and fifty drachmas a man, and the officers a sum in proportion to their rank, and they were dismissed to their winter quarters. Silo and his officers, who had been hitherto billeted upon Antigonus, now gave Herod to understand, that he not only refused to allow them more than one month's entertainment, but sent orders to all the country around to convey what they had to the mountains, and carry off, in fine, all the necessaries of life, so that the Romans might be starved out of their quarters. But Herod prevented this mischief, by committing the charge of providing for the army to his younger brother, Pheroras, with orders also to repair the fort of Alexandrion, which then lay in ruins; in both which commissions he acquitted himself much to his reputation.

Anthony was now at Athens, and Ventidius in Syria, where he ordered Silo to join him, with the auxiliary troops of the Parthians; but first to assist Herod, if occasion should require. Herod, however, sent away Silo and his people to Ventidius, and marched himself against the rovers, who lay lurking in their hiding places up and down the hills. These free-booters had so sheltered themselves in the caves and holes of the mountains, that it was no easy matter to come at them; because the deepness and cragginess of the mountains, made it impossible either to scale them from below, or from above to get down to them by any passage; and therefore, to ferret them out of their caves, Herod bethought himself of the following expedient: he caused several large cases, or chests of wood, to be made, and filling them with soldiers, let them down into the entrances of the caves, by chains from engines he had fixed above, by which means he either destroyed all that lurked in them, or reduced them to terms of submission. Desirous, however, to prevent a general destruction, Herod ordered proclamation to be made, that the lives of those who surrendered should be spared; in consequence of which they submitted in great numbers, and laid down their arms.

Many, however, rejected the offer; and some, who were even made prisoners, preferring death to the loss of liberty, put an end to their lives. There was, in particular, an aged man, whose wife and seven sons had intreated his permission to surrender themselves to the enemy, and the old man complied with their request; but planting himself at the entrance of the cave, he stabbed them one after another as they attempted to pass. He then cast their bodies down the precipice, and himself after them, choosing rather to lose his life than his liberty. Before he proceeded to this act of despair, he reproached Herod with the meanness of his extraction; though he endeavoured, by signs and intreaties, to divert the man from his purpose, but without effect.

Herod, supposing he had suppressed these depredations, deputed the government of that part of the country to Ptolemy, and marched at the head of 600 horse, and 3000 foot, into Samaria, with a design to bring Antigonus to a decisive battle. Ptolemy's command proved fatal to him; for he was let upon, and slain, by a party of those people who had formerly raised the tumults in Galilee. Upon the committing of this outrage, they betook themselves to places almost inaccessible for refuge, and from thence ravaged the whole country as opportunity offered: but Herod, on his return, retaliated the injuries their neighbours had sustained from them; for some he caused to be slain, and forced out of their strong holds, and put to torture, as well as their fortifications to be demolished; and when he had thus freed himself from his most formidable enemies, he imposed a fine of an hundred talents upon those cities who were suspected to harbour them.

The Parthians, in the mean time, having been overcome, with the loss of their king, Pacorus, in the action, Ventidius, according to his instructions from Anthony, sent away Machæras to Herod, with a reinforcement of two legions, and a thousand horse. But Machæras, at the instigation of Antigonus, without the approbation of Herod, was absolutely for going to him, under pretext of giving intelligence, and making discoveries. Finding, however, at his approach, that Antigonus was so far from trusting or admitting him, that he ordered his people to keep him off with slings and darts, he was convinced of the propriety of Herod's advice in dissuading him, and his own error, in not complying with it. Hereupon he returned to the city of Emisaus, and in the fury of his rage, put all the Jews to the sword he found in his way, without distinction of friend or foe. Herod was so irritated at this wanton barbarity, that he hastily withdrew to Samaria, with a resolution to inform Anthony of the outrage, and give him to understand, that he was sufficient of himself to cope with Antigonus, without the assistance of such were more injurious to their own party than to the enemy. As he was advancing, Machæras posted after him, and overtaking him on the way, intreated him either to desist from his journey, or, if he was determined to prosecute it, to leave his brother Joseph behind, in order to carry on the war in conjunction with him against Antigonus. Herod, upon this importunity, granted him his request, and forgave what was past, leaving the army under the command of Joseph, with express orders not to run any unnecessary hazard, or enter into any misunderstanding with Machæras.

Affairs being thus settled, he marched away immediately with an auxiliary body to reinforce Anthony, who was at that time before Samosata, upon the river Euphrates. Upon his coming to Antioch, he found great numbers of people who were desirous of going over to Anthony, but were appalled by fear of being beset by a troop of merciless banditti, who had fallen upon and slain many as they passed the road. Herod, however, putting himself at the head of them, and undertaking both for their conduct and protection, they prosecuted their march; and when they were advanced within two days journey of Samosata, they fell into an ambush of the enemy's horse that lay close behind the bushes, upon the entrance into the plain, to prevent any succours from passing that way to Anthony. They suffered the front to move forward towards the plain; but, upon Herod's coming up with the rear, fell furiously upon him with about five hundred horse, and broke through the first rank. But the king pressing violently upon them with his guards, he beat them from their ground, rallied his own scattered troops, and followed the pursuit till he made himself master of the booty they had taken, in prisoners, horses, mules, carriages, and all the baggage, which was very considerable. After this feat, Herod continued his journey to Anthony, but not without other encounters on the way, with troops of barbarians, that sallied out of the woods and thickets upon him in his progress. However, he defeated and cut them to pieces in every attempt, till, in the end, the way was safe and open to him, without any difficulty or hazard, the people revering him as their general protector.

Anthony, having heard of the exploits of Herod upon the barbarians, and how gallantly he had acquitted himself upon several other occasions, sent out the flower of his troops to receive him on his approach to the town, with all possible honour and respect, both for his person and services, admiring him for his extraordinary abilities; and, in fine, treating him with a dignity suitable to the royal character he had himself conferred upon him. In a short time after this, Antigonus delivered up the place, and, in so doing, put an end to the war. Anthony committed the government of the province, and the command of the army, to Sosius, with orders to assist Herod upon all occasions, and went himself into Egypt. Sosius hereupon sent away two legions with the king towards Judæa, for the guard of his person, and marched after them himself with the rest of his army.

During these transactions, Joseph, in the absence of his brother, was slain in Judæa, through want of attention to his order, when he went to Anthony. He marched towards Jericho with his own troops, and five companies which he had from Machæras, and encamped upon the mountains. The Romans with him were but raw and undisciplined troops, and the greatest part newly raised, so that the enemy took advantage both of the place where he was posted, and the inexperience of the men under his command, and falling upon them, surprized and routed them, entirely destroying six companies, and cutting Joseph to pieces, fighting valiantly at the head of them. Antigonus being master of the field, and finding Joseph among the dead bodies, caused his head to be cut off, although his brother Pheroras would have redeemed it at the price of fifty talents. This rout was followed with the revolt of Galilee, and the throwing as many of Herod's friends as they could lay hold on into the lake, besides divers seditious connections in Judæa. Machæras, in the mean time, fortified the castle of Gath.

The news of these disasters was brought to Herod at a place called Daphne, in the suburbs of Antioch; and it was the less surprising to him, from some foreboding dreams he had a little before, which manifestly pointed at the death of his brother. From this place he went to Mount Libanus, and taking eight hundred of the people along with him, and a Roman legion, advanced to Ptolemais. In passing by night through the country of Galilee, he was set upon by the way, but repulsed the enemy, forced them back into the castle out of which they came the day before, immediately invested the place, and disposed the troops early next morning for an attack. A violent tempest, however, arising at that instant, he was obliged to draw off into some of the adjacent villages for shelter. Just as this happened, another legion arrived from Anthony, which reinforcement so alarmed the garrison, that they evacuated the place, and retired through favour of the night.

Herod, impatient to revenge the death of his brother, hastened with all expedition towards Jericho, where he treated, with great magnificence, all the grandees of the place upon his arrival. When the entertainment was over, he dismissed his guests, and retired to his own chamber. He had no sooner departed than the roof fell in; but no damage was sustained in point of life; it was deemed a singular interposition of Providence in his deliverance from such imminent danger.

The next day a party of six thousand of the enemy came suddenly down from the mountains, and resolutely falling upon Herod's forces, the Romans were thrown into such a consternation, that they immediately retreated. The enemy seeing this, pursued them, and a warm engagement ensued; but no material advantage was obtained on either side, only that Herod received a wound in the side from an arrow.

Antigonus, at this time, sent Pappus, his general, away to Samaria, with some troops under his command, being desirous of shewing the enemy his strength, and that he had men to spare. While he and Machæras were preparing for an encounter, Herod got possession of five towns, put two thousand men to the sword that were there in garrison, and leaving them all in ashes, went back in quest of Pappus, who was then encamped at a place called Ifanus, where he was joined by great numbers, who came over to him from Jericho and Judæa. Herod perceiving the enemy disposed for a battle, put it immediately upon that issue, and gave them a total rout, doing execution upon them in revenge of his brother's death, in the very town they fled to for sanctuary. The houses were presently crowded with soldiers from top to bottom, some in one place, and some in another; but, upon taking off the roofs, by means of stones and various missile instruments, those within were all laid open to an universal slaughter. The most dismal part of the spectacle was the piles of dead bodies that lay in heaps in the chambers above and below, which could not fail of striking the spectators with horror.

The miserable remainder of their broken troops fled in such disorder, and in such numbers, that, had it not been for a furious tempest at that very time, the victors had marched directly up to Jerusalem, and put an end to the war; for Antigonus was already upon the point of resolving to abandon the city. It was now too late in the evening, and Herod had ordered his soldiers to supper, while he retired into a chamber to use the bath, as he was much fatigued after the engagement. As he was naked in the bath, with only one attendant, out started three soldiers with swords in their hands, and crossing the room in haste, rushed out at the door. Such was their consternation, however, that they hurried away, as it were, to save themselves, without dreaming of doing any violence to the king, whom they might have most easily destroyed. The body of Pappus being found among the slain, Herod the next day ordered his head to be struck off, and sent it to Pheroras, as a kind of consolatory revenge.

When the rigour of the season was over, Herod removed his army, and encamped near Jerusalem, taking up his quarters on the temple-side of the town, as Pompey had done long before him, and as the spot that lay fairest for an attack. When he had collected his pioneers, with all necessary materials, and given orders for the casting up the trenches and bulwarks, and made every proper disposition for the siege, he went to Samaria, to consummate his marriage with Mariamne, to whom he had been some time contracted, as already observed.

AFTER the celebration of the nuptials, Sosius sent away his troops before him, being a considerable body of horse and foot, soon after following them himself by way of Phœnicia. The king also returned from Samaria with a reinforcement of about 30,000 men, which being joined, the whole army drew up together towards the walls upon the north quarter of the town, to the number of 11 legions of foot, and 6000 horse, with other auxiliaries out of Syria. The two generals were Sosius and Herod; the former sent by Anthony, as an assistant; the other acting on his own account, with a view of settling himself in the possession of a kingdom, which the senate had conferred upon him, on the overthrow of Antigonus, the professed enemy of Rome.

The besieged Jews make a gallant defence.

The Jews within the city were numerous and resolute, and made a very obstinate defence; for the whole nation may be said to have been gathered together at this important crisis. They animated each other by exclaiming incessantly, "The temple of the Lord! The temple of the Lord!" and some uttered such presages of victory, as seemed prophetically to foretell their deliverance. Nor were they wanting in their endeavours, by frequent excursions, and laying waste the country, to distress the assailants; for they swept it so bare, that there scarcely remained any sustenance either for man or beast. But Herod soon remedied this inconvenience, partly by the ambushes he laid to ensnare the pillagers, and partly by commissaries and convoys he employed far and near for the supply of the camp. The season being remarkably favourable, and an extraordinary number of hands employed, the pioneers soon finished the approaches, and the assailants advanced to the battery, leaving nothing unattempted to carry their point. The besieged, on the other hand, made a stout resistance, opposing stratagem to stratagem, and by one invention frustrating another. They made many desperate sallies, and set fire to divers of the enemy's works, as well those that were finished, as those that were only begun. Their courage and resolution were in no respect inferior to the Romans; but, in point of military skill and experience, they were greatly surpassed by them. As fast as one wall was thrown down, the defendants supplied it with a retrenchment that served for another. They counterwrought mine against mine, and, in short, with undaunted resolution, opposed fatigue, danger, and difficulty, making a most gallant and desperate resistance. This bravery they evinced in defiance of a formidable enemy before the city, and a dearth of provisions, and other necessaries, within the walls; for they were now in the sabbatical year, when it was unlawful for them to till the ground.

Upon the fortieth day after breaking ground, twenty chosen men scaled the first wall, and were seconded by some of the centurions under the command of Sosius. The second wall was scaled fifteen days after, and several galleries about the temple set on fire, which Herod imputed to Antigonus, in order to expose him to the hatred of the Jews. When the out-quarter of the temple, and the lower town, were taken, the Jews betook themselves into the inner court of the temple, and the upper part of the town; and, lest the Romans should interrupt them in their daily oblations, they desired permission of Herod, by their ambassadors, only to bring in so many beasts as should be necessary for that service. Herod readily granted their request, hoping it might prevail with them in his favour; but finding his mistake, and that they were more and more sanguine in their attachment to Antigonus, he fell on immediately with his whole strength, and took the city by assault.

The Romans scale

The Romans were so exasperated by the opposition and the delay, and the Jews, in the interest of Herod, so averse to those of the other party, that they put all to the sword without mercy, as well in the streets as in the houses, without regard to age or sex. Nay, the very temple itself was no longer a sanctuary to those who fled to it. Never was exhibited so shocking a spectacle of blood and slaughter; for the soldiers were transported, betwixt fury and revenge, to such a degree of implacable inhumanity, that, notwithstanding the injunction of Herod, on their allegiance, to withhold their rage, they continued the massacre; and death triumphed in all its horrid forms.

The city

massacre.

The conduct of Antigonus was unworthy the dignity of his station; for, as soon as he found all was lost, he came down from the tower, and, in the humblest manner, cast himself at the feet of Sosius, who, instead of pitying, insulted him in the highest degree, saluting him by the name of Antigona, in token of contempt of his pusillanimity and dastardly behaviour. But, though he gave him a feminine appellation, he did not treat him like a woman; for he was put in chains, and kept in close custody.

Antigonus

Though Herod had gained a compleat victory over his enemies, he had still more difficulties to encounter. The foreign auxiliaries were so pressing and importunate to be prying into the temple, and the very sanctuary itself, that neither authority, intreaty, threatening, or even force itself, could hardly restrain them. Indeed, he would have deemed his success worse than a defeat, if conquest had proved the cause of exposing the sacred and incommunicable mysteries of religion to the curiosity of the prophane multitude.

Being desirous that the city should not be plundered, Herod informed Sosius, that if the treasure was seized, and the town depopulated, he should be sovereign of a desert, and that he would not purchase the government of the universe at the price of so much blood. Sosius replied, that it was according to justice, and common practice, upon taking of a place by assault, to allow the soldiers the advantage of the booty. Herod admitted the force of Sosius's plea as to what concerned the plunder, and declared that every man should be duly recompensed out of his own private coffers. According to promise, he rewarded both private men and officers in proportion to their respective stations and deserts, and presented Sosius with gifts worthy his rank and character. In short, the liberality and munificence he displayed on this occasion, afforded universal satisfaction.

taken.

This memorable event happened in the consulate of Marcus Agrippa and Canidius Gallus, on the 185th olympiad, in the third month, and upon the day of a solemn fast, being the very anniversary of their destruction by Pompey; for the city was taken upon that very day 27 seven years before.

Sofius, after making a handsome present for the service of the temple, departed from Jerusalem, taking the pusillanimous Antigonus with him in bonds to Anthony, and leaving the courageous Herod in full possession of the sovereignty of Judæa. Herod entertained doubts that Anthony would not take away his life, and, of course, apprehension, that, on his appearing at Rome, and preferring his claim to the government to the senate, as he was of the blood royal, and himself only a plebian, it might still tend to his degradation. He was conscious that he might suggest, that, though, for his own part, he could not pretend to deserve the dignity, having been in arms against the Romans, yet he might hope they would not punish his innocent sons for the guilt of their father, but admit them to the succession. Impressed with these suspicions, he prevailed with Anthony, for a considerable sum of money, privately administered, to have Antigonus dispatched, which being done, restored his tranquillity.

Antigonus

Herod.

With this prince ended the reign of the famous and illustrious house of the Asmonæans, after being in possession of the government an hundred and twenty-six years.

This family was illustrious in itself, for the long continuance of the regal and sacerdotal succession in it, and for the signal services which they and their ancestors, from time to time, had rendered our nation. But, through intestine broils, the administration was transferred from them to Herod, the son of Antipater, a person who had no claim from lineal descent, or dignity of extraction.

HYRCANUS, being at this time in the hands of the Parthians, news was brought him of Herod's promotion to the government. He therefore made his court to the new king, from whom he obtained his liberty in the following manner.

to be taken off, and allowed him the freedom of the city of Babylon, where there were many of his own sect, and where he had the same reverence paid him, not only by the Jews of that city, but those likewise on the other side of the Euphrates, as if he had actually been their governor and high-priest; circumstances which could not but afford him considerable satisfaction.

Hyrcanus intends to visit Herod.

When he came to understand that Herod was advanced to the government, judging of the disposition of others from his own, and flattering himself with mighty expectations from Herod in his exalted situation, as an acknowledgment to the preserver of his life and honour, he determined to pay him a visit, but not without first advising with his particular friends. Having informed them of his design, after some deliberation, they unanimously opposed it, alledging, "that as long as he was amongst them, he might assure himself, from them, and all their people, of a reverence and obedience suitable to the dignity of his character, which he could never expect in his own country, by reason of the maim he had received from Antigonus, which disqualified him for such a claim." They also observed, that, in point of good offices and reciprocal services, it was not with princes as with private persons, since their elevation, in general, diverted their attention from past transactions. But these remarks, though pertinently suggested by his friends, had no weight with Hyrcanus, who nevertheless persisted in his resolution.

Receives an invitation from Herod.

Herod, indeed, gave him an invitation, by letter, to come over to him, and take his part in the government, persuading him to desire Phraates, and his brethren, the Jews, not to envy him so great happiness, ■ he had now an opportunity of shewing his gratitude to the person to whom he stood indebted for his very existence. To enforce the matter, Herod sent Saramalla upon an embassy to Phraates, with persuasive arguments, and magnificent presents, to conciliate his favour towards his worthy patron and dearest friend. But this zeal in Herod did not flow from principle, but from a caution, as being ■ usurper, to secure himself from every change of state, and, for that consideration, either to get Hyrcanus into his power, or put him out of the world, as the event afterwards proved.

Goes to Jerusalem, and is honourably received by Herod.

Hyrcanus, having at length obtained his discharge from Phraates, and being amply supplied with money and necessaries by the Jews in Babylon for his journey, proceeded to Jerusalem, where he was received with every token of singular honour and respect. Herod appointed him the first place at all public meetings and entertainments, treated him in the style of a father, and maintained such an appearance of amity, as could not fail to elude all doubt and suspicion of the integrity of his disposition. In fine, he omitted nothing that could give ■ favourable opinion of his regard for Hyrcanus, till at length he sullied all he had done before, by an act that caused the greatest disturbance in his own family. Being cautious of having any man of honourable extraction advanced to the pontificate, he sent to Babylon for one Ananel, a person of obscure condition, and constituted him high-priest. The promotion of this mean person greatly disgusted Alexandra, the daughter of Hyrcanus, and mother of Aristobulus, (brother to Mariamne, the wife of Herod,) to whom, by right of birth, the office of high-priest belonged. In order, therefore, to resent the affront offered her family in setting aside her son, and obtruding ■ foreigner into the pontificate, she wrote to Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, who had an absolute authority over Anthony, to request that honour for Aristobulus.

Herod advances ■ obscure person to the pontificate.

Alexandra applies to Cleopatra ■ obtain it of Anthony for her son.

Anthony, at first, did not attend to the matter. It happened, however, that one Gellius, a particular friend, being in Judæa about some affairs of his own, by chance saw Aristobulus and Mariamne, the symmetry and beauty of whose person so attracted his eye, that he could not refrain from complimenting Alexandra as the mother of two such finished productions of nature, and recommending her to present their pictures to Anthony, as the most effectual means of securing her best services. Alexandra accordingly sent the pictures; and Gellius, being disposed to inveigle Anthony into a passion for Mariamne, exaggerated the representation in the drawings, and in words described them as of angelic form.

Anthony sends for Aristobulus.

Anthony deeming it imprudent to send for the wife of a prince who was his friend, and fearful of giving Cleopatra any ground for jealousy, wrote to Herod, informing him of his desire to see Aristobulus, if a convenient opportunity should offer. Herod did not think it proper to send a youth of so attractive a person to Anthony, with whose eccentric passion he was well acquainted; so that he put him off, with a pretence that the Jews were so seditious, and bent upon the experiment of another king, that if Aristobulus should leave the kingdom, it would excite dangerous commotions.

Herod puts him off with an evasion.

Herod, having thus excused himself to Anthony, kept up appearances with Aristobulus and Alexandra; his wife Mariamne pressing him, upon every occasion, to do her brother justice in the instance of the pontificate, urging withal, that it was his interest so to do, and that the duties incumbent on the office would excuse him beyond all exception from taking the journey. Herod, incensed at this spirited exertion, called his friends about him, and, in the severest terms, inveighed against Alexandra, telling them she had entered into a conspiracy against him, and influenced Cleopatra to prevail with Anthony to dispossess him of the government, and transfer it to her son, in which, he said, she was the more to blame, as she could not, in that instance, assert the cause of Aristobulus without degrading her daughter, and paving the way, by intestine feuds, for dethroning her son-in-law, and removing him from a dignity he had acquired by so much toil and hazard. Upon the whole, he declared himself ready to forget and forgive all injuries; and, as ■ proof of the reverential regard he had for his mother, and all her relations, he would immediately vest her son with the exercise of the office, which he never would have conferred on Ananel, had he been of proper age to have executed.

Herod inveighs against Alexandra.

This declaration, intended merely to amuse the women and friends around him, very much embarrassed Alexandra, who was so greatly affected by the joy of having accomplished her wishes on the one hand, and a concern of finding herself suspected on the other, that, in ■ transport of passion, she thus vindicated her conduct, declaring, that, with respect to the pontificate, she was hurt by the affront put upon her son; that she was determined to leave no lawful means unattempted to do him right; but as to any design she had of raising him to the throne, it was so far from her, that if offered, she would have refused it. Her ambition, she said, went no farther than to see justice done to her son in that station, in which the honour of her family was concerned; and as that point was to be settled, she was so sensible of the king's gracious regard to her in the person of Aristobulus, that she would ever retain a most dutiful sense of the same; and if she had, in any instance, exceeded the bounds of respect and moderation, through ■ mistaken punctilio of honour, she implored the pardon of the royal personage who might be offended. This pertinent address soothed the king; and the parties re-assumed at least the appearance of friendship.

Alexandra's plea for her conduct is altering the right of her son Aristobulus.

CHAP. III.

Herod is still suspicious of the designs of Alexandra. Causes Aristobulus to be taken off. Exhibits ■ proof of consummate hypocrisy.

THE king deposed Ananel from the office of high-priest, alledging, as the cause, that he was a foreigner, and of the race of the Jews that were formerly carried away by the Syrians beyond the Euphrates, many thousands of whom took up their habitations in Babylon. He was, indeed, of sacerdotal extraction, and a friend of Herod's, who, upon Herod's coming to the crown, had created him high-priest, priest, and afterwards deposed him, though contrary to law: for the high priesthood is an office for life, and not to be taken away, when duly conferred. The first who brake in upon that rule was Antiochus Epiphanes, who removed Joshua, to make way for his brother Onias. Aristobulus was the second, who took that dignity from his brother Hyrcanus; and Herod the third, who deposed Ananel, and conferred the pontificate on Aristobulus.

Alexandra is suspected and watched by Herod.

By this expedient Herod thought to have healed the divisions in his family; but it appeared, from consequences, the reconciliation was not so permanent as might have been expected; for he entertained suspicions that Alexandra would be no longer quiet, than she had an opportunity of compassing her ends by reviving dissent. For this cause he confined her to her palace, and absolutely forbade her interfering in public concerns. He also set guards over her, that the least transaction might not pass without his knowledge. This method of proceeding highly disgusted her; for, being a woman of spirit, nothing touched her so near as this officious scrutiny into her conduct, inasmuch, that, rather than endure so abject a life, in being deprived of the liberty of speech, she was determined to run any hazard to deliver herself from it. Thus resolved, she fully stated her case in a letter to Cleopatra; and requesting, at the same time, her advice and assistance, received, from that princess, an invitation to come away privately, with her son, to her in Egypt. Alexandra approved the counsel, and bethought herself of an expedient to put it in execution. She ordered two coffins to be provided, caused herself and son to be put in them, and appointed the servants, who were privy to the contrivance, to see them carried out by night, and put on board a ship that lay ready at hand to transport them into Egypt.

She prepares to go into Egypt.

Is betrayed, and surprized in her escape.

But this stratagem miscarried through the treachery of one of the servants, who communicated the whole scheme to a man named Sabbion. This person had been suspected of assisting in the death of Antipater, the father of Herod, and therefore, in order to obviate the consequences that might follow, he divulged the whole secret. The king suffered them to go some way from the city, and then surprized and brought them back; but fearing the power and influence of Cleopatra, he suspended his design, and making a virtue of necessity, pretended, with great clemency, to pardon in both what he dared not punish. It was not long, however, before he embraced the opportunity of taking a fatal revenge on young Aristobulus.

Aristobulus universal-ly lamented.

The feast of tabernacles (which is one of our principal festivals) now approaching, Herod seemed disposed to celebrate it with the utmost mirth and good humour: but a circumstance occurred, that induced him to execute his design upon the life of the youth sooner than he intended. Aristobulus, who was to officiate as high-priest upon the occasion, possessed a most engaging person and demeanour, and was in the eighteenth year of his age. Having advanced towards the altar, he discharged his duty with so becoming a reverence, and the splendour of the pontifical robes added such lustre to the gracefulness of his person, that, by both these, he captivated the affections of the people, inasmuch, that they could not forbear expressing the love, honour, and esteem, they bore, in the warmest prayers and acclamations, and accompanying those tokens of joy and affection, with the most grateful acknowledgments of the many obligations they had to his noble family. This raised Herod's jealousy to such a degree, that he immediately meditated a scheme for taking away the life of Aristobulus, which he effected as follows.

Shared by rod.

As soon as the feast of tabernacles was over, Herod went to partake of an entertainment with Alexandra at Jericho, where he took Aristobulus, in point of complacency, to bear him company in the diversion of the day. The weather being too warm for exercise, the company withdrew into the cool of the shade, near certain fish-ponds, in which several of them proposed to bathe. Aristobulus was prepared on to be one of the party; and no sooner had he plunged into the water, than those who were in it before, ducked and dipped him according to the direction of Herod, and, under pretence of sport and play, kept him so long under water, that he was at length actually drowned. Thus was this accomplished youth taken off, through the base device of a wicked king, in the eighteenth year of his age, and the first of his pontifical office, which was immediately restored to Ananel. When this lamentable disaster was known to the women, distraction sat on every countenance, and despair and horror reigned around. It was so public a loss, as to be mourned throughout Jerusalem; for every family seemed to have a concern in it. But Alexandra was more deeply affected than all; and it was an aggravation of her calamity, that, though she was convinced of the treachery of the act, she found herself under a necessity, for her own security, to pass it over in silence. Such was her despair at intervals, that she resolved to lay violent hands on herself; but, on cooler reflection, she checked her passion, hoping she might live to revenge so flagitious an act, on the guilty head of the perpetrator. With this view she maintained a fair appearance, and seemed to have no knowledge of the transaction.

And drowned.

Aristobulus is universal-ly lamented.

Excessive grief of Alexandra.

Disimulation of Herod.

Herod, to wipe off all suspicion of so foul a deed, affected more than ordinary tokens of sorrow, fell into tears, and exhibited an apparent confusion of soul. He might probably be seized with a momentary remorse for spilling the blood of the innocent in the prime of youth; but as he held the death of the one necessary for the security of the other, his main point was to keep himself clear of suspicion. His funeral obsequies were performed with the utmost pomp and magnificence, which he attended himself as chief; a piece of chicane which excited the astonishment, and, in some degree, appeased the inward rage, of those who were inconsolable for the loss they had sustained in the death of Aristobulus.

CHAP. IV.

Herod is cited to appear before Anthony on an accusation for the murder of Aristobulus. His project for the death of Mariamne is discovered by Joseph. Joseph is put to death, and Alexandra imprisoned.

NOTWITHSTANDING external appearance, Alexandra could not suppress her grief, any more than her desire of obtaining revenge; for which purpose she again had recourse to Cleopatra, whom she acquainted with the untimely death of her son, and the manner in which it was effected. She represented the villainy of Herod in such a light, and pictured her own distress in such feeling terms, as moved the compassion of the queen, who resolved to do the utmost in her power to procure some redress. She accordingly made immediate application to Anthony, pressing him, with the utmost importunity, to see justice done on the perpetrators of so barbarous a murder. She represented to him the disgrace he would incur by suffering a king, whom he had raised to the throne, and who was the usurper of the right of another, to commit so horrid an outrage upon the lawful heir with impunity. Anthony, harrassed by the incessant solicitations of Cleopatra, was at length prevailed upon to call Herod to account, and accordingly repaired to Laodicea, where he cited him to appear before him, in order to clear himself of the imputation laid to his charge for the death of Aristobulus.

Alexandra informs Cleopatra of the treachery of Herod in the murder of her son.

Anthony sends for Herod to answer for himself.

Herod was too sensible of his guilt to trust to the merits of his cause; and dreading the influence of Cleopatra, who had incensed Anthony against him, he was greatly perplexed in what manner to proceed at so critical a juncture. He well knew, however, that it was in vain to dispute the will of the all-powerful Anthony, and therefore determined at all hazards to appear. He committed the care of the government, in his absence, to his uncle Joseph, giving him privately in charge, if Anthony should put him to death, immediately to destroy Mariamne; for Herod privately en-joins Joseph to destroy Mariamne on certain conditions.

for such was his attachment to her, that he could not bear the thoughts of her being in the possession of another even after his death; besides, he had received intimation that the fame of her beauty had captivated Anthony. Having given these orders, he took his departure with a mind fraught with the most dismal apprehensions.

Joseph discovers the secret.

A false report about Herod's death.

Herod obtains favour with Anthony.

Joseph, being now vested with the administration of affairs, attended to his trust, and made frequent visits to Mariamne, partly on business, and partly from the respect due to her character as queen. At these interviews he would frequently take occasion to insinuate the very affectionate regard Herod had for her, representing him as the tenderest and most loving of husbands. The women, and particularly Alexandra, treated his declarations with raillery, which rendered Joseph so zealous in the cause, that, to confirm the character he had given him, he insisted, as an indisputable argument of his affection, "That as he found he could not live without her, so he was resolved that death itself should never part them." But the women, as was natural, did not esteem this declaration as an evidence of love; they rather construed it to be an intimation of a tyrannical purpose he had assumed, in case of his own death, not to suffer them to survive him. A rumour was spread at this time, by some persons who bore the king ill-will, that Anthony had caused Herod to be put to the question, and after that to death.

The whole court was alarmed at it, and particularly the women, inasmuch, that Alexandra proposed to Joseph to fly for protection to the Roman legion, under Julius, that was then quartered without the city, and to take them along with him. She observed, that if there should be any broils in the palace, the Romans would take care of them; or if ever Mariamne should come to the sight of Anthony, he would deny her nothing that she should ask him, though it were the kingdom itself, or all the royal privileges she could pretend to.

While this affair was under deliberation, letters arrived from Herod, that invalidated the late report; for it appeared that Anthony, by force of presents and fair words, was so far brought over to his interest, that Cleopatra could no longer prevail with him to the prejudice of Herod; for he not only exculpated him from every imputation of having been accessory to the murder of Aristobulus, but gave him repeated tokens of favour; nay, he publicly declared, that kings were not to be accountable to their subjects for their actions. Herod displayed in his letters, the honours Anthony had done to him, setting forth, that he had called him to his councils, and to his solemn feasts, in despite of all the calumnies of Cleopatra, who had a design upon the government herself, and did all she could to effect his destruction. Anthony, he averred, was a prince of honour and justice; and told them they might expect him back again in a short time, better established in the possession of his kingdom, and in the assurance of Anthony's friendship, than ever, Cleopatra being entirely detached from him, through her acceptance of Cœlo-Syria as a present, upon condition never to trouble him more in Judæa.

An accusation brought against Joseph and Mariamne.

Upon Anthony's advancing on his expedition against the Parthians, Herod returned to Jerusalem; and his mother and sister, Salome, informed him of what had passed. The latter accused Mariamne of having had too great a familiarity with Joseph, her husband, whom she was willing to sacrifice, rather than not obtain her revenge on the innocent Mariamne. This arose from some disagreeable words between Salome and the queen, who reproached her with the meanness of her original, in comparison of the royal stock of the Asmonæns, from whom she was descended.

This accusation, however, threw Herod into the utmost transport of rage and jealousy, so that it was with the greatest difficulty he could restrain his passion within the bounds of discretion. However, on cool reflection, he took Mariamne aside, and clearly examined her respecting her intimacy with Joseph.

She said every thing in vindication of herself, that it might be supposed innocence could dictate, insisting, that, as for any thing that might look criminal or dishonourable in her conduct, she was not only innocent with regard to Joseph, but (except himself) to all mankind. The king, enamoured with the charms of his wife, and overcome by the extremity of his passion for her, relaxed, by degrees, from the violent rage into which he had been thrown, and not only absolved her from all suspicion of the crime that had been imputed to her, but confessed himself perfectly convinced that she had not given the least cause of offence. He likewise repeatedly intreated her pardon for that inconsiderate haste, which induced him to give credit to a report, by which she had been so vilely traduced, and, with tears and embraces, besought her pardon for his indiscreet conduct.

Notwithstanding all this appearance, Mariamne had some doubts of the reality of Herod's regard for her; but the more she seemed, by her expression and manner, to entertain this notion, the more anxious was he to give her every testimony he could of his sincerity. At length, however, she exclaimed, "Truly, you give abundant proof of the tenderness of your regard, as a husband, by ordering an innocent wife to be put to death, in case you should happen to die first." She had no sooner uttered these words, than Herod broke from her arms in the utmost rage, and cried out, with all the fury of a madman, "It is now evident, beyond a doubt, that the purity of my wife has been corrupted by Joseph; for nothing less than the confidence arising from such an intimacy, could have induced him to give up so important a secret, which had been committed to his care with such solemn injunctions not to reveal it."

In the impetuosity of his passion, Herod had almost determined to put Mariamne to death on the spot; but, after some violent struggles on his part, the warmth of his affection prevailed for her preservation. With regard to Joseph, however, he gave instant orders for his being put to death, even without suffering him to speak a word in his own defence; and directed Alexandra, whom he considered as the cause of all the mischief, to be committed to close confinement.

At this time great tumults prevailed in Syria, through means of Cleopatra, who having absolute power over Anthony, was incessantly persuading him to take the dominions from the several princes, and bestow them on herself. Her avarice and ambition, in fine, were so insatiable, that she attempted to gratify them at all hazards. She dispatched, by poison, her brother, a youth about fifteen, to prevent his being king of Egypt. She prevailed on Anthony to have her sister Arsinoe taken off at Ephesus, at her very devotion in the temple of Diana; so that neither temple, sepulchre, or sanctuaries, escaped her, when there was money or spoil to be got by a sacrilegious violation of them. In fine, the world would have been too small to gratify the ambition and avarice of this licentious woman, for which cause it is no matter of wonder that she instigated Anthony to take from others that which she coveted herself, and that she no sooner set her foot in Syria with him, than she formed projects to gain possession of it. By suggesting that Lysanias, the son of Ptolemy, was a friend to the Parthians, she caused him to be put to death. She obtained also from Anthony, Judæa and Arabia, from the princes who had them in possession. Anthony, indeed, was so entirely at the command of this woman, that he may be said to have been enslaved by her, and subjected to many instances of conduct that sullied and debased his character. To avoid more trouble and importunity, he gave her some certain parts of both provinces, and all the cities from the river Eleutherus to Egypt, excepting Tyre and Sidon, which have ever been free; but this did not prevent her from harrassing Anthony with solicitations to procure them.

CHAP. V.

Cleopatra comes into Judæa, and is honourably received by Herod, who afterwards is disposed to put her to death, but prevented by his friends. He then conducts her on her way to Egypt. She is loaded with presents by Anthony.

WHEN Cleopatra had obtained these acquisitions, and accompanied Anthony, in his expedition into Armenia, as far as the Euphrates, she returned, and took Apamia and Damascus in her way to Judæa, where she was honourably received by Herod, who treated with her for the revenue of that part of Arabia and Jericho which had been granted her; the latter being famous for balsam, which is the most precious of all gums, and likewise for the fairest palm trees in the world. Upon her arrival, she attempted to form an intrigue with the king; nor did she affect secrecy, but exhibited evident and open tokens of passion for him, though most probably with a treacherous design. Herod, who well knew her abandoned and dissolute character, was, in some degree, fortified against her; but when she made such advances as exceeded the bounds of decency, he determined to repulse her, and called to consultation of his friends upon it. The question he put to them was, "Whether it was not most prudent to make sure of this base woman, now he had her in his power, as it would be both a satisfaction to those she had abused heretofore, and a better security from her abuse hereafter." He observed, that Anthony himself would derive an advantage from it, as she was the common enemy of mankind, and would prove false to him, if ever he should oppose her will.

Herod was absolutely for taking her off; but those about him were no less positive against it, as a thing beneath the dignity of a prince. They therefore besought him not to think of acting so rashly, as Anthony would resent it, however conducive it might be to his advantage. They observed, that the losing of his mistress, by force or secret practice, would but tend to enhance the value he had for her before, and irritate him to revenge. That with respect to palliating violence upon the person of a princess of her illustrious quality, it would by no means be admitted. They represented to him the tumult and confusion which would inevitably follow, both in the kingdom and the royal family, if he carried his proposal into execution; and that he was justifiable in rejecting the inordinate importunities of the woman, upon every principle of reason and sound policy. Through dint of argument, and the confidence reposed in their judgment, Herod was brought over to an acknowledgment of his error, and was diverted from his desperate resolve; so that, as an instance of conduct totally reverse, he bestowed rich presents on Cleopatra, and conducted her some part of the way to Egypt.

Anthony, having subdued Armenia, sent Artabazes, the son of Tigranes, prisoner into Egypt, with the princes his sons, and presented them to Cleopatra, together with the immense booty he had taken there. Artaxias, the eldest son of Artabazes, who fled out of the country at the breaking out of the war, succeeded his father; but was afterwards driven out by Archelaus and the emperor Nero, who put Tigranes, the youngest brother of the family, into his place.

With respect to the revenue of the country, which Anthony had given to Cleopatra, Herod made a point of paying it most punctually, being well assured that it was his interest to keep upon pacific terms with her. The Arabians, considering that Herod had the levying of the tax, made due payment, from time to time, the proportion of two hundred talents a year; but this did not long continue, for it gradually fell off, till at length it was reduced to less than one half.

CHAP. VI.

Herod makes war upon, and conquers, the king of Arabia. But Athenion afterwards gives the Jews a total overthrow.

IN consequence of this deficiency of payment on the part of the king of Arabia, Herod held himself in readiness to take revenge himself by war; but was prevented by the civil broils of the Romans. The battle of Actium was now drawing on, which, it was apprehended, would put an end to the competition between Augustus and Anthony for the empire. This fell out in the 187th olympiad.

Herod having been now a long time, through favour of Anthony, master of a rich and populous country, raised a very powerful army, with which he immediately marched to the assistance of his patron: but Anthony, instead of accepting his services against Augustus, appointed him to proceed against the Arabians, whom he knew to be a false and faithless people, and from whom he had reason to expect some danger. This appointment was according to the counsel of Cleopatra, who had a project in design, by setting the Jews and Arabians at variance.

In obedience to the direction of Anthony, Herod marched back with his army, and soon after fell into Arabia, having under his command a very considerable body of horse and foot. The Arabians, having received intelligence of Herod's motions, were waiting to give him battle near a place called Diospolis. As soon as the two armies met, an engagement took place, which was, for some time, maintained with great obstinacy on both sides, till at length victory declared in favour of the Jews, great numbers of the Arabians being slain, and the rest put to flight.

Soon after this the Arabians raised another considerable army, at a place called Cana, in Coelosyria, of which Herod having received authentic information, and being advised that they were upon their march, advanced with the main body of his troops to that part of the country, intending there to encamp, and fortify himself, till he should have a favourable opportunity of attacking the enemy with a fair prospect of success. But the soldiers were so elated with the consideration of their former victory, and so well assured of the resolution, state, and condition of their army, that they besought Herod not to suffer time to be lost, but give the command to fall on immediately. Nay, such was their impatience, that they were ready to break through all the bounds of discipline to obtain their desires.

This uncommon ardour and alacrity of the troops, gave Herod so much satisfaction, that he was determined to encourage their humour, and not to check that eagerness of disposition which he thought might most probably lead on to victory. He therefore immediately put himself at their head, grasped his sword, gave the word of command, and begun the attack, telling them to follow his example. Hereupon they marched forward to the combat with such ardent resolution, that the Arabians were astonished at their courage before the encounter began. For a little time, indeed, they made some faint shew of resistance; but, soon after the first onset, they gave way, and the greater part fled in the utmost confusion.

This rout would, in all probability, have occasioned the total destruction of the Arabian army, had it not been for Athenion, Cleopatra's general in that quarter. This Athenion, who had long been an inveterate enemy to Herod, had been in a kind of neutrality, but with his men drawn up in order, attending the issue of the battle. Finding the Arabians worsted, and the Jews not only spent and wearied out with action, but seemingly careless and secure in the confidence of victory, Athenion, with a considerable body of the natives, took the Jews off their guard, attacked them by surprise, dispersed dispersed them with much difficulty, pursued them through the woods, and other places of rugged passage, and put great numbers to the sword. Upon this defeat, the Arabians took courage, rallied, and renewed the action; and made such terrible slaughter in the pursuit, that a very small party of this great body escaped with life.

After this melancholy issue, Herod posted away with all possible speed for relief; but, before he could bring it, the Jewish camp was taken and pillaged. This fatal catastrophe was owing to a sudden and unexpected surprize, through confidence and carelessness on the part of the Jews. Herod, in consequence of this disaster, was compelled to have recourse to the making depredations and incursions upon the Arabians, as opportunity would admit, and, by small advantages, gain some compensation for the capital defeat his army had sustained. But the time thus spent was not absolutely thrown away; for the troops were hereby kept in perpetual exercise, instructed in the duties of military discipline, inured to hardships and fatigues, and, in some degree, qualified to redeem their lost honours at a future period.

C H A P. VII.

A tremendous earthquake in Judæa. The Jewish ambassadors are put to death by the Arabians.

THE hope of Herod's being able to conquer his enemies, was greatly checked by a dreadful earthquake, that happened in Judæa, in the seventh year of the reign of Herod, and the year of the famous battle of Actium. It destroyed prodigious numbers of cattle; and, by the falling of the buildings in the several towns and villages, it was computed that not less than 10,000 people lost their lives: but the soldiers, who were in the open fields, escaped with much less injury; for though most of their tents were thrown down, yet little other damage took place, than some being maimed, and the whole greatly frightened.

Though this providential calamity was sufficiently terrible in itself, yet it was greatly magnified by report; and the Arabians, imagining the Jews to be utterly ruined, cherished the flattering idea, that no difficulty would attend their possessing themselves of a province, which now had not a sufficient number of inhabitants to sustain a defence. The Jews, in the height of their distress, dispatched ambassadors to the Arabians, humbly soliciting terms of accommodation, and that a peace might be established between them. But the Arabians not only put the ambassadors to death, but, in a short time after, marched, with a powerful army, into Judæa, in full confidence of making themselves masters of that country.

As soon as the Jews understood that the Arabians had entered Judæa, they were thrown into the utmost consternation. Their spirits were greatly depressed, by the reflection of their late calamities; and they despaired of being able to make any resistance against their enemies. The king seeing this, did all in his power to raise their spirits; begged of them to dismiss their unreasonable anxiety; and intreated an exertion of as much courage as might be necessary to prepare themselves for their own defence. Some of the more timorous sort of his people felt their misfortunes so severely, that, while the sense of them was recent in their minds, they could not be easily prevailed on to attend to the arguments of prudence and wisdom: but Herod, having brought them at length to a more tractable temper, in order to encourage and support, addressed them to the following effect:

C H A P. VIII.

Herod's animating address to the army inspires the Jews with courage, who totally vanquish the Arabians. In their distress, for want of water, they sue to Herod for protection.

Herod's speech to encourage the soldiers.

“YOU are not unacquainted, my fellow soldiers, that we have had, not long since, many accidents, that have put a stop to what we intended

“to accomplish; and it is probable that even those that are most distinguished for their courage, can hardly keep up their spirits in such circumstances. But since we cannot avoid fighting, and nothing, that hath happened; is of such a nature, but it may, by yourselves, be recovered into a good state, and this by one brave action, I have proposed to myself, both to give you some encouragement, and, at the same time, some information. Both which parts of my design will tend to this point, that you may still retain your own proper fortitude. I will, then, in the first place, demonstrate to you, that this war is a just one on our side; and that on this account, it is a war of necessity, and occasioned by the injustice of our adversaries: for if you are once satisfied of this, it will be a real cause of alacrity to you. After this, I will farther demonstrate, that the misfortunes we are under, are of no very great consequence, and that we have the greatest reason to hope for victory. I shall begin with the first, and appeal to yourselves as witnesses to what I say. You are not ignorant, certainly, of the wickedness of the Arabians; which is to that degree, as to appear incredible to all other men, and to include somewhat that shews the grossest barbarity and ignorance of God. The chief things wherein they have affronted us, have arisen from covetousness and envy; and they have attacked us in an insidious manner. What occasion is there for me to mention many instances of such their procedure? When they were in danger of losing their own government of themselves, and of being slaves to Cleopatra; what others were they that freed them from that fear? It was the friendship I had with Anthony, and his kind disposition towards us, that hath been the occasion that even these Arabians have not been utterly undone; Anthony being unwilling to undertake any thing which might be suspected by us of unkindness. But when he had a mind to bestow some parts of each of our dominions on Cleopatra, I also managed that matter so, that, by giving him presents of my own, I might obtain a security to both nations; while I undertook myself to answer for the money, and gave him two hundred talents, and became surety for those two hundred more, which were imposed upon the land that was subject to this tribute. This they have defrauded us of, although it was not reasonable that Jews should pay tribute to any man living, or allow part of their land to be taxable. But although that was to be, yet ought we not to pay tribute for these Arabians, whom we have ourselves preserved. Nor is it fit that they, who have professed, and that with great integrity and sense of our kindness, that it is by our means that they keep their principality, should injure us, and deprive us of what is our due; and this while we have been still not their enemies, but their friends: whereas observation of covenants takes place among the bitterest enemies, but among friends is absolutely necessary. This is not observed among these men, who think gain to be the best of all things, let it be by any way whatsoever; and that injustice is no harm, if they may but get money by it. Is it, therefore, a question with you, whether the unjust are to be punished or not? when God himself hath declared his mind that so it ought to be, and hath commanded that we ever should hate injuries and injustice, which is not only just, but necessary, in wars between several nations. For these Arabians have done what both the Greeks and barbarians own to be an instance of the grossest wickedness, with regard to our ambassadors, whom they have beheaded; while the Greeks declare that such ambassadors are sacred and inviolable. As for ourselves, we have learned, from God, the most excellent of our doctrines, and the most holy part of our law, by missionaries, or ambassadors. For this name brings to mankind the knowledge of God, and is sufficient to reconcile enemies one to another. What wickedness, then, can be greater than the slaughter of ambassadors, who come to treat about doing what is right? and when such

“ have been their actions, how is it possible they can “ either live securely in common life; or be success“ ful in war? In my opinion this is impossible.
 “ But, perhaps, some will say, that what is holy,
 “ and what is righteous, is, indeed, on our side;
 “ but that the Arabians are either more coura“ geous, or more numerous, than we are. Now
 “ as to this, in the first place, it is not fit for us to “ say so; for with whom is what is righteous, with “ them is God himself. Now where God is, there “ is both multitude and courage. But to examine “ our circumstances a little: we were conquerors
 “ in the first battle; and when we fought again,
 “ they were not able to oppose us, but ran away,
 “ and could not endure our attacks, or our cou“ rage. But when we had conquered them, then “ came Athenion, and made war against us with“ out declaring it. And is this an instance of their “ manhood? or is not a second instance of their “ wickedness and treachery? Why are we, there“ fore, of less courage on account of that which “ ought to inspire us with much stronger hopes?
 “ And why are we terrified at those, who, when “ they fight upon the level, are continually beaten?
 “ and when they seem to be conquerors, they gain
 “ it by wickedness? If we suppose that any one “ should deem them to be men of real courage, will “ not he be excited by that very consideration to “ do his utmost against them? For true valour is “ not shewn by fighting against weak persons, but “ in being able to overcome the most hardy. But “ then, if the distresses we are ourselves under, and
 “ the miseries that have come by the earthquake, “ have affrighted any one; let him consider, in the “ first place, that this very thing will deceive the “ Arabians, by their supposal, that what hath be“ fallen us, is greater than it really is. Moreover,
 “ it is not right that the same thing that emboldens “ them should discourage us; for these men do not “ derive their alacrity from any innate virtue of “ their own, but from their hope, as to us, that “ we are quite cast down by our misfortunes. When “ we boldly march against them, we shall soon pull “ down their insolent conceit of themselves, and “ shall gain this by attacking them, that they will “ not be so insolent when we come to the battle.
 “ For our distresses are not so great; nor is what “ hath happened an indication of the anger of God “ against us, as some imagine; because such things “ are accidental, and adversities that come in the “ usual course of things. If we allow that this was “ done by the will of God, we must allow that it “ is now over by his will also, and that he is satis“ fied with what hath already happened: for had he “ been willing to afflict us still more thereby, he had “ not so soon put a stop to our calamities. As for “ the war we are engaged in, he hath himself de“ monstrated, that he is willing it should go on,
 “ and that he knows it to be a just war: for while “ some of the people, in the country, have perished,
 “ all you, who were in arms, have suffered nothing,
 “ but are all preserved alive; whereby God makes “ it plain to us, that, if you had universally, with “ your children and wives, been in the army, it had “ come to pass, that you had not undergone any “ thing that would have much hurt you. Con“ sider these things; and what is more than all the “ rest, that you have God at all times for your “ protector; and prosecute these men with a just “ bravery, who, in point of friendship, are unjust,
 “ in their battles perfidious, towards ambassadors “ impious, and always inferior to you in valour.”

Herod having animated his men, advances against the Arabians.

This speech had the desired effect; the soldiers shaking off all despondency, and resuming their natural courage and alacrity. Herod, having sacrificed in form, marched away immediately towards the Arabians beyond the river Jordan. Between the two armies was a castle, of which the contending parties were equally desirous to get possession.
 A party of Arabians attempted to gain the castle;
 but the Jews, without much difficulty, repulsed them, and soon after took possession of the hill.
 Herod daily arranged his men in order of battle, and took every possible method to provoke the enemy to an engagement. In point of numbers, the Ara-bians had the superiority; but the Jews were by far the most courageous and intrepid. A general consternation appeared in the Arabian army, which so animated the Jews, that they pushed them to their very trenches, where, for a time, they made a faint shew of resistance, while despair was evident from their looks and actions. They maintained, however, a kind of fight, partly as encouraged by their numbers, and partly as compelled by inevitable necessity; till at length, after a long contest, and much bloodshed, they were put to a total rout, and with so terrible a slaughter, that, betwixt those who fell by the enemy's swords and their own; and those that were trodden to death in the crowd, there were missing 5000 of their number. The rest made their way to their camp, but with a miserable prospect before them, being destitute of all the necessaries of life; and, to add to their desperate condition, they were so blocked up by the Jews, that there was no possibility either of relief or escape.

The Ara-bians send ambassadors to Herod.

In this extremity they sent deputies to Herod, requesting that he would either grant them peace, or free them from their present distress for want of water. But he would admit neither of proposal or request, till at length their thirst became so intolerable, that, in the space of five days, no less than four or five thousand came out, and surrendered themselves prisoners, to avoid the insupportable calamity of a raging drought. On the 6th day all the rest made a sally, by consent; and attacked the besiegers, chusing rather a present certainty of death, than to perish gradually and ingloriously. Having taken this resolution, they issued out of their camp, but without either strength or spirit to sustain so desperate an action; so that, on the first attack, there fell above 7000, by which the rest were taught that Herod was a skilful commander; and being thus effectually humbled, they submitted themselves to the protection of the conqueror.

*The battle of Actium. Hyrcanus put to death by Herod, who repairs to Cæsar, and commits his govern-

THE reduction of the Arabians highly gratified the ambitious Herod, who went back to Jerusalem in full possession of his utmost wishes.
 But this sunshine of prosperity was greatly eclipsed, by his receiving intelligence of the defeat of Anthony, at Actium, by Augustus; for both friends and foes were agitated at his situation, as it was by no means probable that he, who had shewed so much friendship for Anthony, should remain without punishment. The former did not affect to disguise their apprehension of his ruin; while the latter, under a pretence of condoling with him, inwardly rejoiced at the pleasing prospect they had of a change in affairs. It occurred to Herod, that Hyrcanus, being the only surviving branch of the royal family, it would be much for his interest to have him taken off, whatever might be his own fate, with respect to Cæsar, since, whether he escaped his resentment, or fell under it, he thought it necessary to remove his own fears, by cutting him off from the succession. While Herod was ruminating on this horrid design, the very family of Hyrcanus furnished him with an opportunity of executing his purposes. Hyrcanus he knew to be of an easy and indolent disposition, averse to business, and content in every station of life. But his daughter Alexandra, on the contrary, was of an aspiring, turbulent spirit, and exceedingly anxious for a change in the government. Seeing her father careless and unconcerned at the degraded state of their family, she represented to him the disgrace of suffering the indignities which Herod daily put upon them, and advised him to apply to Malchus, at that time governor of Arabia, requesting him, if there should be occasion, to receive him into his protection; adding, that, if Herod should fall under the displeasure of Cæsar, which might reasonably be expected, he could not fail of being restored to his dignity, having an indisputable right and title, and the goodwill of the people manifestly on his side.

Hyrcanus is prevailed on by Alexandra to retire to Malchus in Arabia.

Perfidy of Dosithheus.

Hyrcanus at first turned a deaf ear to the solicitations of his daughter; but her importunities at length prevailing, he wrote to the Arabian, and committed the charge of the letter to one Dosithheus, whom he considered as a confidential friend to himself, as well as an inveterate foe to Herod. The purport of the letter was, to desire that Malchus would send him a party of horsemen to the lake Asphaltites, about three hundred furlongs from Jerusalem. But he was greatly mistaken with respect to the confidence he reposed in Dosithheus, who choosing rather to form an interest with the present king, no sooner received the letter, than he carried it to him. When Herod had read the contents, he made his acknowledgments to Dosithheus for his good office, and requested that he would seal the letter up again, carry it forward to Malchus, and receive his answer, as it would afford him the highest satisfaction to know how he would act in so interesting a business.

Dosithheus executed his commission with the utmost punctuality, and brought back the Arabian's answer, which was to this effect: "That he was willing to give entertainment to Hyrcanus and his family; that if he chose to bring with him all those Jews who remained true to his interest, they should likewise be received in the most hospitable manner: that he was ready to send a proper force to conduct them with safety, and, in fine, heartily disposed to afford Hyrcanus all possible assistance in any way he might require."

Hyrcanus is put to death.

Herod, upon the receipt of this letter, sent for Hyrcanus, and demanded of him whether he held any correspondence with Malchus. Hyrcanus answered in the negative; upon which Herod produced the letter, read it publicly, and ordered Hyrcanus to be put to death. This is according to the account contained in the commentaries of king Herod. Other historians record, that he was put to death for a conspiracy, and not for the crime that is here related. They write, that Herod and Hyrcanus, being once at an entertainment, the former, without any apparent suspicion, asked the latter whether he had received any letter from Malchus? and when he answered in the affirmative, but that the contents were merely complimentary, he was again asked if he had ever received any presents from him? to which he also replied in the affirmative; but they were only four horses for his recreation. They add, that Herod charged those upon him as crimes of corruption and treason, and gave orders for his immediate execution. To demonstrate that he had been guilty of no offence, when he was brought to this end, they alledged the peculiar complacency of his temper, which he ever maintained from his earliest youth; and that even when he came to be king, he committed the management of the greatest part of the public affairs to Antipater, the father of Herod; that he was now upwards of fourscore years old, and knew that Herod's government was in a secure state, and himself on the wrong side of the Euphrates, having left his friends behind him, and all this in submission to Herod's dominion. From these considerations they infer the incredibility of his attempting any enterprize, by way of innovation, and thence conclude that it was a plot of Herod's contrivance.

History of Hyrcanus.

Thus ended the life of Hyrcanus, a life long and troublesome, and chequered with a vast variety of fortune. He was advanced to the pontificate during the reign of his mother Alexandra, and continued to discharge the duties of it nine years, at the expiration of which his mother died, and he assumed the reins of government. He had not, however, been in possession of the sovereignty above three months, when he was expelled by his brother Aristobulus. After this he was restored to his former station by Pompey, who put him in possession of all his dignities, and, for the space of forty years, he continued in the enjoyment of them; but was at length dethroned by Antigonus, suffering the pains and disgrace of having his ears cut off, and being carried away prisoner among the Parthians. After remaining some time in this situation, he obtained his liberty, and returned home, flattering himself with great advantages from the friendship of Herod. But in this hope he was so disappointed, that the latter caused him to suffer an ignominious death at a most advanced age, after having experienced so many of the malicious turns of fortune. He was distinguished by the candour and moderation of his disposition, as well as by his regard to the laws of equity. He was remarkable for his love of ease, and generally entrusted the administration of public affairs to the care of others, from a conviction, that he was himself ill calculated for the management of them. This easiness of disposition laid the principal foundation of the fortunes of Antipater and Herod; yet, in the end, it so happened, that he fell a sacrifice to that very goodness of temper which ought to have been his protection.

Herod, having obviated all grounds of fear by the death of Hyrcanus, prepared to wait on Cæsar; though he had no reason to expect any favour from him towards a man who had so heartily espoused the interest of Anthony. He had a strong suspicion of Alexandra; and not knowing what advantage she might take of his absence to occasion some tumult, committed the care of the government to his brother Pheroras; placed his mother Cypris, with his sister, and other relations, in the castle of Massada; laying strong injunctions on his brother, if any misfortune should befall him, to maintain his authority, and continue the administration in his own name. His wife Mariamne, and her mother Alexandra, he secured in the castle of Alexandrion; as such animosity prevailed betwixt his wife, his mother, and sister, that they could not possibly live together in peace. He put the government of the fort into the hands of two friends of approved trust, Joseph and Sohemus, under pretext of doing honour to those princesses; but with private orders, if any violence was offered to his person by Cæsar, immediately to put them to death, and use their endeavours to fix his brother and sons secure in the government.

Herod commits the care of the government to his brother Pheroras.

CHAP. X.

Herod addresses Cæsar, by whom he is confirmed in his government of Judea. Magnificently entertains Cæsar at Ptolemais.

HEROD, having given these directions respecting what he would have done in his absence, left Jerusalem, and proceeded with all expedition to wait on Cæsar, who was at this time at Rhodes. Upon his arrival, he immediately made application for being admitted to an audience of the emperor, which being granted, before he entered into his presence, he laid aside his diadem, but remitted nothing else of his usual dignity. As soon as he came into the presence of the emperor, without needless apologies, as is common in such cases, he frankly addressed him in words to this purport:

"Illustrious Cæsar, (said he,) I wait not upon you to disavow the sincerity of a friendship I have always entertained for Anthony: and I must be free enough to declare, that, if it had been in my power to have made him master of the world, he had not wanted that distinguished station. I acknowledge, great prince, that I am indebted to Anthony for the regal state I at present enjoy; and had not my duty called me against the Arabians, I would have manifested my gratitude by being personally with him in the last battle. I did, however, my utmost to serve him, by supplying him with soldiers, provisions, and money. Notwithstanding the unfortunate event at Actium, I still entertain for Anthony the greatest warmth of friendship, and venerate him as a generous patron. Though I could not attend him in person, yet I gave him such advice, that, had he pursued it, would have been of the most material advantage. I urged him to abandon Cleopatra; telling him that while his connection with

" her subsisted, he would be in continual danger;
 " but he chose to proceed in another mode, and
 " has promoted your interest rather than his own,
 " for want of an exertion of that prudence which " his situation demanded. Now, though you may " have conceived the less favourably of me, be" cause I attached myself to the interest of Anthony,
 " at a time when you was his professed enemy, yet
 " I shall not, on that account, hesitate to make " known, and defend the services I have done him,
 " and the perfect esteem I have ever had for him.
 " If you will, for a moment, advert to his rank,
 " and the friendship I bore him, without retrospect
 " to the peculiarities of his situation, I conceive " that you will see so much of gratitude and good " faith in my conduct, that you may think the ac" ceptance of my friendship worthy your notice;
 " for the dignity of my character will suffer no al" teration, whether I vow this friendship to Cæsar
 " or to Anthony."

Herod delivered this speech with such an air of magnanimity, and such grace of demeanour, that Augustus, who possessed a natural benignity of mind, was not able to resist its power. He treated Herod with singular instances of regard and esteem, directed him to re-assume his crown, and be the same friend in future to himself, that he had formerly been to Anthony; giving him also to understand, that Capidius had made him sensible of the good offices Herod had done him in the affairs of the gladiators. When Herod had obtained so kind a reception, and had, beyond all his hopes, been reinstated in his kingdom, more securely than ever, by a decree of the Roman senate, upon Cæsar's immediate application, he could not but be affected with a degree of transport, and take every opportunity of testifying the sense he entertained of such liberal sanction. Upon this consideration he attended Augustus into Egypt, treating himself, and his friends, upon the way, with a magnificence suitable to his dignity of character, and due acknowledgment of obligation. He interceded with the emperor on the behalf of Alexander, a friend of Anthony, in order to obtain his pardon; but Augustus, having bound himself by solemn vow not to spare him, his request could not be granted.

The Jews who, on Herod's departure, had given him up for lost, were now so astonished at his return with a greater degree of reputation and splendour than that with which he had left them, that they looked upon him as a person under the peculiar care of Providence, which turned to his advantage all those circumstances that appeared to lead him only into disgrace and danger.

When Cæsar was upon his return from Egypt, Herod went out to meet him at Ptolemais, where he treated him with most superb magnificence, and amply supplied his whole army with necessaries. Upon this occasion Cæsar gave him every token of friendship and familiarity, insomuch, that they ordinarily rode out together while their troops were mustering. Having a train of 150 attendants, richly habited, and perfectly instructed in the duties of their office, Herod appointed them to wait on Cæsar and his friends in their passage, and take care that neither himself, or his army, should want either wine or water, over the dry and barren desert, which gained him great reputation amongst the soldiers. Besides, he presented Cæsar with five hundred talents; and gave so universal a satisfaction, that they held him in the highest veneration. Having thus improved a signal opportunity of demonstrating his generosity to divers Romans, of the first rank, in their passage out of Egypt, he acquired the character of one of the most illustrious princes upon earth.

andra. Death and character of Mariamne. Herod is inconsolable for the loss of her. A great pestilence in Jerusalem. Alexandra endeavours to possess herself of several strong fortresses in the neighbourhood of the capital. Is put to death by order of Herod. Cruelty of Herod to his friends. Herod rules with despotic sway.

THE satisfaction which Herod felt, in consequence of his very great success in his late expedition, was greatly eclipsed by the disturbances he found among his own family on his arrival at Jerusalem. Mariamne, his wife, as well as his mother-in-law, had been very unhappy on account of the situation in which he left them at his departure, considering themselves rather as prisoners in the castle of Alexandrion, than as being lodged there for the security of their persons. His wife was strongly possessed with an opinion, that, in the whole of his professions of regard to her, he had no farther view than the consulting of his own convenience. But the circumstance she held most heinous, was her husband's resolution not to suffer her to survive him in case of his death. Being apprehensive that he might have left orders for the execution of his sanguinary purpose both with Joseph and Sohemus, she tried various means to discover if her suspicions were justly founded. For some time Sohemus remained true to his trust; but on Mariamne's treating him with great complaisance, and presenting him with several very valuable articles, he began to recede by degrees, and at length discovered the whole secret with which Herod had entrusted him. Mariamne was so shocked with these conditional orders which Herod had repeatedly given respecting her, that she conceived the greatest antipathy against him; and such was the horror and dread of her mind, at the thought of living with a man who could harbour such a design, that she made it the subject of her daily prayer that he might never return to her alive; and, at a future period, when she had it not in her power to conceal her sentiments any longer, she acknowledged this circumstance in the most open and explicit manner.

As soon as Herod returned from Cæsar, he immediately repaired to Mariamne, and delivered to her the happy tidings of his success, at the same time embracing her with an apparent tenderness of affection. But while he was relating the circumstances of events which he thought would afford her the highest satisfaction, she looked about her with an air of the greatest indifference, without paying the least attention to what he said. She was, in fact, entirely unreserved in her neglect; and being a woman who prided herself in acting without disguise, took no pains to assume a look foreign from her heart, but gave Herod the opportunity of reading in her countenance, that his good news and endearments gave her more pain than pleasure.

This apparent aversion in Mariamne tortured the mind of Herod, who, partly through the indignation he felt at finding his love rejected, and partly through his confusion from the transports of his rage, was for a time almost distracted. He saw no means of gratifying his love without offering violence to his resentment, and at the same time dreaded giving a scope to his vengeance more than the opposite extreme; for he felt a principle of self-love in his breast, which told him, that, should he take vengeance on his wife, the most unhappy consequences would arise to himself, when future experience should convince him, that life was not to be supported without the endearments of her conversation.

The restless anxiety of Herod's mind leaving him in doubt how he should conduct himself with regard to Mariamne, his mother and sister thought this a fit opportunity of increasing the difference between them, by doing all kinds of ill-offices, and propagating every species of calumny, that might tend to promote that hatred which had already taken possession of the breast of Herod. In consequence of this, Herod became daily more and more discontented.

tented in his mind, and behaved with a greater degree of severity to his wife. On the contrary, Mariamne took not the least pains to disguise the discontent which rankled in her heart; so that the excessive regard that Herod entertained for her, was, by degrees, converted to the utmost rancour and hatred; and it is probable she might have fallen an immediate sacrifice to his resentment, had he not, just at this juncture, received intelligence of the deaths of Anthony and Cleopatra, and that Egypt was then in the possession of Cæsar. Upon this information Herod hastened away to Augustus, leaving his family in the greatest disorder, and once more committing Mariamne to the care of Sohemus, with acknowledgments for his care and fidelity, and the grant of a command in Judæa, a gratification.

Confers additional favours on Herod.

When Herod arrived in Egypt, he was received, by Cæsar, with the greatest kindness and respect; and having, on his return, accompanied him to Antioch, he so far ingratiated himself with the emperor, that he put him in possession of that part of the country which Anthony had bestowed on Cleopatra, with the additional government of Gadara, Hippen, and Samaria; towards the sea of Gaza, Anthedon, Joppa, and the Tower of Straton; which was no small accession to his royal state.

But prosperous as Herod was in his affairs abroad, on his return, he found nothing but trouble and vexation at home. Mariamne still retained her resentment for the cruel commission given to Sohemus; so that when Herod offered her his caresses, she not only rejected them with the utmost aversion, but reproached him, in the bitterest terms, with the deaths of her relations, which enraged Herod to such a degree, that he could hardly forbear laying violent hands on her. This fit of rage, Salome, the sister of Herod, and most implacable enemy of Mariamne, took the advantage of, and sent in the king's cup-bearer, whom she had before suborned for that purpose, to accuse the queen of having tempted him to give him poison, under pretence of administering a love potion. Herod had heretofore met with sufficient cause of vexation, but the astonishment with which he was struck at this information, drove him to the very verge of distraction; so that he ordered immediately the putting a particular confidant of Mariamne to the torture, taking it for granted she would do nothing that was material without his privacy. Obedience was paid to this order; but nothing could be extorted from him, till, in the last extremity of his anguish, he dropped some words, intimating, that the uneasiness of Mariamne arose from something that had been communicated to her by Sohemus. The sufferer had hardly pronounced these words, when Herod burst out into the most passionate exclamation, declaring, that "Sohemus, who had hitherto been so loyal a subject, and approved himself so true a friend to his king and country, never could have betrayed a secret of so important a nature as that with which he had been entrusted, but in the confidence of illegal formalities with Mariamne." He therefore gave immediate orders that Sohemus should be put to death; having done which, he directed that his wife should be summoned to take her trial before a court of justice, and appointed for her judges, a number of persons devoted to his will.

Mariamne is sentenced to death.

When the day of her trial arrived, the charge exhibited against her was, having conspired to poison the king. Herod was more violent against her, both by his words and actions, than was consistent with the conduct of any man in a court of justice: and the judges, observing the disposition of the king, followed his example; and Mariamne was pronounced guilty of the charge exhibited against her. Herod, however, as if he relented of his conduct, observed, that it would be more prudent to spare her life, and detain her in prison, than put her to death; which proposition was approved of, not only by the judges, but the greatest part of the assembly. It was at length over-ruled by Salome and her adherents, who were violent in their exclamations for immediate justice; and, in consequence of what they urged, that a revolt would happen among the people, if the queen's life was spared, Herod was prevailed on to agree to her execution, and a day accordingly appointed for the tragical scene.

As soon as Alexandra found to what extremity the proceedings against her daughter had been carried, she had every reason to apprehend that her own life was in danger. In order, therefore, to avoid the dreadful consequence, she descended to a conduct that was altogether derogatory to the dignity of her character. Her fears, at this juncture, induced her to go such lengths, and she was so desirous of not being thought to have combined with her daughter, that she sought every opportunity of traducing her, representing her as the most base and ungrateful of women, and extolling the justice of that sentence which had doomed her to death for conspiring the destruction of her husband, to whose tenderness she lay under such unbounded obligations.

Puillani-mity and hypocrisy of Alexandra.

Alexandra carried this hypocritical behaviour to such a degree, that she became universally despised, as one who could condescend to insult her daughter during the extremity of her misfortunes. But Mariamne, even while she was conducting to the place of execution, passed by all her mother's unnatural behaviour, though her countenance testified the sense she entertained of the shameful part her mother had acted. In short, she maintained her spirits with the greatest degree of firmness and constancy, not exhibiting, even by the change of her complexion, that she was in the least terrified at the thought of approaching death. In a word, she died in the same manner she lived, a patron of courage, disdaining fear, and proving herself capable of sustaining the most severe trials.

Mariamne is put to death.

Mariamne was a woman who would have been superior to all her sex, but that she had too great a mixture of pride and passion in her disposition. Her beauty was so great, the graces of her person so extraordinary, and the charms of her conversation so singular, as not simply to render her superior to all other women, but so much so, as not to admit of any degree of comparison. Now these super-eminent gifts and qualifications tended, in a great degree, to the advancement of her misfortunes, by occasioning the unhappy life she led with her husband. He was enamoured of her beyond all description: he neither opposed her will, or denied her any thing, but permitted her to do what she pleased, and indulged her in every gratification she chose. This, perhaps, might give rise to those frequent and inconsiderate reproaches which she cast upon Herod, without reflecting that she was thereby destroying her own happiness; for, by this kind of conduct, she rendered herself obnoxious to the mother and sister of her husband, and finally to herself, whose affection she conceived to be so excessive, that it could not, by any circumstance whatever, be alienated, more especially to such a degree as to affect her life.

Her character.

After the death of Mariamne, the passion which Herod had entertained for her in her life-time, displayed itself with redoubled violence. When he came to reflect upon the sentence which he had ordered to be carried into execution, he broke out into the strangest and most unmanly exclamations, frequently repeating the name of Mariamne, and saying, that her blood cried aloud for vengeance. The agonies of his mind increased to such a degree, that he sought to divest his melancholy by feasting, company, and a variety of entertainments. But all these endeavours proved fruitless, and, instead of finding any relief, he grew delirious, talked in a raving manner, and, while the fits of phrenzy were on him, would frequently call for Mariamne, and direct that she should be brought before him.

While Herod was in this distracted state, a most dreadful plague broke out in Jerusalem, which raged with such prodigious violence, that people of all ranks and degrees fell sacrifices to its rigour, and many thousands were taken off in a very short space of time. Herod's dilemma between his duty and his passions.

Herod's disorder daily increasing on him, he withdrew to a solitary retreat, and had it given out that he was gone to take the exercise of hunting. Before, however, he had been long in this retreat, he was attacked with a disorder much more violent than the former, and attended with such a racking pain and inflammation in the head, that he was not master of his own conduct. The prescriptions applied for his relief were found to do him more injury than service, so that his case was considered as no other than hopeless. The difficulties that arose in the attempt to conquer this disease, the peculiar situation of the patient, and the impossibility of relieving him in the regular way, being considered, the physicians reflected that it would be in vain to interpose their advice any longer, and therefore left him entirely to his own management, and the event to Providence only, directing that he might be gratified in every thing he desired. This was at Samaria, now called Sebaste.

The wretched situation of Herod being made known to Alexandra, who was then at Jerusalem, after reflecting on the circumstance, she began to consider whether or not it might be possible for her to obtain possession of the strong fortresses in the vicinity of the capital. She was particularly desirous of becoming mistress of two above the rest; one of which was situated in the city, and the other close adjoining to the temple; being assured that the people must be altogether at the mercy of the party who should be in possession of these two towers. For the Jews are so attached to their religion, that they will on no consideration dispense with their daily sacrifices; and it must have been at the option of whoever commanded these turrets, whether they should have any sacrifices or not. Alexandra, therefore, pursuant to her design, made application to the governors of these respective forts in words to this effect: "I need not inform you of the very deplorable state of the king's health; wherefore I intreat you that the two fortresses may be given up to the possession of the mother of the king's wife, and the children of Herod and Mariamne, lest, in case of his death, a different family should succeed to the throne; and even if the king should recover, the hands of his nearest relations are those in which the government may with most safety be trusted."

The governors, (one of whom was named Achiab, and nephew to Herod,) partly from a sense of their duty, but chiefly from an enmity to Alexandra, refused to acknowledge the force of her arguments for delivering up the towers, telling her, it would ill become them to make a kind of prejudication of the king's life, for whom, during many years, they had entertained the most perfect friendship and loyalty. No sooner was their conversation ended, than Achiab repaired to his uncle, and gave him a particular account of the proposal made by Alexandra. Herod, who was by this time much recovered from his illness, was enraged to the highest degree, and, without admitting Alexandra into his presence, or suffering her to say any thing in her own defence, sent immediate orders that she should be put to death.

ends.

This fit of sickness, of which Herod recovered with the greatest difficulty, produced a very strange and singular effect both in his body and mind, particularly the latter. His disposition was totally altered; and he became so extravagantly cruel and ferocious, that the least trifle ruffled his temper, incited him to acts of the greatest barbarity, and either friends or foes were equally the objects of his vengeance. For instance, Costobarus, Lyfimachus, Antipater, otherwise called Gadia, and Dositheus, were taken off upon various pretexts.

Costobarus was an Idumæan by birth, a man of the first rank, and descended from a family whose ancestors had formerly officiated as priests of Coze, a deity they held in great veneration, till, in the days of Hyrcanus, they embraced the religion of the Jews. Herod soon obtained the government, than he gave this Costobarus the command of Idumæa and Gaza, with his daughter Salome to wife, whose husband Joseph he himself had caused to be slain. This promotion, so much beyond the hope or pretence of Costobarus, rendered him so haughty and insolent, as to dispute the authority of his master; deeming it a condescension unworthy of the Idumæans, to own themselves the subjects of the Jews, in consequence of embracing their ceremonies and worship. He therefore sent deputies to Cleopatra, reminding her that Idumæa had been still under the administration of her forefathers, and that she would do well to make application to Anthony for the command, professing himself, at the same time, at her entire devotions. He was not induced to pursue this measure from any preference he gave to the government of Cleopatra, but because he thought that, upon the diminution of Herod's power, it would not be difficult for him to obtain for himself the government of the Idumæans, as he had two probable grounds for expectation of success; the dignity of his birth, and the immense riches he had acquired through the gratification of a most insatiable avarice. Cleopatra tried her influence with Anthony, but without effect; and this design coming to the knowledge of Herod, would have proved fatal to Costobarus, had it not been for the intercession of his mother and sister, by which means he obtained his pardon, though he was never afterwards exempt from suspicion.

Costobarus
disagree.

Some time after a disagreement prevailed betwixt Costobarus and Salome, who, in consequence, sent her husband a bill of divorce, though directly repugnant to the custom of the country, and a manifest usurpation of the privilege of the husband, who has a legal right to discharge the woman, and exclude her from her title to marry again without his consent. Such, however, was the power of Salome, that she was suffered to follow not the law of her country, but the law of her authority, alledging, that she loved her brother and sovereign more duly than she did her husband, with whom she parted from an assurance, that he, in conjunction with Lyfimachus, Antipater, and Dositheus, was forming a conspiracy against him. As an evidence of what she advanced, she cited an instance of his kindness to the sons of Babas, whom he had now kept twelve years under his protection. When Herod, upon an enquiry, discovered the truth of this allegation, it impressed him in an extraordinary manner; for he had long formed a resolution of having them taken off as known enemies to his interest, but incidents occurred that diverted him from his purpose. The antipathy arose from the following cause.

When Herod was before Jerusalem, in the time of Antigonus, the besieged were so distressed by the miseries of famine, and the toils of the siege, that the greater part were for opening the gates, and letting Herod into the town. The sons of Babas, who were dignified by birth, and had acquired great popularity, as friends to Antigonus, contended for persevering to act on the defensive, and maintaining the government in the royal line. Upon the taking of the city, Herod gave charge to Costobarus to keep strict watch upon the avenues of the city, nor suffer any of the party inimical to his interest to escape. Costobarus, sensible of the esteem in which they were held by the multitude, and supposing that their preservation might conduce to his interest, in case of a change in the administration of affairs, caused them to be secretly conveyed to a place of safety. Herod suspected the matter at the instant, and put him to the question; but the other assured him, upon oath, that he knew not what was become of them. A proclamation was then published, and other means followed, to detect the offence the king had received in the disobedience of his orders, but without any effect; for, after the first denial, there was no retracting, but at the most imminent danger of life.

At length the whole plan was laid open by Salome; and the king having ordered the most diligent search to be made for the principal and accomplices, they were found, and all cut to pieces, so that the whole race of Hyrcanus was extirpated.

Herod

Herod had no sooner established an absolute power, than he gradually departed from the ancient constitution and laws of his country, by the introduction of foreign inventions and innovations. He appointed games to be celebrated, every fifth year, in honour of Augustus, and, for that purpose, erected a theatre in Jerusalem. He also built a stately amphitheatre without the walls of the city; and these fabrics were wonderfully magnificent, and attended with an enormous expence. But these edifices were opposite to the Jewish laws and customs, which give no sanction to the exhibition of games and public spectacles. To add to the magnificence and extent of these entertainments, Herod caused them to be proclaimed far and near, with large promises of reward to such as should excel in the different performances. By these means he brought in competitors, in the various kinds of exercise, from all quarters, and the greatest adepts in the several professions; not only wrestlers, but musicians, vocal and instrumental, horse racers, charioteers, &c. In fine, it was his peculiar care that nothing might be wanting to contribute to the pleasure, ornament, and curiosity of the main design. He imitated whatever was superb and sumptuous in other nations, from an ambition of giving public demonstration of his grandeur. Inscriptions of the great actions of Cæsar, and trophies of those nations he had conquered, made of the purest gold and silver, encompassed the theatre itself. To diversify the entertainment, he provided lions, tigers, and such other wild beasts as were extraordinary either for ferocity, vigour, agility, or any quality of a singular nature. Some of these beasts of prey were turned loose upon each other, while others were selected to encounter condemned criminals.

Herod exhibits magnificent spectacles to the people.

Foreigners were greatly surprised and delighted with these spectacles; but to real Jews, they appeared no other than gewgaws, introduced to the dissolution of those ancient customs they held in the highest veneration: for what can be more horrid than to take pleasure in the brutal practice of sacrificing men to beasts, and spilling human blood in sport and derision? Besides, they deemed it the most egregious folly, as well as impiety, to change good old customs for frivolous new ones. But, above all, the Jews were most disgusted with the trophies, which they imagined to be images of men covered with armour, and consequently totally repugnant to the institutions of their country. They discovered their aversion to these trophies in such animated terms, that Herod chose rather to overcome their prejudices by mild than rigorous means; but all the allurements he could throw out had no effect; for they unanimously exclaimed against the iniquity of his proceeding, declaring they could submit to any thing except the introduction of images (meaning the trophies) into the city, which was absolutely contradictory to the laws of their country.

The trophies offend the Jews.

Herod, finding their disgust prevail more and more, and that they were not to be pacified, either by the force of authority or persuasion, took some of eminent rank to the theatre, shewed them the trophies, asked their opinion of them, and what they took them to be. Upon their exclaiming they were the images of men, Herod gave orders that they should be stripped of the outward ornaments, and exposed as naked stumps of wood, which turned their suspicion into ridicule, because they had ever before held the ornaments of images in contempt and derision.

Though Herod, by these means, amused the multitude, and allayed the vehemence of their indignation, there were many who persisted in their abhorrence of the introduction of foreign customs, esteeming a violation of the laws of their country as likely to be the origin of very great mischief. For this cause they held it their duty, at the hazard of their lives, to assert these laws against the infringements of Herod, who, under the sanction of royal authority, would act the part of an enemy, in thus imposing on their consciences and liberties.

Ten citizens conspire against Herod.

The people were at length so inflamed with this innovation, that ten citizens entered into a conspiracy against the person of the king, in defiance of all danger that might attend the enterprize. Having preconcerted the matter, they concealed daggers, under their garments, ready for the execution of their resolve. They then went, by common consent, to the theatre, with full resolution to stab the king; and, in case of disappointment, with respect to himself, of making such havock amongst his attendants, that their example would render him odious; and that this instance of their bravery, in the vindication of their religion and discipline, would be an incitement to others to follow their steps.

As Herod was just entering the theatre, one of his spies, who had found out the whole affair, discovered it to him; whereupon, being conscious to himself of the odium he lay under, he retired to his palace, and sent for the conspirators every man by name. Being now, as it were, surprised in the fact, and bereft of any probable means of escaping, they sustained the shock with undaunted resolution, confessing and justifying the charge exhibited against them, at the same time that they produced the very daggers with which they were to have done the execution, alledging, "that they were not engaged in any criminal combination to gratify any passion or interest, but in a solemn league, for the common good, and the defence of their laws, which the Jews, in general, were bound to maintain with their lives." After this frank and spirited declaration, they were led away to execution by the king's guards, and underwent, with resignation, all the exquisite torments that were inflicted on them, till death came to their relief. Nor was it long before the spy, who had discovered them, was seized on by some of the people, from the detestation in which they held him, by whom he was not only slain, but pulled to pieces limb from limb, and thrown to the dogs, and that in the presence of numerous spectators. Yet not one man concerned in this matter was detected for a considerable time, till, upon Herod's making strict search for them, and threatening the severest tortures, certain women confessed what they had seen done, upon which the authors, agents, and their whole families, were destroyed for this rash attempt. The multitude, however, stood firm in the vindication of their laws and customs; so that Herod, apprehensive of the danger of this mutinous disposition, determined to take effectual means, in due time, for the prevention of a revolt.

Having, therefore, two forts in the city, the one at his palace, and the other (Antonia) which served for a guard to the temple, he fortified Samaria (otherwise called Sebaſte) for a third, which served to keep the whole country in obedience. It was about a day's journey from Jerusalem, and commodiously situated for quelling broils in the city. There was also another strong hold that lay opportune for his purpose, formerly known by the name of Straton's Tower, but, by Herod, called Cæsarea. He built a castle also in the great plain, round about which he placed a select body of horse. These fortifications were so advantageously situated up and down the country, that it was impossible for the people to enter into any plot or practice against the state, as they were ready, upon any occasion, either to obviate sedition or crush it. He made it his first business to settle affairs in Samaria, as a place naturally strong and fit for his purpose. To this end he drew a great body of troops into the city, both foreign and domestic, partly for the security of the temple which he proposed to build there, and partly for the reputation of the work, but principally for his own safety, which, under the pretext of magnificence, was abundantly provided for. He changed the name of the town of Samaria to that of Sebaſte, and divided it amongst the inhabitants of the country about it, by which means, the lands being fruitful about it, they soon became rich and easy. He surrounded the city with a strong wall, and enlarged it in such a proportion, as to render it not inferior to the most famous cities. It was five and twenty furlongs in circumference, and a furlong and an half in the middle, which he reserved for a temple, and accordingly erected one, that, for size and magnificence, was not inferior to any fabric whatever.

CHAP. XII.

Dreadful calamities in Judæa. Prudence of Herod in procuring provisions for the inhabitants. He builds a castle, cities, and temples.

A grievous famine in Judæa, succeeded by a pestilence.

IN the thirteenth year of the reign of Herod, very great calamities fell upon Judæa; whether from the effects of Divine vengeance, or, according to natural causes, we shall not undertake to determine. The first instance of distress was a long continued drought, which rendered the soil so barren, as totally to obstruct vegetation. The want of food, as well as unavoidable change of diet, through a dearth of corn, brought on innumerable diseases, which terminated in a pestilence; and, to aggravate so dire a calamity, the sick were almost abandoned, and left without remedy, or any means of consolation. So universal was the mortality, that each individual was in hourly expectation of dissolution. The last year's stores being expended, and no hopes of supply remaining, the case was desperate; and pining want stared them in the face, and seemed to threaten a total extirpation of their race. The miseries of the first year followed them in the second, as what seed they had sown perished from the same cause as the former, an extremity almost productive of the madness of despair.

Nor was the king by any means free from general distress: his revenue, large as it might have been, was not at this time adequate to his maintenance, his tributes being sunk, and his funded stock expended on buildings and fortifications. As an aggravation of his private distress, abstracted from the popular calamity, he was subject to calumny, as having, in many instances of his late conduct, been supposed to have caused the infliction of such severe judgments.

In this deplorable situation Herod deliberated with himself on the means of procuring some relief, which, at first, appeared a matter of insurmountable difficulty. His neighbours were in the same condition with himself, so that no supply could be expected from them: nay, could they even have furnished him, his finances were so reduced, that he had it not in his power to defray the expence.

Determined, however, to persevere in his endeavours to assist his people in the very extremity of their despair, as the last and only resource, he melted down all his plate, both silver and gold, useful and ornamental, reduced the whole mass into one aggregate sum, and sent it away into Egypt, where Petronius at that time governed under a commission from Cæsar. Petronius had been harrassed by people from different quarters, who, urged by the most pressing necessity, had most importunately solicited his aid and assistance; but, from a particular regard to Herod, and an anxiety for the preservation of his people, he gave him, in preference to all others, a grant for the exportation of corn; and gave him all possible assistance, both in the purchase and conveyance. By procuring this very seasonable relief, he not only obviated the ill opinion the people had entertained of him, but enhanced himself in their esteem, as a prince of consummate wisdom, generosity, and humanity.

His first care, on the receipt of this succour, was to make an equal and impartial distribution of it, in proportion to the number and condition of those who were to reap the benefit of it. Those who, by reason of age, or any infirmity, could neither fetch their corn, or prepare it for food, were supplied with such as was ready for immediate use. He also took care that they should be provided amply, not only with food, but also raiment, to secure them from the inclemency of the season; they had been as destitute of wool for clothing, as of corn for food.

When he had competently provided for his own people, he took under consideration the necessities of his neighbours, and furnished the Syrians with a quantity of grain-seed for the ensuing season. This act of benevolence turned greatly to his own advantage; for the supply of seed arriving at the critical time of sowing, yielded so prodigious an increase of the following crop, that he sent 50,000 men, whom he had preserved from famine, to help them in with their harvest. By this means he repaired the afflicted state of his own country, and afforded assistance to his neighbours, who laboured under the same calamities: for none applied to him in vain, whether strangers, soldiers, citizens, rich, or poor; inso-much that it appeared, upon a computation, that the number of cori of wheat, of ten attic medimni each, which were distributed amongst foreigners, amounted to 10,000; and the number distributed in his own kingdom, to above fourscore thousand.

Sends assistance to the Syrians.

This seasonable and effectual interposition of the king had so prevailing an influence upon the Jews, as entirely to wipe off that stigma he had affixed to his character, by encroachments on their laws and discipline, having, in their estimation, amply atoned for his former misconduct. Nor was his character less respectable abroad than at home, since, from his compassionate regard and humanity towards strangers, they formed a judgment of his principles that did him the highest honour, as it was the total reverse of what they had held before.

Acquires universal fame.

About this time he sent Augustus 500 chosen men out of his own guards, as auxiliaries, which served under Elius Gallus, in the Arabian war, with much honour. The state of Judæa being now composed, and affairs in a flourishing condition, Herod took into contemplation the erecting a superb and extensive palace in the upper part of Jerusalem, with apartments elegantly fitted up, for the reception of numerous assemblies, and decorated with ornaments of gold and marble, of exquisite workmanship, and inscribed to the several great personages to whom he wished to pay honour, such as Cæsar, Agrippa, &c.

Herod builds a magnificent palace.

While he was intent on this undertaking, he became disposed to take another wife, from the following occasion. There was one Simon, a citizen of Jerusalem, the son of Boethus, an Alexandrian, and a prince of great eminence in his country. This Simon had a daughter of such exquisite beauty as to acquire an universal fame. Herod, upon the sight of her, become enamoured; but, determined to make no tyrannical use of his authority, made proposal of an honourable marriage. It was, indeed, an alliance beneath his dignity, though, in his opinion, too estimable to be rejected. To ballance, therefore, the inequality in some degree, by augmenting the honour of the family, and therefore qualify him for the proposed alliance, he deposed Jesus, the son of Phabes, from the pontificate, conferred the dignity on Simon, and then married his daughter.

Herod deposes Jesus from the pontificate, advances Simon, and marries his daughter.

When the nuptial ceremonies were solemnized, Herod erected a stately castle upon the spot where he formerly defeated the Jews in the war he had with Antigonus. This citadel is about sixty furlongs distant from Jerusalem, and so strong by nature, as to be capable of being rendered impregnable. The hill rises in a gradual ascent, as if artificial: the figure of it is round, and the castle encompassed with several towers, and 200 stone steps up to it. The apartments are stately and magnificent, and the whole structure firm and elegant. At the bottom of the mount are several buildings worthy of aspect, and particularly the famous aqueducts, which, with infinite labour and expence, were brought thither from a vast distance. The plain about the city is covered with edifices, to the proportion of a considerable city, having the hill above it, in the form of a castle.

Builds the castle called Herodium.
